7. It is a matter of common knowledge that places for the accommodation and entertainment of travelers, such as hotels and taverns, steamboats and ocean vessels which carry passengers, almost universally sell to their guests and patrons whiskies, wines, and liquors, and that such things are regarded by a portion of the traveling public, and by those who transport and entertain them, as part of the "supplies" for travelers.
8. Vacant land may be held by a corporation when necessary for use in its business in the near future.
9. Vacant lots kept for future dwellings cannot be owned by a corporation in the exercise of its implied powers, when they constitute part of a tract on which the corporation has built a town in excess of its powers.
10. A sale of surplus steam by a corporation is not in excess of its powers when the steam is generated in the course of its business by boilers larger than are needed for its present uses, but which are bought in anticipation of probable future necessities.
11. A corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation unless power to do so is specifically granted in its charter, or necessarily implied from it.
12. The right of the state to restrain usurpation of power by a corporation which is clearly antagonistic to good public policy is not defeated by any imputation of laches, or upon the ground that acquiescence is to be inferred from the failure to invoke the aid of the courts at an early day.
13. The report of a legislative committee, that the property of a corporation is properly taxed, does not amount to a concession on the part of the state that the corporation had a right to acquire the title to the property.

A PPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in a quo warranto proceeding to forfeit defendant's charter for alleged usurpation of power not granted to it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Maurice T. Moloney, Attorney General, T. J. Scofield, M. L. Newell, Samuel Richardson, and George E. Bacon, for appellant:

The defendant was "obliged," either to disclaim, in which case the people were at once entitled to judgment, or to justify, in which case it was their duty to set out their title specifically.

It could not justify by its charter alone. It must show a grant for all the powers which it attempts to exercise.

A corporation is an artificial body of men, composed of divers constituent members, ad instar corpus humani, the ligaments of which body politic are the franchises and liberties thereof which bind and unite all its members together, and in which the whole frame and essence of the corporation consists.

An artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law, it possesses only those powers which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or as incidental to its very existence.

A franchise is a royal privilege, or branch of the King's prerogative, subsisting in the hands of the subject, and, being derived from the Crown, must arise from the King's grant.

Corporate franchises in the American states emanate from the government, or sovereign power, owe their existence to a grant, or, as at common law, to prescription, which presupposes a grant, and are vested in individuals of a body politic.

The danger to the community which might arise out of the usurpation of unlawful powers as franchises by corporations was fully appreciated by the framers of the Constitution. Especial provisions were inserted in the Constitution limiting and restricting the exercise of the power of the legislature in the creation of corporations; and the Constitution imposed special restraints upon railroad corporations, and enjoined upon the legislature to pass laws to correct and prevent abuses of the powers which were deemed necessary to be conferred upon corporations.

Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 95 Ill. 577.

A corporation can only exercise such powers as may be conferred upon it by the legislative body creating it, either in express terms or by necessary implication; and the implied powers are presumed to exist to enable it to carry out the express powers granted.

In defining the implied powers of corporations it is usually said that they are such as are necessary to carry into effect the powers expressly granted.

Those who seek to limit grants of power by the state assume to interpret "necessary" as meaning indispensable. That no such narrow interpretation is admissible is evident both from the reason of the thing and from the construction put upon the term by the best judicial minds.

M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 413, 4 L. ed. 603; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9; State, New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., Prosecutors, v. Hancock, 35 N. J. L. 537; Crawford v. Longstreet, 43 N. J. In harmony with this latitude of construction given to the word "necessary," the courts have been equally liberal in sustaining the broad interpretation we claim for implied powers generally.

A broad distinction is made between a corporation acquiring land or other property incidental to its business, or necessarily connected with it, or in furtherance of it, and a corporation acquiring land, or making an investment, for a purpose foreign to that for which it was incorporated. In the latter case a corporation would be diverting its funds and resources from the object for which they were acquired.

JOGGS, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information in the nature of a quo warranto, filed by the attorney general in the circuit court of Cook county, in the name and on behalf of the people of the state of Illinois, against Pullman's Palace-Car Company. Said company is a corporation, organized in 1867 by a special act of the legislature of Illinois, entitled "An Act to Incorporate Pullman's Palace Car Company." 2 Priv. Laws 1867, p. 337. The act is as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the people of the state of Illinois, represented in the general assembly: That George M. Pullman, John Crerar, and Norman Williams, Jr., and their associates, successors, and assigns, be and are hereby created a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of 'Pullman's Palace Car Company,' with all powers, rights, privileges, and immunities incident to corporations and necessary or useful for the purposes of this act: Provided, that if the corporation created by this act shall not organize within one year after the passage hereof, then this act shall be null and void.

"Sec. 2. The capital stock of the said company shall be $100,000, and be divided into shares of $100 each, and it may be increased from time to time as a majority of the stockholders may direct, and shall be issued and transferred in such manner and under such conditions as the directors of the said company shall, by the by-laws thereof, prescribe.

"Sec. 3. The corporate powers of the said company shall be vested in and exercised by a board of directors, consisting of such number of persons, not less than three nor more than seven, as the stockholders of the said company may, from time to time, direct. The said directors shall be chosen by the stockholders at such time and place as may be fixed by the by-laws of the said company, and shall hold their offices for one year and until their successors are elected and qualified. They shall elect one of their number president of said company, and may fill any vacancy in the said board, occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise, for the unexpired portion of the office so becoming vacant, and make such rules, by-laws, and regulations, and appoint such officers and servants, as they may, from time to time, deem expedient. Until an election of directors as herein provided, the persons named as incorporators in the first section of this act shall constitute a board of directors, and shall have and may exercise all the powers of such board.

"Sec. 4. The said corporation shall have power to manufacture, construct, and purchase railway cars, with all convenient appendages and supplies for persons traveling therein, and the same may sell or use, or permit to be used, in such manner and upon such terms as the said company may think fit and proper.

"Sec. 5. The said corporation shall have power to borrow money, and may secure the payment of the same by deed of trust, mortgage, or other security.

"Sec. 6. It may be lawful for the company hereby incorporated to purchase, acquire, and hold such real estate as may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of their business, and may have power to sell and convey the same.

"Sec. 7. This act shall be deemed a public act, and shall take effect from and after its passage."

The information sets out the charter of the defendant, and then alleges certain acts which are alleged to be usurpations by the defendant of powers not conferred by its charter, and concludes with a prayer for the forfeiture of the charter of the corporation. The allegations contained in the information are as follows:

formation of the usurpations of power on the part of the defendant are, in substance, as follows: First. That it owns and controls a large ten-story business block, together with the ground on which it stands, worth $2,000,000, in the business center of the city of Chicago; that it rents three fourths of said block to persons, firms, and corporations, and derives a large income therefrom; that this business block is located many miles from its works or what is called the "Town of Pullman," and a small portion of it only is occupied by the company's employees; that this business block was built as an investment, and not because it had any real necessity therefor. Second. That it owns 50 acres of ground at Pullman, Illinois, which are covered with two-story brick dwelling houses, and three-story apartment dwellings, that all these houses are rented by it, and it derives therefrom large rentals; that the dwellings and apartment buildings, so rented, furnish homes for 12,000 people, and are worth a large amount of money, and are usurpations of power on its part. Third. That it owns 50 acres of ground in said town of Pullman which are used for streets, alleys, and ornamental grounds, and that the same is very valuable, and that the owning of such lands for such purposes is a usurpation of power. Fourth. That it owns 15 acres of ground on which are erected, among other buildings, the Arcade building, the Hotel Florence, and some schoolhouses; that the Arcade building is a large business block, and is rented by the company to different persons, and there are carried on therein various and different kinds of business by the tenants occupying the same; and that said Arcade building yields a rich profit to said company. Fifth. That it owns two churches in said town of Pullman, together with the ground on which they are erected, and it rents said church edifices to different congregations, and derives a large profit therefrom. Sixth. That it owns a number of schoolhouses in said town, and the ground on which they are erected, and they are rented by it to the authorized educational authorities, and it derives a large income therefrom. Seventh. That it owns a large hotel, located in said town, and which is known as the "Hotel Florence;" that said company operates and controls said hotel, and pays for the supplies consumed therein, and for all help employed in and about said hotel; that it employs and pays a manager to look after said hotel; and, in connection with said hotel, it owns and operates a barroom or saloon, and which saloon is located in said hotel building, and that in said saloon it sells all kinds of whiskies, intoxicating liquors, and other drinks; that a government license is annually taken out for saloon purposes; and that the keeping and maintaining said hotel and the keeping and maintaining said saloon are all done for profit, and a large income is derived therefrom. Eighth. That it owns a theater and the ground whereon it stands, and that the same is done for profit; that it employs a manager to manage the same, and plays, operas, and other attractions are performed therein. Ninth. That it owns a large hall, known as "Market hall," and the ground whereon it stands; that said hall is rented by it for divers purposes for which large halls of the kind are rented in cities, and a large income is derived therefrom. Tenth. That it owns a large gas plant, and operates the same in said town of Pullman, and rents said gas to the 12,000 people, residents of said town, to light their homes and for purposes of consumption, as well as to light said streets; and that from all these sources a large profit is derived. Eleventh. That it owns and carries on a system of water mains and service pipes within the town of Pullman, and through these supplies, for profit, water to the different industries located in said town, as well as to the residences and apartment houses owned and rented by it; that it purchases said water from the city of Chicago and other sources, and sells the same, as aforesaid, for a large profit. Twelfth. That it owns a plant for generating steam, and owns the pipes to convey the steam to the residences of its said tenants in the town of Pullman, and supplies said tenants in said town such steam, together with merchants and others, for pecuniary profit, and derives a large income therefrom. Thirteenth. That it owns and operates a large brick plant at Pullman; that it manufactures and sells brick, and places upon the market, wherever purchasers can be found, brick so manufactured; that it has been for many years a competitor in the market for the sale of brick. Fourteenth. That it owns and operates a system of sewerage pipes and a pumping plant connected therewith; that through said sewerage pipes the sewage and refuse accumulated in said town of 12,000 inhabitants is pumped onto a large farm owned by it, and spread over the same; that said company cultivates said land so manured, and raises thereon large quantities of cabbage, celery, beets, and other vegetables, and sells the same in the city of Chicago and other cities where it can find a market therefor, and makes shipments of such produce to the city of New Orleans; and that it realizes in this way large sums from operating said sewerage system and cultivating said farm. Fifteenth. That it operates, in this state and elsewhere, through leases or contracts, a number of cars, and in these, day and night, carries and sells for profit stocks of whiskies, wines, beer, and other malt and intoxicating liquors; that such whiskies, etc., are carried and sold for pecuniary gain, and, in doing so, it derives a large profit therefrom. Sixteenth. That it owns near the Belt Line road 25 acres of ground which it does not use. Seventeenth. That it owns near Lake Calumet 175 acres of vacant and unoccupied land. Eighteenth. That it owns 55 acres of land north of its shops which land is vacant and unoccupied. Nineteenth. That it owns 16 acres of lots and blocks in the town of Pullman which are vacant and unoccupied. Twentieth. That a certain corporation, known as the "Union Foundry & Pullman Car-Wheel Company," was organized and existed in Cook county, and owned about 10 acres of ground purchased by it from appellee; that appellee owned its stock, and had it organized, and now, in effect, controls and operates it; that in this way, and through this corporation, it manufactures structural iron, and places the same upon the market. Twenty-First. That it furnishes to the Allen Paper Car-Wheel Company the power that operates its machinery, and receives therefrom a large income. Twenty-Second. That it owns the stock of the Pullman Iron & Steel Company and controls, directs, and manipulates its affairs; that the said company manufactures bar iron, and for many years has manufactured railroad spikes, and sold the same upon the market wherever purchasers could be found therefor; that such sales and the manufacturing of such products are, in effect, made by defendant. Twenty-Third. That it organized, owned, and controlled the Southern Pullman Palace Car Company; that it owned its stock; and that the said company is now merged in defendant. Twenty-Fourth. That it manipulates and controls the affairs of the town of Pullman, and maintains therein water and gas plants, and lights the streets of said town and owns the same, and exercises privileges and powers incident to a municipal corporation. Twenty-Fifth. That it owns 110 acres of ground in Pullman, on which are erected its shops, and all that is not necessary for such purposes is a usurpation of power, and contrary to law.

To the six pleas of the defendant, as originally filed, demurrers were sustained, upon the ground that each assumed to, but did not, answer the entire information. They were amended. Each of the amended pleas sets out the charter of defendant, and then alleges certain matters as inducement, and concludes with a traverse under the absque hoc. The first amended plea assumes to answer the entire information, except so much thereof as charges defendant with owning and holding certain shares of the capital stock in the Union Foundry & Pullman Car-Wheel Works, in the Southern Pullman Palace Car Company, and in the Pullman Iron & Steel Company, and with selling and furnishing, upon its sleeping cars, whiskies, wines, beers, and other malt and intoxicating liquors, to persons traveling therein. The second and third pleas assume each the same burden as that assumed by the first, but with this additional exception: That neither of them purports to answer the charge of owning a large office building in the center of the city of Chicago. The fourth plea undertakes to answer only so much of the information as charges the defendant with owning and holding certain of the capital stock of the Pullman Iron & Steel Company. The fifth plea undertakes to answer only so much of the information as charges the defendant with selling and furnishing, upon its sleeping cars, whiskies, wines, beer, and other intoxicating liquors to persons traveling therein. And the sixth plea undertakes to answer the entire information, except that part of it which charges the defendant with owning and holding shares of the capital stock of the Pullman Iron & Steel Company.

Demurrers were interposed by the attorney general to these several amended pleas. The demurrer to the fourth plea was sustained, and, the defendant electing to abide by its said plea, judgment was entered against it thereon, ousting the defendant from the liberty of owning capital stock in the Pullman Iron & Steel Company. The demurrers to the other pleas, however, were overruled, and, the attorney general electing to abide by the demurrers, judgment was entered finding the defendant not guilty as charged against it in the information, except as to the charge of owning capital stock in said Pullman Iron & Steel Company. To the judgment of the court overruling the demurrer to the first, second, third, fifth, and sixth pleas the people duly excepted, and appealed from said judgment to this court. The defendant has assigned cross errors on the ruling and judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer to the fourth plea.

Paragraph 23 of the amended sixth plea avers as follows: "Defendant further states that heretofore in this plea it has set out all the business in which it is engaged, and all the real property which it owns in said county of Cook, and particularly it here states that it does not own any brickyard, and does not own 175 acres south of Lake Calumet; that it does not own any stock in the Union Foundry & Pullman Car-Wheel Works; that said Union Foundry & Pullman Car-Wheel Company owns no property, and by action of its stockholders it has ceased to exist; and that defendant does not own any stock of the Southern Pullman Palace Car Company, and exercises no control over it." The demurrer, of course, admits the truth of these several statements and denials, and the effect of this disclaimer is to eliminate from further consideration the charges of the information in respect to said matters.

Each of the amended pleas, as already stated, sets out the charter of the defendant, and then alleges certain matters of inducement, and concludes with a traverse under the absque hoc. The design of a special traverse as distinguished from a common traverse, is to explain or qualify the denial. The essential parts of such a plea are the inducement, the denial, and the verification. The issuable part of the plea is the denial, which is under the absque hoc, and when the denial under the absque hoc is sufficient no issue of fact can be formed upon the inducement. The matter, however, set up in the inducement must be such as in itself amounts to a sufficient answer, in substance, to the declaration or information. The plaintiff may elect to either form an issue of fact by pleading to the absque hoc, or to form an issue of law by demurring to the plea, and thereby take exceptions, in point of law, to the explanatory matters set up in the inducement. In the several amended pleas in the case at bar the denials under the absque hoc are amply and necessarily sufficient; for, with the exception of the allegations of the organization and existence of the defendant corporation, they specifically deny all the averments of the information. Therefore the questions to be determined upon this appeal have reference to the sufficiency of the matters stated in the inducements to said pleas to constitute valid answers and defenses, in substance, to the several charges made in the information. As matter of course, the demurrers admit the truth of all the statements made in the plea.

Counsel for appellee contend that full warrant and authority for the various acts which, as it appears from the pleas, the corporation has done, are to be found either in the powers expressly conferred by its charter, or in the powers possessed by implication of law. In order to determine correctly the sufficiency of the pleas in the light of this contention of appellee, it is essential the rules and principles of law applicable to the matter of the express and implied powers of corporations should be ascertained and declared.

A corporation in our state has its existence by virtue of the enactment, general or special, of the lawmaking power. The appellee corporation was created by a special act of the general assembly. The only difference between a corporation organized under a general law and one created by a special statute is "that in the former we look to the certificate of the promoters, while in the latter we look to the special statute, to ascertain the scope of the powers of the corporation." The rule for construing the instruments must necessarily be the same, viz.: The powers specifically enumerated, and such other powers as are incidental or necessary to carry those powers into effect, but none others may be exercised by the corporation. Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, 21 N. E. 794.

The enactment creating the appellee corporation is the full measure of its power. In order to enable it to carry into execution the powers thus conferred, it may exercise other powers, known to the law as incidental or implied powers. Implied powers exist only to enable a corporation to carry out the express powers granted,—that is, to accomplish the purpose of its existence,—and can in no case avail to enlarge the express powers, and thereby warrant it to devote its efforts and capital to other purposes than such as its charter expressly authorizes, or to engage in collateral enterprises not directly, but only remotely, connected with its specific corporate purposes. A power which the law will regard as existing by implication must be one in a sense necessary,—that is, needful, suitable, and proper to accomplish the object of the grant,—and one that is directly and immediately appropriate to the execution of the specific powers, and not one that has but a slight, indirect, or remote relation to the specific purposes of the corporation. Illinois Conference Female College v. Cooper, 25 Ill. 148; Caldwell v. Alton, 33 Ill. 418, 75 Am. Dec. 282; Chicago, P. & S. W. R. Co. v. Marcellis, 84 Ill. 643; Chicago Gaslight & Coke Co. v. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. 121 Ill. 530, 2 Am. St. Rep. 124, 13 N. E. 169; Mott v. Danville Seminary, 129 Ill. 403, 21 N. E. 927; People ex rel. Peabody v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319, 22 N. E. 798; Northside R. Co. v. Worthington, 88 Tex. 562, 53 Am. St. Rep. 778, 30 S. W. 1055; Field, Priv. Corp. §§ 53, 54; 4 Thomp. Corp. § 5638; 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 385; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 88, 89.

Keeping these definitions as to implied powers in view, we may proceed to determine whether the acts set forth in the pleas are within or beyond the measure of power possessed by the appellee company.

The information charges that the defendant owns and controls within the city of Chicago a large ten-story business block, together with the ground on which said building stands, worth $2,000,000; that the defendant occupies a portion only of said building for purposes of its own corporation business, and that it leases about three fourths of the building to other persons, firms, or corporations, and receives a large consideration from the occupants thereof as rentals; that said block was built by the defendant as an investment; and charges that the said building was erected without warrant or authority of law. The defendant sets up, by way of inducement in its plea, that it has had, ever since its organization, its general offices near the business center of the city of Chicago, and that it is necessary and proper to do so; that it became impossible to rent proper general offices, and that the rentals charged for poor offices were high and exorbitant; that thereupon, in 1880, it purchased a lot of land, 75 by 170 feet at the corner of Michigan avenue and Adams street, and erected thereon a building, in which it ever since has kept its general offices and some storerooms; that said land was valuable, and could not, without great loss, be utilized for erecting a building other than a high building, and such as is in keeping with and equal to the surrounding buildings; that thereupon the defendant erected thereon a nine-story building, of which it now uses nearly one half; and that, if its business continues to increase as it has in the past, it will soon also use it all, for its general offices; that in the meantime it rents to different parties such offices as it is not at present using; that erecting such buildings is in keeping with the usual practice of other large corporations doing kindred business, and that it could not now rent such general offices as it requires, in the business center of Chicago, for a rental as low as 5 per cent per annum on the amount which said building and the land on which it stands cost defendant.

The defendant is authorized, by § 6 of its charter, to purchase, acquire, and hold such real estate as may be necessary for the successful prosecution of its business; but it is contended that the building in question is much larger, and contains many more rooms and offices, than the business or wants of the corporation demand; that only a small portion of it is occupied by the company's employees; that it was erected as an investment by the company, and therefore that the company owns and maintains the building without authority of law. We are concerned, however, with the averments of the plea, the truth of which is admitted by the demurrer. The plea avers it was necessary and proper the general offices of the appellee should be maintained near the business center of the city of Chicago, and that such offices have always been maintained in that locality; that it became impossible to rent suitable general offices there, and even insufficient and undesirable offices could only be obtained at high and exorbitant rentals; that the business of the company was large and rapidly increasing, and that good business judgment dictated the company should provide its own offices, and that in view of the fact that desirable ground was very valuable, and that more office room would be needed in the future to accommodate the growing business of the company, it was determined to construct a larger building than was at the time actually needed and necessary, and to rent such offices as were not at the present needed, and that, moved by such consideration, the building was erected; that, if the business of the corporation continues to increase as it has in the past, the entire building will soon be devoted to the uses of the company.

We think the plea presented a good defense to the charges preferred in the information with reference to this building. The right of the appellee to construct an office building is indisputable, as so, also, is the right to select the most eligible and desirable site. It would be but a narrow and wholly unjustifiable view of this power to insist that in planning and constructing the building the corporation should leave out of consideration its probable prospective requirements, and should erect a building containing only as many rooms and offices as its present business might demand. The corporation had the right, as we think, to look to, and prepare for, the future. It was but true economy to do so, and if it proceeded in good faith, as we are to assume from the conceded averments of the plea it did, no reason is perceived why it should be deemed bound by law to permit such parts of the building as are not for the present required for the accommodation of its business to remain vacant, but, on the contrary, that it might lawfully obtain such income from the rents of such rooms as might be possible until the growth or increase of its business demanded the additional rooms or offices. A corporation could not be permitted, under mere color and pretense of furnishing accommodations for the transaction of its own affairs, to construct houses or rooms for the purpose of renting the same, and engage in renting such houses or rooms as a business, if such pursuit was, as it here clearly is, beyond and distinct from that it was created to pursue and accomplish. But the averments of the plea do not justify the imputation that the acts of the company under consideration are but colorable, and in this investigation the averments stand confessed by the state.

pleas which are intended to answer the allegations of the information set forth hereinbefore as Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 24 that the defendant company, about the year 1880, acquired and now holds a certain tract of land containing about 83 acres, on a portion of which, in the year 1880,—at least not later than 1882. — it caused to be constructed a large number of dwellings and tenement houses, some of the height of two stories and others three stories in height; that the total number of such buildings is 2,200, and that it has laid out and now maintains the usual and necessary streets and alleys to afford the tenants to whom it rents said dwellings and tenement houses the proper and usual means of ingress and egress to and from their homes and places of business; that it now rents said dwellings and tenements to its employees; that upon the same plat of ground upon which said dwellings and tenements stand, and where said streets and alleys are located, it caused to be erected a number of school-houses, a church edifice, an hotel, a large building called "The Arcade," in which are a number of rooms, some of which were constructed to be rented for dry goods, grocery, and other retail stores, and other of the rooms were built for school, lecture, and theater rooms, and for the use of religious congregations for church purposes, and that it now rents the rooms in said Arcade for the various purposes for which they were intended when built; that it has also constructed on the same plat of ground a large building called "Market hall," the lower floor whereof it caused to be fitted up for meat and vegetable markets, and it has rented and now rents them to retail dealers in such articles of food, and the upper floor is a large hall, where concerts, dances, and other entertainments may be given, and is rented by it for such purposes; that it maintains a system of waterworks and sewers, and a gas plant, and, for a consideration, supplies those who inhabit its houses with water, light, and heat.

From these averments but one conclusion is admissible, which is, the appellee corporation became, and is now, the proprietor of the lots, streets, alleys, sewer system, dwellings, tenement houses, churches, hotel, schools, theater, and business buildings composing a town or city of more than 2,000 houses, no one of which is occupied by any other than a tenant of the corporation. The powers vested in the corporation by the words of its charter are "to manufacture, construct, and purchase railway cars, with all convenient appendages and supplies for persons traveling therein, and the same may sell or use, or permit to be used, in such manner and upon such terms as the said company may think fit and proper." Manifestly, the acts of the corporation which have resulted in the creation of this town or city, and its acts in connection with the streets, alleys, dwellings, tenements, school, church, and business houses, water system, sewerage, heat, etc., which the plea admits it was performing at the time of the filing of the information, cannot be regarded as the exercise of powers expressly given. Can they be justified as the proper exercise of powers incidental to the express powers possessed by the corporation, or by the provision in the sixth clause of the charter that it may be lawful for the corporation to acquire and hold such real estate as may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of its business? The declaration of the sixth clause is not that the company may acquire and hold such real estate as it or its directors may deem necessary, but such as may be deemed necessary to the successful prosecution of its business. The true meaning of this clause is not that the company or its governing body is vested with unlimited and unbridled power to acquire and hold such real estate as it may deem necessary, but with power to purchase and hold only such real estate as, under the rules of law, may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of its business. "The rule of construction . . . [when any doubt arises out of any language employed in such a charter] is that every power that is not clearly granted is withheld, and that any ambiguity in the terms of the grant must operate against the corporation and in favor of the public." American Loan & T. Co. v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 157 Ill. 641, 42 N. E. 153; Illinois Health University v. People, 166 Ill. 171, 46 N. E. 737. "Irrespective of the operation of statutory restrictions, it is a settled principle of American jurisprudence that a corporation cannot take and hold land except in so far as reasonably necessary to carry out the objects of its creation. These bodies, which never die, are not allowed, against the objection of the state, to take and hold land for purposes wholly foreign to the purposes for which the state endowed them with corporate existence and the power of perpetual succession." 5 Thomp. Corp. § 5772. This court has declared that it is against the public policy of this state to allow corporations to own real estate beyond what is necessary for the transaction of their corporate business, or such as is acquired in the collection of debts. Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 16 Am. Rep. 632; United States Trust Co. v. Lee, 73 Ill. 142, 24 Am. Rep. 236. And, in furtherance of this declared public policy, statutes have been enacted by the general assembly requiring all corporations which have acquired lands in the collection of debts to sell and dispose of all that is not necessary to the purposes of the corporation, and providing remedies designed to coerce compliance with such requirements. Rev. Stat. chap. 32, § 5, entitled Corporations.

It seems perfectly clear the charter of the corporation did not clothe it with express power to purchase the real estate upon which the town or city of Pullman is built, or to construct the buildings in said town or city, or to engage in the business of renting dwellings, storerooms, market places, etc. Nor is express power to authorize such acts relied upon, but the contention is they were fully warranted by the powers derived from the implications of the law. What powers are to be implied by law must, as a matter of course, depend largely upon the surrounding circumstances.

With a view of showing that the situation at the time justified the course pursued by the company, and was sufficient to invest it with the legal right to pursue such course, the appellee company filed pleas averring, in substance, as follows: That, after it had been for several years in the exercise of the powers conferred by its charter, its business increased to such an extent that it became necessary for it to build large and extensive shops in which to manufacture cars; that a large amount of land was necessary on which to locate such shops; that it was decided to locate and build said shops in the county of Cook, in or near the city of Chicago, where its general offices and headquarters were, and where its principal officers resided; that it found that it could not acquire a sufficient amount of land upon which to erect said shops within the city of Chicago, on account of the high price of land in said city; that, after diligent and careful inquiry as to the price of land and the means of access thereto, it decided to build its shops where they are now situated, being upon a parcel of land lying between the west bank of Lake Calumet and the Illinois Central Railroad; that it, about the year 1880, purchased a tract of about 343 acres, then of comparatively small value, being unimproved, low-lying land, held as acre or pasturage land, not included in any municipality, and not subdivided; that at the time of said purchase, and at the time of the planning and laying out of the manufacturing plant of defendant, there were not more than 25 dwelling houses within a radius of 2 miles of said land, all of which were fully occupied; that it was impossible to get good, skilled workmen to come and work at said manufacturing plant unless they could obtain homes in the immediate vicinity; that to get workmen and other employees, skilled and otherwise, at its said manufacturing plant, defendant was obliged to build and erect a sufficient number of houses or tenements to accommodate as many as possible of its employees, and that, in order to attract to said manufactory the best class of skill and labor, it, in or about the year 1880, and not later than 1882, erected upon a part of said lands 2,200 houses and tenements, and that the same were so built for the purpose of inducing the best class of workmen to become employed at defendant's manufactory; that the same were only built for the purpose of so accommodating defendant's employees, were not built for any profit or income therefrom, but that the defendant might be able to obtain good, skilled labor in its manufactory; that they are not a profitable investment, and were and are only built and held by defendant because the same are "necessary for the successful prosecution of its business."

Defendant alleges also in its pleas, as inducement, that in order to obtain a better class of skilled employees, especially those with families, to work in its manufactory, it was absolutely necessary that there should be provided near their homes proper educational facilities; that to meet the said demand, and to accommodate the desire of said employees that their children should receive ordinary education, defendant erected several schoolhouses near the said dwellings, and schools were and are held therein, and the children of such employees receive instruction therein; that said buildings are all now within the limits of the city of Chicago, and said schoolhouses are rented to the board of education of said city, which has the sole control and charge of said buildings; that it became and was necessary that certain places for divine worship should be provided near the said dwellings of defendant's employees, and, to meet that demand, a church was erected and furnished to a congregation using it, at a purely nominal rental; that on this tract of land, and near said dwelling houses, defendant erected a building called the "Arcade building;" that on the first floor thereof are rooms rented by defendant to storekeepers, because, when the town of Pullman was built, there were no stores within a reasonable distance at which the company's employees could buy the ordinary necessities of life; that from said stores were and are sold to said employees groceries, clothing, and all other things usually purchased by them; that defendant has not, and never has had, any interest in said stores or the profits derived therefrom; that it does not allow its employees to give orders upon it to said stores; that said stores are rented at a very low rate, and that said building was not built for profit, but only for the convenience of said employees; that on the second and third floors thereof is a public library, for the use of said employees and their families, for which no rent is charged, and two large halls used for religious worship for the use of said employees and their families, and which are furnished by defendant to congregations of its employees at a nominal rental; that in said building are also two or three rooms rented by the board of education of the city of Chicago for school purposes, and in which the children of said employees are taught; that in said building there is also a room erected as a lecture room and theater, provided only to give said employees and their families recreation; that no theatrical entertainments are given in said building by defendant, but the same is furnished for use to said employees or associations of them, and is largely used by them for entertainments given by themselves, and for a place in which they may practise music; that on said land, near its manufacturing plant, defendant erected a small building which was used as a hotel, for the purpose of furnishing accommodations to intending purchasers of defendant's cars, their agents and inspectors; that said hotel was and is a necessary part of defendant's manufacturing plant; that defendant built on said grounds a building known as "Market hall," the upper story of which is a large hall furnished to employees in which they hold entertainments, such as concerts and dancing, and on the lower floor are stores, which are rented out to persons who use the same as meat markets; that, in order to properly operate its manufacturing plant, it became and was necessary to erect a gas plant, from which it furnishes light through all its manufacturing buildings, and has, upon their request, furnished gas, at a fair and reasonable price, to certain of its employees occupying some of its houses, but that the gas so furnished said employees does not amount to 10 per cent of the gas produced by said gas plant, and used in defendant's shops; that, at the time of the erection of said manufacturing plant, there were no waterworks at or near said lands, and defendant erected a water tower and plant upon its premises, principally for supplying water throughout its shops, and contracted with the village of Hyde Park for the furnishing to defendant of large amounts of water through the water mains of said village; that most of the water passing through said water mains and through said water tower is used in the shops of defendant, but a small percentage thereof is furnished to said employees in their homes; that said water is furnished to said employees at a very low rate, and at less than the cost thereof to defendant, and because said employees cannot in any other way procure a supply of water; that, when said manufacturing plant was built, defendant put in a very large system of boilers for generating steam; that said boilers and steam capacity probably will all be required for use in operating said shops, but up to this time there has been a surplus of steam generated, and, at the request of said employees, steam pipes have, in a few instances, been run into their said houses and dwellings, and through said steam pipes some of said houses and dwellings have been heated; that in like manner it has furnished, for a money consideration, part of its present surplus steam and engine power to the Allen Paper Car-Wheel Company, whose shops adjoin the property of defendant; that, in connection with said manufacturing plant and dwelling houses, defendant set apart 18 acres of land as recreation grounds for the use of its said employees, which includes a place for playing baseball, football, and many other kinds of athletic exercises, and for the use of said recreation grounds it charges no rental or admission fee; that said grounds are furnished with divers appliances for athletic exercises, and are free to all of said employees and their families, and are used as pleasure grounds by them; that also, in connection with said manufacturing plant and dwelling houses, it set apart about 13 acres for pleasure grounds for its said employees and their families, the said pleasure grounds including what is usually called a park, together with a greenhouse and other such accessories, and defendant has established and maintained the same only for the purpose of attracting to its works the best class of skilled workmen.

In the light of the well-settled rule, that a plea is to be construed most strongly against the pleader, the averments of appellee's pleas are to be interpreted to disclose that the measures which the appellee corporation adopted looking towards the relocation and removal of its plant included, as a fully-matured part thereof, the plan of building the residence, tenement, and business houses and constructing the streets and alleys,—in fact, providing a town or city wherein its employees might or should dwell, and of which it should be the sole owner and proprietor,—and that, in pursuance of this plan, a tract of land was acquired sufficiently large to receive and accommodate, not only the manufacturing plant of the corporation, but also to provide the necessary space for the streets, alleys, dwellings, tenements, hotel, church, opera house, and other business houses which the scheme of the corporation included; and it is to be further necessarily inferred, on a proper construction of the plea, that the work of erecting the buildings comprising the manufacturing plant proper and the buildings which compose the town or city was entered upon and carried along at the same time and together. Nor is this interpretation of the pleas at all harsh or doubtful, but is the same as that entertained by counsel for appellee who drafted the pleas. Speaking upon the point, counsel for appellee, on pages 51 and 52 of their brief filed in this court, say: "Accordingly in the exercise of its best judgment, appellee selected and purchased about 350 acres of land situated upon the shores of Lake Calumet, 14 miles distant from its offices and 10 miles beyond the then limits of the city of Chicago. The land at that time was practically an unoccupied waste. It was surrounded for a very considerable distance, in all directions save towards the lake, by farming and unoccupied lands. There were no convenient places where employee of the company could find homes or dwelling places. The construction of the manufactory, therefore, involved, not the expediency, simply, but the necessity, of providing places suitable for the occupancy of those who were to do its work. The manufactory and the homes for the workmen were mutually and equally necessary to the success of the enterprise. 'The power to manufacture cars' was barren without the other charter power, 'to purchase, acquire, and hold such real estate as may be deemed necessary.' It was only by the combination of the two—by their exercise together, in the manner which has been described—that the object of the charter, 'the successful prosecution of their business,' could be accomplished. Accordingly, the exercise of these powers was undertaken contemporaneously. The construction of the works and the construction of the dwelling places of those who were to operate them was undertaken at the same time, and as a part of a single, harmonious scheme. Two years of time, and the labor of 4,000 men transported daily to and fro between Chicago and the point of location, were devoted to the work. At the expiration of that time the result appeared in the completed structures of a manufactory giving employment to 5,000 persons, and in its immediate vicinity dwelling houses sufficient in number for the comfortable occupancy of a large part of these persons with their families and those dependent upon them, with the necessary schoolhouses for the education of their children, churches for their religious instruction, stores and shops where the necessities of life could be procured, halls suitable for lectures and social entertainments,—all so arranged, with such accessories of streets, parks, and other provisions, as to minister, not simply to the necessities, but also to the comfort and well-being, of those who might be employed."

It further appears from the plea that the corporation at once, after the buildings composing the town of Pullman and its streets and alleys were completed, rented the dwellings, tenements, business rooms, church, theater room, school rooms, etc., and for a compensation undertook to supply the inhabitants of the town with water, light, and heat, and that it has since continued to perform such acts, and was pursuing the same course when the information was filed. The location selected by the corporation for the new site of its plants was within a few miles of the populous and wealthy city of Chicago, upon a line of railway which furnished adequate and speedy means of transportation to and from the city, so that the plant and its surroundings in fact were within the suburbs of the city. There were then, it is true, only a few buildings in the vicinity of the proposed new location. The establishment of the works of the appellee corporation would make it imperative that other buildings, dwellings, and tenement houses should be constructed for the accommodation of those who should find employment in appellee's shops.

The averment of the plea, that the corporation was obliged to construct such houses and tenements, is but the statement of a conclusion, and we find the facts pleaded do not justify such a deduction. No reason existed, nor do we find in the pleas even a suggestion that there was reason or ground, for the apprehension that individual enterprise and private capital would not at once, after the purpose and intention of the corporation became known, provide all necessary dwellings and tenements for the accommodation of the workmen, or that the wants of the community composed of such workmen would not at once be met by the location in its midst of schools, churches, drygoods and grocery stores, meat markets, etc., or that the necessary streets, alleys, and public ways would not be provided without any intervention whatever on the part of the corporation. The public laws of the state would have supplied the requisite school-houses and teachers, and the inclinations of the individual members of the community could have been safely relied upon to provide church houses and rooms for imparting religious instruction. It is idle to argue that it became, in any sense, necessary or directly appropriate to the accomplishment of the lawful and chartered purposes or objects of the corporation that it should engage its efforts or capital in the construction of dwellings, tenement houses, store houses, streets, alleys, theaters, hotel, churches, schoolhouses, waterworks, a system of sewers, etc. Workmen, if they have families, must have homes, or, if unmarried, must be accommodated with boarding and places of lodging. Homes, groceries, vegetables, bread, meat, clothing, furniture, light, heat, water, school books, medicine, the services of physicians, dentists, and other professional men, and many other things, become necessary to the health, comfort, or convenience of such workmen and their families; but the right and power to supply such wants had, in this instance, so far as the pleas show, no direct relation or connection with the successful prosecution of the specific object of the appellee corporation. The relation was but remote, indirect, and mediate,—not direct and immediate. Implied power cannot be invoked to authorize a corporation to engage in collateral enterprises but remotely connected with the specific purposes it was created to accomplish. A power which a corporation may exercise by implication must be bounded by the purposes of the corporate existence and the terms and intention of the charter, and acts which tend only remotely and by indirection to promote its interest and chartered objects cannot be justified by implication of law, but are ultra vires.

Cases cited holding that corporations operating mines or mills engaged in sawing lumber had implied power to construct dwellings and boarding houses for their employees can have little or no influence upon the question here presented. In those cases the fact that the works or mills of the corporations were necessarily located at mines or near large forests, and other circumstances peculiar to the respective cases, were deemed sufficient to justify the corporations in arranging for the lodging or boarding of their workmen or in building homes to shelter them and their families. The circumstances in each of such cases as can be accepted as having been well considered were such that it became, in a legal sense, necessary to the accomplishment of the chartered purposes of the corporation that it should exercise such power as was accorded it by implication of law. Exceptional circumstances or extraordinary conditions may make it necessary to the proper prosecution of the business of a corporation that it shall be accorded implied power to perform acts beyond its express power, and which, except for the prevailing conditions, would be wholly unwarranted. But in the case in hand the appellee corporation voluntarily assumed to devote its corporate capital and power to that which, to say the least, but remotely and indirectly tended to aid the accomplishment of the purposes it had the right to pursue under conditions and circumstances which were neither rare nor unusual.

The argument of counsel for appellee that the construction of the manufacturing plant involved, not the expediency simply, but the necessity, of providing places suitable for the occupancy of those who were to do its work, "and that in view of this the company determined to undertake, and did undertake, to construct its works and dwelling places for its workmen at the same time and as a part of a single harmonious plan," is fallacious. It ignores the palpable fact that no duty of providing houses for its workmen was pressed upon the company by surrounding conditions or circumstances as a necessity, but was adopted as a matter of choice, based, it may have been, upon motives which were, in part, benevolent or charitable in their nature. Had it purchased only that quantity of ground needful for its proper corporate uses, and restricted its efforts and expenditures to the construction of such buildings as would have answered its corporate wants, there appears to us no reason to believe that the question of homes for its workmen, market places or stores where such workmen could purchase supplies, or school rooms where their children could receive instruction, or the making of streets and alleys, would ever have demanded the thought or attention of its governing body. It is beyond reason to conclude that, had the way been left open, private capital and individual enterprise would have overlooked this desirable field of operations, or that merchants, tradesmen, butchers, and other classes of business men would not have appeared and entered into business rivalry for the custom of the workmen and their families, and that the prosecution of the business of the corporation would have suffered because its workmen could not find homes or places where the articles necessary to supply their wants and add to their comfort could be purchased; and yet it is upon this ground it is sought to justify the acts of the corporation which are now under consideration.

The prohibition of the law against the unauthorized exercise of power by corporations is based upon grounds of public policy, and the wisdom of the rule may here find exemplification. Conceding the rectitude of the purpose which it is alleged operated to induce the acts of the corporation which resulted in the creation of the town or city of Pullman, we are constrained to declare the corporation had not lawful power to perform such acts, and that the existence of a town or city where the streets, alleys, school-houses, business houses, sewerage system, hotel, churches, theaters, waterworks, market places, dwellings, and tenements are the exclusive property of a corporation is opposed to good public policy, and incompatible with the theory and spirit of our institutions. It is clearly the theory of our law that streets, alleys, and public ways, and public school buildings, should be committed to the control of the proper public authorities, and that real estate should be kept as fully as possible in the channels of trade and commerce; and good public policy demands that the number of persons who should engage in the business of selling such articles as are necessary to the support, maintenance, and comfort of the people of any community should not be restricted by the will of any person, natural or artificial, but should be left to be determined by the healthy, wholesome, and natural operations of the rules of trade and business, free from all that which tends to stifle competition and foster monopolies. We think the averments of the plea in response to the allegations of the information under consideration were insufficient to present a legal defense.

The information charges, as is shown by the fourteenth allegation, set out in the opening of this opinion, the appellee corporation has constructed, owns, and is operating a sewerage system and a sewerage farm; that it has constructed sewerage pipes so as to receive and convey to the farm the sewage and refuse matter accumulated in and about the residences, tenement houses, and other buildings which it rents in the said city or town of Pullman, and uses said sewerage for the purpose of fertilizing the farm; that the farm consists of 154 acres, and is cultivated by the appellee corporation and large quantities of celery, beets, and other vegetables produced thereon are by the said corporation sold in the city of Chicago, or shipped to other cities for sale. With respect to this sewerage system and the business of gardening or truck farming upon the sewerage farm, the effect of the allegations of the plea is that, having constructed the great number of dwellings, tenement houses, and other buildings, and rented the same to its employees, it became necessary that the corporation should adopt some mode or manner of disposing of the sewage in order to render and keep the said dwellings and buildings in a healthful condition; that it purchased the 154 acres of land in order to enable it to utilize the sewage and refuse matter as a fertilizer, whereby to render the land productive; and that the income from the farm recompenses the corporation in part, and only in part, for the expenses of the sewerage system. But, if we are right in the view hereinbefore expressed, that the action of the corporation in constructing the buildings and dwellings of which the town or city of Pullman is composed was beyond its proper corporate functions, it would necessarily follow that the operation of the sewerage system and the prosecution of the business of farming or truck gardening cannot be justified upon the ground that it was necessary the dwellings and houses of those persons living in the city or town of Pullman should be supplied with such sewerage system. One usurpation of power cannot be seized upon as a justification for the exercise of a further unlawful power.

The information charges that the defendant, in a large number of its cars, carries a stock of whiskies, wines, beers, and other malt and intoxicating liquors, for the purpose of sale to its guests and the occupants of the cars while traveling therein, and sells and disposes of the same at a large pecuniary profit. The defendant, by its plea, admits that it does provide, for people traveling in its cars, supplies of divers kinds of food and drink, including whiskies, wines, beers, and other malt and intoxicating liquors, but avers that it sells the same, under proper licenses from state and general governments, for the purpose of meeting the necessities and demands of its patrons, and contributing to their comfort, and that it makes no profit whatever therefrom, but furnishes said supplies at a pecuniary loss to itself; and claims a right to sell them by virtue of § 4 of its charter, which provides that "the said corporation shall have power to manufacture, construct, and purchase railway cars, with all convenient appendages and supplies for persons traveling therein, and the same may sell or use, or permit to be used, in such manner and upon such terms as the said company may think fit and proper." Express power to sell supplies to persons traveling on its cars must be conceded to the corporation. Are wines and liquors a part of the "supplies" for travelers? No authorities on this subject are cited in the briefs of counsel. Webster defines the word "supply" (plural, "supplies") as "that which supplies a want; sufficiency of things for use or want; specifically . . . the food, and the like, which meets the daily necessities of an army or other large body of men." It would seem that this definition answers the question in the affirmative. Wines and liquors are a part of the supplies which meet the wants of a portion, at least, of the traveling public. They enter into and compose in part the daily meals of many travelers, and are regarded by all such persons, and by others who use them at other times, as wholesome refreshments, contributing to relieve from the fatigue and discomforts of travel. Hence they are supplies for such persons. It is a matter of common knowledge that places for the accommodation and entertainments of travelers, such as hotels and taverns, and steamboats and ocean vessels which carry passengers, almost universally sell to their guests and patrons whiskies, wines, and liquors, and that such things are regarded by a portion of the traveling public, and by those who transport and entertain them, as part of the "supplies" for travelers. We think that the defendant, having, as the plea averred, had license to sell intoxicating liquors, was authorized by its charter to furnish such supplies to persons traveling in its cars, and that the charge in the information is sufficiently answered by the plea.

The information charges that the defendant owns 55 acres of vacant and unoccupied land north of its shops, and that it also owns other vacant and unoccupied land at Pullman to the extent of 16 acres. The defendant's plea avers, as to said 55 acres, that they are now in actual, constant, and necessary use by it for dumping thereon cinders and other refuse from its shops, and will, in the near future, be necessary for further extensions of defendant's manufacturing plant. It clearly appears, the allegations of the plea being taken as true, that this tract of land of 55 acres is devoted to legitimate corporate purposes, whether so actually, constantly, and necessarily used is a question to be determined on the trial of the issue. As to the other vacant and unoccupied land, the plea admits that the defendant owns 23 acres of such land, but avers that said 23 acres are the unoccupied part of a tract of 63 acres, whereon are located its dwellings and tenements, churches, business houses, etc., which are scattered over the whole of the said tract, and in such a way that no particular part of any appreciable size is unoccupied, and that said 23 acres consist of the spaces between said houses; that the land was purchased, and has been and is held, solely to meet the necessity for additional houses and tenements, as the growth of the company's business may require, and in order that the health and comfort of its employees might be conserved by the avoidance of tenements and houses too closely crowded together. Having hereinbefore determined that the erection by the appellee corporation of the dwellings and buildings in the city or town of Pullman was beyond its corporate powers, the conclusion is inevitable that the corporation has no lawful right to hold and own this 23-acre tract "solely to meet the necessity for additional houses and tenements as the growth of its business may require." The demurrer to the allegations of the plea with respect of this tract of lands should have been sustained.

We think it clearly appears from the allegations of the plea that the corporation acquired and owns the 25 acres of land near the Belt Line Railroad for the proper purposes of its existence. It is stated in the plea that many of the cars made by the defendant, and others sent to it to be repaired, are delivered upon the Belt Line Railroad running north of its manufacturing plant; that to receive and properly store said cars while waiting their turn to be repaired, and to properly store them after being built and repaired and while awaiting inspection by railroad companies, it was and is necessary that the defendant should have storage yards or tracks near said railroad at Grand Crossing, about 3 miles from defendant's manufacturing plant, and it accordingly purchased about, and not to exceed, 20 acres of ground near said railroad, and now holds the same for the purpose above mentioned; that it has not, as yet, put any railroad or storage tracks upon said land, because the railroad companies owning tracks in the immediate vicinity have built so many side and storage tracks which can be used for storage purposes; but that it will be necessary, in the near future, for defendant to put tracks upon said 20 acres for storing and switching purposes, as aforesaid, and that it holds said land for such use in its manufacturing business. These averments are admitted by the demurrer, and constitute a complete answer to the charge in the information.

The allegation that the appellee company furnishes the Allen Paper Car-Wheel Company with steam power to operate the machinery of the latter company, and receives a large income therefrom, is fully met by the averments of the plea. The plea avers that when the manufacturing plant of the appellee corporation was built, with a view of anticipating its probable future wants, the company put in a very large system of boilers for generating steam; that the steam power which said boilers are capable of producing will, in the judgment of the corporation, be no more than will be required in the future for the successful operation of the machinery and appliances of the plant of the appellee company, but that up to this time more steam has been generated than the company's uses required, and that the surplus has been furnished to the said Allen Paper Car-Wheel Company, whose shops adjoin the plant of the appellee corporation. It is entirely competent and proper for a corporation to keep in view its probable future wants and necessities, and in constructing its buildings and purchasing machinery to anticipate and provide for that which sound practical judgment and wise forethought indicate will be required by the growth of its business and the extension of the volume of its operations. It being lawful to purchase boilers having a capacity to generate more steam than the immediate needs of the company required, the law has no rule which would require that the excess of steam so provided should not be utilized, but should be allowed to go to waste. It was but true economy, and in no sense a usurpation of power, to dispose of the excess of steam so produced to the Allen Paper Car-Wheel Company.

The pleas admit the appellee company has purchased and holds a majority of the shares of the capital stock of the Pullman Iron & Steel Company, and avers further that said Pullman Iron & Steel Company was never a competitor in business with defendant; that its products constitute a necessary part of the material required in the construction of the cars manufactured by defendant; that all its product is used and consumed by said defendant; and that said corporation is, in effect, a mere department of defendant in its car-manufacturing business although existing nominally as an independent corporation. The right and power of a corporation to become a stockholder in another corporation was presented to this court for determination in the case of People ex rel. Peabody v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319, 22 N. E. 798, and the conclusion arrived at was that a corporation cannot become a stockholder in another corporation unless power to do so is specifically granted in its charter, or necessarily implied from it. The conclusion here announced is the prevailing doctrine in America, and we see no reason to depart from it. Such power is not specifically granted to the appellee corporation, and there is no room for the contention that it is possessed as an implied power. The decision of the circuit court ousting the appellee from the right to hold capital stock in the Pullman Iron & Steel Company was correct, and is affirmed.

The defense of acquiescence and waiver has been set up in the case, in the sixth plea. That part of the plea is as follows: "Defendant further avers that said manufacturing plant, houses, and all other improvements in the town of Pullman, and all the real estate in this plea described, were acquired by defendant, and said buildings were erected, in and about the year A. D. 1880, and not later than the year A. D. 1882, and defendant has been in continuous use thereof, in manner above described, ever since; and defendant avers that all of its said acts have been well known to plaintiff ever since said last-mentioned date, and the doings of defendant in regard thereto were a special subject of investigation, report, and approval by the legislature of the state of Illinois since said last-mentioned date, and that defendant has, during all of said time, been taxed by the municipal and state taxing authorities of Illinois, and in, to wit, A. D. 1891, the legislature of Illinois appointed a committee thereof to investigate the property of defendant, and ascertain if it was properly taxed on all its property; that said committee examined all defendant's property, including all the property mentioned in this plea, and reported to said legislature concerning said holdings of property by defendant, and that its property was all properly taxed, which report was accepted and approved by said legislature, whereby any fault that the defendant may have committed in regard thereto has been acquiesced in or waived by the plaintiff."

It is conceded, the state, acting in its character as a sovereign, is not bound by any statute of limitations or technical estoppel. It is urged, however, that in quo warranto, under the common-law rule, the courts, in the exercise of their discretion to grant the writ or not, or upon final hearing, refused aid when the conditions complained of had existed for a number of years with knowledge on the part of the sovereign, and that the provisions of § 1 of chapter 112 of the Revised Statutes, entitled Quo Warranto, that leave to file the information shall be given if the court or judge to whom the petition is presented shall be satisfied there is probable cause for the proceeding, leave the court still possessed of power to consider upon the hearing, and then apply the same doctrine of waiver and acquiescence. It is the general rule that laches, acquiescence, or unreasonable delay in the performance of duty on the part of the officers of the state, is not imputable to the state when acting in its character as a sovereign. There are exceptions to this general rule, but we are unable to see that the allegations of the plea bring the case within the principles of any such exceptions. The case of Trustees of Schools v. Union District, 88 Ill. 100, was a writ of certiorari to test the validity of the act of detaching territory from one school district, and attaching it to another; and the case of People ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Boyd, 132 Ill. 60, 23 N. E. 342, to test the legality of the formation of a school district by the consolidation of two other districts. These cases are relied upon by appellee. In each of them the doctrine of acquiescence or laches was applied, upon the ground, to quote from the opinion in the former of the cases, "because these bodies [the school directors] exercise powers in which the people at large are concerned, and great public detriment or inconvenience might result from interfering with their proceedings;" and the reason which operated to control the decision in the latter case is that public policy forbade that such writ should be granted to test the validity of the organization of corporations exercising governmental power, after such corporations had been acting de facto for a considerable length of time. The ground of decision is the same in each case, 64 L. R. A.

namely, that public policy forbids the interference upon the part of the state with corporations created for the purpose of exercising governmental functions, unless application is made to the courts before the public interests become involved. The cases have no application here. The case of King v. Dawes, 1 W. Bl. 634, also cited in behalf of the appellee, involved the title to the offices of burgesses of the borough of Winchelsea, and the relators were private informers. The writs were refused upon the ground the informers were private individuals, and knew the alleged disqualifications of the defendants, and had long acquiesced in their official incumbency of the offices, and also upon the same grounds which found operation in the Illinois cases,—that the public consequences "to the borough" forbade the issuing of the writs upon grounds of public policy. Where the design of the writ of quo warranto is to procure a declaration of forfeiture of the charter of a corporation upon the ground it has failed to perform some act the performance of which constituted a condition precedent to its legal organization or upon the ground the organization of the corporation was defective, or where the corporation was formed by the consolidation of two other corporations, and it was alleged the consolidation was irregular or defective in some particular, the state may be deemed to have waived the right to complain of the omission, failure, or irregularity affecting the existence of the corporation by an enactment of the legislature expressly curing or obviating the grounds of complaint, or directly recognizing the corporation as entitled to exercise corporate functions, after the failure, omission, or defect complained of had become known, or such waiver may be deemed to exist from long-continued failure of the judicial department of the government to enforce the forfeiture. The principle is the sovereign shall not be allowed to deny that a de facto corporation is a corporation de jure if the corporation has attempted to perfect a legal organization, but has failed to comply with some condition precedent, or has failed to proceed regularly and lawfully in some other respect touching its organization, if the sovereignty from which came the grant authorizing the formation of the corporation had knowledge of such failure, and, by the express act of the legislature, remits the penalty of forfeiture, or recognizes the corporation as legally organized and lawfully exercising corporate functions, or if the judicial department of such sovereign omits, for an unreasonable time, to enforce the forfeiture.

We have examined the various cases cited by counsel for appellee as in support of the defense of waiver and acquiescence in the case at bar, and do not find that in any of them the defense has been deemed available, as against the sovereign or state, except in cases where the right and title of a corporation to corporate existence was questioned because of some defect in the original charter, irregularity in the proceedings for the organization of the corporation, or its failure to perform or fulfil some condition precedent to its legal organization. In such cases, if the conduct of the sovereign be such as to constitute an admission of knowledge of the defect or omission, and a declaration that forfeiture is not insisted upon, it will be deemed, as in other breaches of conditions, the right to declare the forfeiture for such default, omission, or breach has been waived, or, in such cases, forfeiture may be denied on the ground of acquiescence arising from long and unreasonable failure of the judicial department to test the legal organization and existence of the corporation. In the case at bar the appellee is conceded to be a corporation de jure, and the complaint is it had assumed and exercised, and is assuming and exercising, powers not granted by its charter or implied by law. We find from its pleas the corporation is without lawful authority to perform the acts complained of; that it entered upon the performance of such acts in 1880 or 1881, in pursuance of a fully matured plan; that it has since continuously engaged in this unjustifiable undertaking, and was so engaged when the information was filed; and that it owns a tract of land 23 acres in extent, which it is holding for the express purpose of building thereon other dwellings and tenement houses, opening streets, alleys, etc., and extending said town or city of Pullman over said tract of land. The usurpations of the corporation are not only those of the past, but also those of the present, and its plea admits it contemplates a repetition of the offenses in the future.

Our interpretation of the law, as applied to facts appearing from the averment of the pleas, is that the appellee corporation, at and before the time of the filing of the information, was exercising powers and performing acts not authorized either by the express grant of the charter or any implication of law; and, further, that, by some of such unauthorized acts, the corporation assumes and exercises powers and functions which the general law of the state contemplates shall be possessed and exercised only by municipal authorities of cities or towns and the public school authorities; and that other of its unauthorized acts tend to restrain competition in various branches of trade, to remove real estate from the operation of our statute of descent, and place the title thereto in a corporation having perpetual succession and unending existence, and thereby withdraw it from the channel of trade and commerce; to create monopolies in the business of selling the necessities and comforts of life; and that its acts and doings are opposed to good public policy. We do not think the demand of the sovereign that usurpations so clearly antagonistic to good public policy shall be restrained can be defeated by any imputation of laches, or upon the ground that acquiescence is to be inferred from the failure to invoke the aid of courts at an early day.

Nor do the averments of the plea with reference to the acts of the general assembly present a ground of defense. If the general assembly of the state has, by a later enactment, extended the power of the corporation, the enactment should have been pleaded as was the original charter. The averment, "The doings of the corporation in regard thereto [the acts complained of] were the special subject of investigation and report,"—is but pleading matter of conclusion, and availed nothing by way of defense. Whether held by virtue of its express or implied power, or by usurpation, all the real property in question was properly subject to assessment for purposes of taxation. The duties of a committee appointed by the legislature to investigate the property of the corporation, and ascertain if all of its property was properly subjected to taxation, did not involve an investigation into the title or right by which the corporation claimed to hold the real estate; and the approval by the general assembly of the report of such a committee that the property of the corporation was properly taxed would not amount to the concession on the part of the state that the corporation had a right to acquire the title to the real estate in question; nor is it sufficient to show the state had knowledge that the real estate had been acquired without lawful power, and therefore held to constitute legislative recognition and waiver of the acts of usurpation.

Our conclusion therefore is, the court erred in overruling the demurrer to such of the pleas or parts of pleas as were pleaded in response to, and as in defense of, the charges in the information which are set forth in this opinion as Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 19, 22, and 24 and that otherwise the ruling of the court upon the demurrer was correct.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the Circuit Court to sustain the demurrer to the pleas as hereinbefore indicated, and in other respects to overrule the same, and to proceed further as may be in conformity with this opinion.

Craig, Wilkin, and Cartwright, JJ., dissenting:

We do not concur in the foregoing opinion adopted by the majority of the court. The principal charges of usurpation made against appellee consist in the construction of dwelling houses sufficient for the comfortable occupancy of its employees; maintaining and furnishing, without charge to its employees, parks, flower beds, recreation grounds, and other like means of enjoyment; building and furnishing to them rooms for a public library, free of rent, and churches, a lecture room, theater, and concert hall at a nominal sum; owning rooms rented to the board of education for schools, and rooms for the sale of groceries and necessities, and furnishing heat, light, and water to some of the occupants, and providing for proper sewerage. The extent to which these things are done, and their purpose and connection with the successful prosecution of the business which appellee was chartered to carry on, are set out in the amended pleas, and substantially stated in the foregoing opinion. The matters so alleged in the pleas are admitted by the demurrers to be true, and, if they show the acts complained of to be reasonably necessary in order to enable appellee to carry into effect the powers expressly granted to it, and to enable it to accomplish the purposes of its creation, then they are within its implied powers, and no less lawful than those expressly authorized.

By its charter the defendant is vested with all powers, rights, privileges, and immunities incident to corporations, and necessary or useful for the purposes of the incorporation; with power to manufacture, construct, and purchase railway cars, with all convenient appendages and supplies for persons traveling therein, and the same to sell or use, or permit to be used, in such manner and upon such terms as the company may think fit and proper; and to purchase, acquire, and hold such real estate as may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of the business of the company, and to sell and convey the same. The trial court, in its opinion, quotes with approval—and we concur in such approval—the general rules and principles of law applicable to the matter of the implied powers of corporations as they are stated in the brief of counsel for appellee. That statement is as follows: “It is axiomatic that corporations have not only the powers expressly granted, but those which are necessarily implied; that, while they derive all their powers from the legislature which creates them, it is also true that what is fairly implied is as certainly granted as what is expressed; that, unless restrained by their charters, they have the power to deal precisely, in carrying out the 64 L. R. A.

corporate purposes, as individuals seeking to accomplish the same ends; that they may resort to any means that would be necessary and proper for an individual in executing the same, unless they be prohibited by the terms of their charters or some public law from so doing;’ that while, in regard to their express powers, the grants are construed most liberally in favor of the state and most strictly against the corporation, yet, in regard to incidental powers, neither strict nor liberal, but only reasonable, rules of construction are applied; that corporations may so far develop and extend their operations as to engage in matters not primarily contemplated by their founders, provided these matters be fairly within their scope, and provided, also, that in so developing and extending their undertakings they employ direct, and not indirect, means; that different rules of construction are to be applied to charters of corporations organized under special acts and those organized under a general law, the greater strictness of interpretation being employed in dealing with the latter; that ‘necessary,’ when used in defining the powers of corporations, does not mean what is simply indispensable, but also what is useful, convenient, and proper to carry into effect the franchises granted. Y. 9, it was held that corporations, along with their specific powers, take all the reasonable means of execution,—all that are convenient and adapted to the end in view, that the corporation has a liberty of choice among those means; and that if, in the exercise of such liberty, an intelligent good faith is used, then the power to select the means adopted cannot be called in question. In State, New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., Prosecutors, v. Hancock, 35 N. J. L. 537, it was said by Chief Justice Beasley: “Power necessary to a corporation does not mean simply power which is indispensable. Such phraseology has never been interpreted in so narrow a sense. There are few powers which are, in the strict sense, absolutely necessary to those artificial persons; and to concede to them powers only of such a character, while it might not entirely paralyze, would very greatly embarrass, their operations. Such, in similar cases, has never been the legal acceptance of this term. A power which is obviously appropriate and convenient to carry into effect the franchise granted has always been deemed a necessary one." And further said: "The term comprises a grant of the right to use all the means suitable and proper to accomplish the end which the legislature had in view at the time of the enactment of the charter." There is a substantial agreement in the authorities as to the general doctrine of the implied powers of corporations. That doctrine has been stated in various forms, but they amount, in substance, to one and the same thing. As formulated in the brief of appellant, it is as follows: "A corporation can only exercise such powers as may be conferred upon it by the legislative body creating it, either in express terms or by necessary implication; and the implied powers are presumed to exist to enable it to carry out the express powers granted." In the case of almost every corporation its implied powers are more numerous and of greater importance than those expressly granted in its charter. No rule can be stated by which can be determined with exactness just what the limits of the implied powers of corporations are. These limits depend largely upon the nature of the corporation, its necessities, and the surrounding circumstances. While grants of power are strictly construed as to those expressly granted, yet in executing such express powers the corporation has an implied authority to carry such express powers into full effect, and for that purpose may adopt any means, not prohibited by law, that are necessary, usual, convenient, reasonable, or suitable for accomplishing the objects of the incorporation; and in respect to these implied powers the rule of strict construction that obtains in the case of an express grant of power has no application, but the rule of a reasonable construction prevails.

Principal among the express objects for which the defendant was incorporated was that of manufacturing and constructing railway cars, with all convenient appendages; and for the accomplishment of such purpose it was expressly given power to purchase, acquire, and hold "such real estate as may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of their business," and, along with it, "all powers, rights, privileges, and immunities incident to corporations, and necessary or useful" for the accomplishment of such purpose. We have seen that the rule is that, while a corporation can exercise no powers other than those conferred by its charter, and cannot engage in any separate and unauthorized business, yet that it has a right of selection as to the means to be used in carrying into effect the expressly delegated powers, the only restriction being that they shall be necessary, in the sense of being suitable, convenient, and reasonable and not in contravention of any rule of law. In the leading case of M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 413, 4 L. ed. 603, it is said by Chief Justice Marshall, among other things, that to employ the means necessary to an end is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end, and not as being confined to those single means without which the end would be entirely unattainable; that it is essential to just construction that many words which import something excessive should be understood in a more mitigated sense,—in that sense which common usage justifies; that the word "necessary" is of this description; that it has not a fixed character peculiar to itself, but admits of all degrees of comparison, and is often connected with other words which increase or diminish the impression the mind receives of the urgency it imports. In the case now at bar the power given the defendant by the sixth section of its charter is not simply to purchase, acquire, and hold such real estate as may be necessary for the purposes of the incorporation, but such "as may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of their business." It would seem, from the rule, that it is not to be presumed that the legislature used idle and useless words, and from the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall in the case above mentioned, that some force and effect should be given to the words "deemed" and "successful," used in said act. Without these words, the act gave to the defendant the right to purchase, acquire, and hold, not only such real estate as was absolutely indispensable for the purposes of the corporation, but also such as was useful, convenient, reasonable, and proper in the conduct of the business for which it was incorporated. The use of the words mentioned, even if it does not otherwise amplify the power, is at least an indication of an affirmative legislative intention that the corporation should have and exercise some degree of discretion in respect to the amount of real estate it should acquire and hold; the same to be, as matter of course, not an unlimited and unbridled discretion, but a discretion to be exercised in good faith and within reasonable limits.

It appears from the pleas, admitted to be true, that the work of construction was completed in the year 1881, and since that time appellee has carried on its business and exercised the powers now claimed, and the dwelling houses have been occupied by a population of about 10,000 people. It was a conspicuous movement, which attracted general attention and widespread discussion. The provision made by appellee for those in its employment and their families, both as to dwellings and surroundings contributing to their comfort and elevation, was well and generally understood. The plan was carried on for fourteen years, and the powers in question were exercised without attack or question from the state. The charges now brought against it seem to be incited by its proportions and great business success, rather than because of any sound legal objection. From the fact that it satisfactorily supplied a necessity consequent upon the rapid development of a new country and the increase of commerce and travel occasioned by the building of railroads, and by means of wise and discreet management, and the adoption of economical methods of business, it has, in a comparatively few years, grown from a company with $100,000 of capital stock to a large, wealthy, and prosperous corporation, with a capital stock of $36,000,000, and with an amount and value of real estate and other property commensurate with the amount of capital it has invested and the extensive business in which it is engaged. If the various implied powers that it has availed of had been exercised by a less wealthy and pretentious corporation, it is hardly probable that the right to exercise such powers would ever have been called in question. In fact, it seems to us that the only difference in that regard between those used by the corporation now at bar and those which are and long have been exercised by the numerous mining companies, lumber companies, manufacturing companies and other companies incorporated and doing business in this state, is a difference that is not based upon any sound legal distinction, but merely one that arises from the vast amount of business done by the defendant. The difference is merely as to the extent to which it has become necessary or expedient to use such implied powers. If a lumber company, with a few thousand dollars of capital stock, may, without express power in that regard, and under and by virtue of its implied powers, construct a dozen or twenty frame dwellings for the use of the employees at its sawmill, and if a coal mining company, with a comparatively small capital stock, may in like manner build fifty or a hundred houses and cottages to be occupied by the families of those who work in its mines, it is difficult to see why, upon principle, the defendant, if the nature and magnitude of its business reasonably require it, may not construct 2,200 buildings and tenements suitable for the occupancy of the class of workmen that the nature of its business requires. And if the lumber or mining company, not for the purposes of profit, but merely for the accommodation of its workmen, and for the purpose of inducing them to enter and remain in its employment, can build a log schoolhouse in which the children of its employees may be educated, or church in which such employees and their families may worship, it is not perceived why, upon principle, the defendant has not the implied power to do all that it has done or is doing in respect to the schoolhouses and churches of which complaint is made. It is a matter of common and general knowledge that in this state, and continuously from the days of the earliest development of its resources, lumber and sawmill companies, mining companies, manufacturing companies, and other like corporations have, without question, constructed and used, not for purposes of speculation in real estate, but as a necessary and convenient means for carrying on the several kinds of business for which they were respectively incorporated, houses to be used by their servants and employees as habitations for themselves and their families; and hotels and boarding houses for the accommodation of such servants and employees as had no families, and of such other persons as were temporarily called, for the purpose of transacting business with such corporations, to the localities where their business was being carried on; and structures to be used as churches or schoolhouses for the benefit of their employees, their families and children. There is no difference between what always has been done and is still being done by these various corporations and that which this defendant has done and is still doing, except this: That, owing to the very large and extensive proportions to which the plant and business of the defendant have grown, a much larger number of houses and tenements is required for the accommodation of its employees, and that, owing to the fact that the best class of skill and labor is necessary in the construction of its products, and the proximity of the plant to a large city, a better class of tenements, supplied with more of the conveniences and comforts of life, is required in order to attract and obtain such better class of skilled employees.

In Vermont C. R. Co. v. Burlington, 28 Vt. 193, a question of the exemption of certain property of the company from taxation was raised. The court held that only such of said property as the company was authorized to take without the consent of the owner was so exempt, but in their opinion said: "They may at the same time hold, by gift or grant, woodland for fuel, or land on which to erect tenements for those under their employment, and for various other purposes connected with the use of the road, and to which that exemption does not apply."

In State, Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co., Prosecutors, v. Mansfield, 23 N. J. L. 513, 57 Am. Dec. 409, the railroad company owned houses and lots which were let by it to its workmen and employees, and the question involved was the right of exemption from taxation. The court decided against the claimed exemption, but in its opinion recognized the right of the corporation "to purchase land and to erect houses in the right location and of the right kind for all their constant employees."

In Crawford v. Longstreet, 43 N. J. L. 325, the question was as to the right of a turnpike company to lease and use premises on which was a house occupied by its servants and other conveniences used by the company. The court held that such right was one of the implied powers of the corporation, and said that, while a habitation for the company's servants and laborers was not strictly indispensable, yet "that such an arrangement was convenient, useful, and essential to the proper management of its business scarcely admits of denial."

In Locey Coal Mines v. Chicago, W. & V. Coal Co. 131 Ill. 9, 8 L. R. A. 598, 22 N. E. 503, the right of the coal company to own the property there in question was not raised or specifically involved, but the court in its opinion distinctly recognizes that the thirty dwelling houses, boarding houses, storehouse, and various other buildings connected with the mines were properly a part of its property, and "desirable and necessary for carrying on its business of mining and selling coal."

In Moss v. Rossie Lead Min. Co. 5 Hill, 137, the company was incorporated "for the purpose of raising and smelting lead ore at Rossie." It first engaged only in the business of raising ore, the smelting being done by Moss & Knapp. It subsequently bought the property of Moss & Knapp, which included a house and lot, 50 acres of improved land, on which were several houses used as residences for workmen, stoves in the houses, a building which had been occupied as a store, a schoolhouse, a threshing machine, etc. In the opinion of the court it is said: "If articles bought by a corporation cannot possibly be of any use in the line of corporate business, but the purchase is necessarily an excess of power, a question might be 64 L. R. A. raised on that ground. Yet in dealing with corporations created for manufacturing purposes, who that does not make a part of them shall be holden to penetrate the ramifications of their business so far as to fix the boundary of possible utility? Such a company as the defendants' must have lands, houses, and wood, as well as mines, machinery, and utensils. They may resort to all the ordinary means of paying workmen and providing them and their families with residences; and who would deny, in this country of schools, that they may pay by providing schoolhouses and school masters for the children of workmen?"

In the subsequent case of Moss v. Averell, 10 N. Y. 449, which involved the same facts as those in the case last cited, and which also involved the question of ultra vires, it was said: "The purchase of the property of Moss & Knapp, for which the notes in question were given, was within the scope of the legitimate business of the company. . . . They did not embark in any other business than that for which they were incorporated. The property they purchased had been got together by Moss & Knapp for the smelting business, and nothing else, and was necessary to carry on that business. It was situated in a new country, at a distance from any village, and required for the accommodation of their hands the erection of suitable habitations. The country was a wilderness, and had to be cleared. The men and animals employed by them had to be supported. If they raised a little grain on their clearings, it must be harvested and prepared for food, or it would be lost." And further said: "One of the shanties had been used by Moss & Knapp as a schoolhouse for the children of their men. Whether it was so used at the time of the purchase does not appear. It would have been no objection to the validity of the sale had it been at that time devoted to so laudable an object."

In Searight v. Payne, 6 Lea, 283, the Worley Furnace Company, an incorporated iron company, owned and operated a "supply store" in connection with its furnace, and which was not expressly authorized by the company's charter. The court held that it might be fairly included in the powers of the corporation.

In Texas & St. L. R. Co. v. Robards, 60 Tex. 546, 48 Am. Rep. 268, it was held that the railroad company might, under the circumstances of that case, make a contract for the building of an hotel. Among other things the court said: "The power of a corporation to contract extends, not merely to such subjects as are absolutely essential or indispensable to the performance of specified acts authorized by its charter, but also to such (not being prohibited by law, nor against public policy) as are designed and may be useful in promoting the main enterprise."

In Watts's Appeal, 78 Pa. 370, the right of a land and improvement company, under the circumstances of that case, to erect an hotel, was sustained.

Section 362 of Morawetz on Private Corporations, 2d ed., is as follows: "It is a well-established general rule that a corporation may carry on the business for which it was chartered, in the manner in which a business of that particular kind is usually carried on. What the usual manner of carrying on a business is cannot be determined by the application of purely legal principles. It is a question of fact, and not a question of law. Evidently, therefore, it is impossible to decide abstractly that acts of a particular description are within or without the chartered powers of a corporation. The right of a corporation to perform an act depends, in every case, upon all the surrounding circumstances. No act is authorized under all circumstances and facts can be conceived which would render almost any act justifiable. Thus, a railroad company may usually buy coal and material for constructing its road; but it would have no authority to buy coal, or anything else, as a speculation, with the intention of selling it again. On the other hand, it would clearly be unauthorized, under any ordinary state of facts, to use the funds of a railroad company for building a church or theater; yet this use of the corporate funds might be entirely justifiable if a church or theater were required for the use of the company's workmen, in a part of the world where no church or suitable place of recreation was accessible."

Norwich v. Norfolk R. Co. 4 El. & Bl. 397, was a case in which one of the pleas raised the question of the implied powers of the corporation. The question of ultra vires, however, was not decided by the court, as the decision of the case turned on another ground. The four judges delivered separate opinions, from two of which we quote, on account of the applicability of the language used to the case now at bar. Coleridge, J., said: "When one considers the immense extension and increase of corporate bodies in modern times, the vast variety of purposes for which they are created, the complication of circumstances under which they are to act, the liability to error in the formation of prospective plans as to detail, and the ever arising improvements in the means and appliances of mechanics and science, it would seem that public convenience and policy, as well as good sense and justice, require that, within the limits of a substantial adherence to purpose, the empowering clauses of incorporating instruments should be construed largely and liberally, so as not to defeat the purpose by a too narrow restriction of the means." And Erle, J., in reasoning to his conclusion that the act complained of was not ultra vires said: "The question put in the course of the argument, Would a contract by a railway company for a theater or chapel be void? exemplifies the doctrine. It would or it would not, according as the purpose of the contracting parties was or was not connected with the railway. It might be a speculation, separate from the railway, and prohibited; or, if works were wanted in a waste place, and the company found it to be for its interest to build a town, and supply it with all requisites for inhabitation, and, in order to secure a permanent supply of workmen of skill and responsibility, added a chapel and a theater, with religious and secular instruction, it might be for the purpose of the railway, and valid, and, though distantly connected, the outlay might be found eventually to increase the profit from the traffic."

In view of these authorities and expressions of judicial opinion, and in the light of the custom that has always prevailed, and still prevails, in this state with corporations organized for mining, lumber, and manufacturing purposes, we are of the opinion that the powers now under consideration, exercised by the defendant in the prosecution of its legitimate business, while they may go to almost or quite the full extent of implied powers that it is authorized to use, still do not, under the circumstances under which it has been placed, and under which it now does business, amount to usurpations of power of which the state has the right to make complaint.

As already suggested, it is admitted by the demurrers to the pleas that the matters alleged therein are true. The statements thus admitted preclude any conclusion that defendant built the houses and tenements, church, schoolhouses, and other structures at Pullman for purposes of speculation or investment, but, on the contrary, show that all that has been done by it in that behalf has been in furtherance of its business of manufacturing, selling, and operating railroad cars. In considering as to whether particular acts of a corporation are within its implied powers, it is necessary to consider, not only the purposes for which it was chartered, but also the particular circumstances under which it is called upon to act. As said by Morawetz in the quotation above made from his work on Private Corporations: "The right of a corporation to perform an act depends, in every case, upon all the surrounding circumstances. No act is authorized under all circumstances, and facts can be conceived which would render almost any act justifiable." If we take the case at bar,—that of a car-manufacturing company,—and, without any explanation therefor, and as an isolated fact, find that it has erected a church, a schoolhouse, or a building to be used as a meat market or family grocery store, it might appear that the building of such church, schoolhouse, meat market, or storehouse was not within the implied powers of the company. If, however, we take into view a large corporation, in the successful prosecution of whose business the labor of thousands of skilled workmen is required, and which is confessedly pursuing the objects of its incorporation, and then find that its plant, for reasons of such cogency as are set forth in the pleas herein, was located at a place where there were no churches, schools, or stores, and that, in order to attract to it and hold the best and most skilled class of workmen and artisans, the labor of such class of operatives being absolutely essential for the work in which it was engaged, it should erect a schoolhouse, church building, house to be used for stores and family supply shops of various kinds, and other like necessary accommodations, and that it did so, not for the purpose of speculating in real estate, or of merely making a remunerative investment of capital, but in good faith for the purpose of promoting the success of its authorized business of manufacturing and dealing in railway cars, then the erection of such structures may fairly be considered to be within the implied powers of the company.

The foregoing authorities and reasonings apply with equal force to all the various uses to which the Arcade building and Market hall, erected by defendant, are devoted, and to the 50 acres of land, of which a part is used by defendant's employees as recreation grounds, with their appliances for athletic exercises, a part for pleasure grounds and park, with greenhouse and other like accessories, and the remainder for streets and alleys.

There can be no question but that it was fully within the powers of the defendant to construct a gas plant for the purpose of furnishing light in the buildings which it used in its manufacturing business, a water tower and mains for supplying its various shops with water, and a plant for generating steam to be used in manufacturing its products and in heating its shops. This being so, it is difficult to perceive any sound reason why it might not use any surplus gas that was produced for the purpose of lighting its own buildings occupied by its own employees; or why a small percentage of the water that passed through its water tower and mains, that could not be utilized for strictly manufacturing purposes, might not be furnished to such employees so occupying said houses, and who could not get a supply of water in any other way; or why it might not apply any surplus steam that it generated, to heating such houses, or sell the same for a valuable consideration to some other person or corporation.

In Brown v. Winnisimmet Co. 11 Allen, 326, which involved the right of a ferry company to lease a steamboat which it did not at that time require for use in its own business, the court held that such act was not ultra vires, and said, referring to a manufacturing company by way of illustration: "But no one could doubt that it would be within the scope of its powers to allow another person or corporation, for a reasonable compensation, to draw surplus water from its millpond, or to employ that portion of its steam power which was not required for its own use." Holding the same principle are Lafond v. Deeme, 81 N. Y. 508, and Simpson v. Westminster Palace Hotel Co. 8 H. L. Cas. 712, 6 Jur. N. S. 985, 2 L. T. N. S. 707. In Lyde v. Eastern Bengal R. Co. 36 Beav. 10, it was held that, if the use of a boat by the railway company was really to assist the traffic on the existing railway, it was lawful and proper, but that, if the object was to extend the traffic to places beyond the railway, which the railway was never intended to reach, then it was illegal and beyond the powers of the company; and the court said that a railway company, for the purpose of obtaining coals cheaper than by purchase, might operate a coal mine, and that it might obtain a profit by the sale of such coals as were not required for the use of the company, provided the principle object of the colliery was to supply itself with coal, and not the selling of coals.

If the defendant, in addition to its right of constructing shops in which to conduct the business of manufacturing railway cars, had also the implied power to erect such dwelling houses as were necessary to furnish residences and homes for its employees and their families, and buildings and stores in which could be kept and sold such supplies and provisions as were necessary for their maintenance and sustenance, and halls and other places in which they might worship and their children be educated, and halls and grounds that they might use for purposes of exercise, recreation, and amusement, then, of course, from the very necessity of the case, it had and has the right to own and hold such real estate as is reasonably required for the purpose of placing thereon the various structures and other things above mentioned. And, as we have already seen, among the powers expressly granted to defendant in its charter are these: "To purchase, acquire, and hold such real estate as may be deemed necessary for the successful prosecution of their business," and the privilege of exercising "all powers, rights, privileges, and immunities incident to corporations and necessary or useful for the purposes of the act." When the defendant built its shops and dwelling houses at Pullman, it had the right, as incident to its right to build the same,—and, indeed, it became its duty,—to devise some means to carry off the sewage from said shops and houses, in order to insure their cleanliness, and to guard the health of the workmen and their families. It was competent for the defendant to employ the means best adapted to that purpose, and if, in carrying out the plan adopted, it became necessary to purchase land on which to empty the sewage, it was within its power to do so. Possession of the land was essential, for it could not otherwise exercise its right to drain off the sewage in the best and most effective manner. The fact that the defendant sees fit to utilize said land by raising vegetables thereon is of little importance. At all events, it is sufficiently answered by the averment in the plea that it raises and sells the same for the purpose of helping to defray the expense of maintaining its sewerage system, which it only in part pays. This is merely the exercise of sound business judgment and economy in not letting go to waste what may be made productive.

There is nothing in these pleas which leads us to believe that public policy would be in any manner served by destroying the plan carried on without objection from the state for fourteen years, resulting in no wrong or injury to anyone. Appellee does not now, and never did, manage or operate the churches, schools, or stores, nor have any interest in them, and never attempted to exercise any control in public or municipal affairs. The streets are public highways, and the school buildings are under the control and management of the board of education of the city of Chicago for school purposes, under arrangements satisfactory to them. We are not prepared to condemn as usurpations of power the furnishing by appellee to its employees of comfortable and attractive homes, with the surroundings of parks, churches, and public library, not for motives of investment or gain, but, as alleged and admitted, with the object of appealing to the better and more skillful workmen, and securing and retaining them in its employment.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Sol ABRAHAM, Appt.,

OREGON & CALIFORNIA RAILROAD

(37 Or. 495.)

1. Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a grant of land for "all legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouse purposes" was intended not to authorize the use of the land for the purpose of a hotel or eating house.
2. The use of land for the erection and maintenance by railway companies of hotels and eating stations along their roads for the use and accommodation of their employees and passengers is a legitimate railroad purpose only when they are reasonably necessary for the convenience of such persons.
3. Injury must be shown, to authorize recovery of damages for breach of contract to permit the taking from a tank of all water not required for certain purposes, by the application of the water to purposes not covered by the agreement.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Douglas County refusing to enjoin defendants from maintaining a hotel upon their property. Reversed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

The first cause of suit, in substance, is: That on the 28th of February, 1883, the plaintiff and W. R. Willis conveyed to the defendant the Oregon & California Railroad Company certain premises described in the complaint, by an ordinary warranty deed, the habendum clause of which is as follows: "To have and to hold the same, with all the privileges and appurtenances there-to belonging, to the said railroad company, its successors and assigns, forever, for the purpose of building and maintaining a railroad thereon, and to use the same for all legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouse purposes." At the time of the execution of the deed the plaintiff and Willis were the owners of a large tract of land at what is now known as "Glendale," in Douglas county, and adjoining the land conveyed to the railroad company, which they subsequently laid off and platted as a town; and soon thereafter the plaintiff, who in the meantime had succeeded to Willis's interest, constructed and built thereon a hotel adequate to the wants and conveniences of the passengers of the defendant company, the traveling public, and local custom. Thereafter, and on or about the 1st of July, 1887, the Oregon & California Railroad Company leased to the defendant the Southern Pacific Company all of its railroad and railroad properties in the state of Oregon, including the depot grounds at Glendale, and on or about the 1st of August, 1887, the Southern Pacific Company leased to the defendant Clarke a portion of the land conveyed to the Oregon & California Railroad Company by the deed of February 28, 1883, "and has caused, procured, and suffered said defendant Clarke to erect thereon a hotel for the accommodation of the general public, and incidentally as an eating house for the passengers upon the trains of the Southern Pacific Company, and the said defendant Clarke is now, and ever since to the 1st day of October, 1897, has been, carrying on and conducting upon the said leased premises a hotel for the accommodation of the traveling public and local custom; the said Southern Pacific Company having caused, procured, and suffered a hotel building to be erected and maintained upon said leased premises for that purpose. That the principal business of said hotel and eating house so erected and maintained is the local custom and patronage of an ordinary and general hotel incident to the town of Glendale. That it derives some support from the passengers of the Southern Pacific Company, but said support is not its principal business. That the trains of said Southern Pacific Company do not stop at said station of Glendale regularly for meals, and have never done so since the erection of said hotel, and but rarely stop for meals, and then only when its trains are at least 1½ hours late. That the said Southern Pacific Company has a regular eating station and eating house at Ashland, Oregon, sufficient to accommodate its passengers, and it is not necessary, and does not add to the convenience of its passengers, to have one at Glendale. That, by reason of the construction and operation of said hotel and eating house upon said depot grounds by the defendant as hereinbefore set out, the hotel of plaintiff is rendered practically valueless for the purposes for which it was constructed." It is averred that at the time of the execution of the deed to the railroad company it was expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties thereto that the words "legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouse purposes," as used therein, should not mean or indicate a hotel or eating house, and such deed was made and accepted with the understanding that the premises conveyed should be limited in their uses, and were not granted for the purpose of building or maintaining either an eating house or hotel thereon; that the defendants the Southern Pacific Company and Clarke had full notice and knowledge of the claim of plaintiff relative thereto at the time the lease was made, and the hotel or boarding house constructed. For a further and separate cause of suit the complaint alleges, in substance, that on or about the 2d day of May, 1883, the legal title to certain lands near the depot grounds referred to was in Willis, although plaintiff was the owner of an undivided half thereof; that, at the date referred to, Willis and his wife, by an instrument in writing, conveyed to the Oregon & California Railroad Company the right to take from a certain stream on the premises owned by the plaintiff and Willis all the water that would flow through a 3-inch pipe from a certain designated point to the water tank of the railroad company, in consideration of which the company granted to Willis and his assigns the right to tap the tank by a pipe 3 inches in diameter, and to thereby take all the water therefrom, beyond the amount needed by the defendant corporation to supply its locomotives; that on or about the 8th of May, 1885, the plaintiff purchased and succeeded to all the rights of Willis in and to the premises referred to, and all his rights under such agreement; that on or about the 1st of November, 1897, the defendants, the Southern Pacific Company and Clarke, caused a pipe to be laid and connected with the water tank referred to, and thereby conducted the water to the hotel built upon the depot grounds, and ever since such time have been, and now are, using the water from said tank, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $250. The complaint concludes with a prayer for a decree enjoining and restraining defendants from carrying on, or permitting to be carried on, the eating house or hotel referred to, and from using from the water tank described any other or greater amount of water than necessary to supply the locomotives of the defendant railroad company.

Messrs. Dolph, Mallery, & Simon, Albert Abraham, and J. C. Fullerton, for appellant:

The deed made by the plaintiff granted only an easement for the purposes named in the deed.

The construction and operation of a hotel on these premises are not a legitimate "railroad purpose."

The rights of any party having an easement in lands of another are measured and defined by the purpose and character of the easement. For all purposes consistent with that easement, the right to use the land remains in the owner of the fee.

The language of the deed shows conclusively that the conveyance was intended to cover only an easement for legitimate railroad, depot and warehouse purposes, and these words used in the deed certainly limit the grant to the purposes named; but, even if the deed purported on its face to be an absolute conveyance of the fee, it would only convey an easement.

It is immaterial whether the deed conveys the fee or an easement. If an easement is conveyed the deed grants it for "all legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouse purposes." The maintenance of a hotel and eating house for the accommodation of passengers and employees is such a purpose.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is not a suit to correct or reform a deed, and hence there are but two questions for decision on this appeal: First, whether, under the allegation that, at the time the deed was made by the plaintiff and Willis to the Oregon & California Railroad Company, it was understood and agreed that the words "for all legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouse purposes" should not mean or include a hotel or eating house, plaintiff is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from maintaining a hotel on the premises conveyed, because in violation of the terms of the grant; and, second, if not, whether the hotel constructed and now maintained by the defendants, the Southern Pacific Company and Clarke, is for "legitimate railroad purposes." Considerable discussion was had at the argument as to whether the deed in question conveyed to the railroad company the fee of the land therein described, or a mere easement therein. But, for the purposes of this appeal, that question is immaterial. In any event, the grant was for legitimate railroad, depot, and warehouses purposes only. Breckinridge v. Delaware L. & W. R. Co. (N. J. Eq.) 33 Atl. 200; Robinson v. Mississquoi R. Co. 59 Vt. 426, 10 Atl. 522; Thornton v. Trammell, 39 Ga. 202. We come, then, directly to a consideration of the question as to whether parol evidence is admissible to show that the words "legitimate railroad purposes" were used in the deed in a particular sense. It is an elementary rule of law that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict or vary a written instrument; and it is equally well settled that parol evidence may not be given to show that common words, the meaning of which is plain, and which do not appear from the context to have been used in a peculiar sense, were in fact so used. Mr. Greenleaf, after stating the rule that parol evidence is always receivable to define and explain the meaning of words in a contract which are purely technical or local, or which have two meanings,—the one common and universal, and the other technical or local,—or where words and phrases are used in a peculiar sense by members of a particular religious sect, says: "But beyond this the principle does not extend. If, therefore, a contract is made in ordinary and popular language, to which no local or technical and peculiar meaning is attached, parol evidence, it seems, is not admissible to show that in that particular case the words were used in any other than their ordinary and popular sense." 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 295. And Lord Chief Justice Tindal says: "The general rule I take to be that where the words of any written instrument are free from ambiguity in themselves, and where external circumstances do not create any doubt or difficulty as to the proper application of those words to claimants under the instrument, or the subject-matter to which the instrument relates, such instrument is always to be construed according to the strict, plain, common meaning of the words themselves, and that in such case evidence dehors the instrument, for the purpose of explaining it according to the surmised or alleged intention of the parties to the instrument, is utterly inadmissible. If it were otherwise, no lawyer would be safe in advising upon the construction of a written instrument, nor any party in taking under it; for the ablest advice might be controlled, and the clearest title undermined, if at some future period parol evidence of the particular meaning which the party affixed to his words, or of his secret intention in making the instrument, or of the objects he meant to take benefit under it, might be set up to contradict or vary the plain language of the instrument itself." Shore v. Atty. Gen. 9 Clark & F. 355, 565, 11 Sim. 592, 7 Jur. 781. And Mr. Justice Clifford, in Moran v. Prather, 23 Wall. 492, 501, 23 L. ed. 123, 124, speaking in reference to the same subject, says: "Ambiguous words or phrases may be reasonably construed to effect the intention of the parties, but the province of construction, except when technical terms are employed, can never extend beyond the language employed, the subject-matter, and the surrounding circumstances." It is therefore not competent for either of the parties to a contract, where its language is plain and unambiguous, to prove by parol evidence how it was understood, or the meaning of the words used. 1 Rice. Ev. 250; Kemble v. Lull, 3 McLean, 272, Fed.

Cas. No. 7,683; Davis v. Shafer, 50 Fed. 764. Applying this rule to the case in hand, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot show by parol testimony that the deed from himself and Willis to the railroad company was not intended to, and did not, convey to such company the right to use the property for all legitimate railroad purposes.

It is claimed, however, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the hotel is not a legitimate or proper railroad purpose, because it is used for the accommodation of the general public, and not for the passengers and employees of the railroad company. The erection and maintenance by railway companies of hotels or eating stations at suitable and convenient places along their roads for the use and accommodation of their employees and passengers is not only a legitimate and proper railroad use, but almost, if not quite, a necessity, in many instances, of modern railway travel. A railway company has an undoubted right to use its property in any way the exigencies of its business or the convenience or accommodation of its passengers may require or suggest. Gudger v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 481, 11 S. E. 515; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rich, 19 Kan. 517, 27 Am. Rep. 159; Gurney v. Minneapolis Union Elevator Co. 63 Minn. 70, 30 L. R. A. 534, 65 N. W. 136; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wathen, 17 Ill. App. 582. And in cases where hotels or eating houses appear to be reasonably necessary for the convenience of its employees and passengers, their maintenance is a legitimate railroad purpose. But an eating house or hotel kept for the accommodation of the general public, and not as an incident to the operation and management of the railway, cannot be so considered. As to whether a given hotel or eating house is maintained for railroad purposes is therefore largely a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined from the circumstances of each particular case. The question as to when and under what circumstances a hotel is a necessary or legitimate railroad use or purpose is quite fully considered in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Crawford County, 29 Wis. 116; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, 34 Wis. 271; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Crawford County, 48 Wis. 606, 5 N. W. 3; and, within the doctrine of these cases, we are of the opinion that, under the allegations of the complaint, the operation of the hotel in question cannot be held, as a matter of law, to be a "legitimate railroad purpose," and within the terms of the grant from the plaintiff, because it is alleged that it is not necessary, and does not add to the comfort, convenience, or safety of the railway passengers, but is for the accommodation of the general public. It seems to us, therefore, the demurrer should be overruled, and the case tried upon its merits, so that the court, aided by the testimony, can determine whether the hotel is in fact a legitimate railroad purpose.

But little need be said in reference to the second cause of suit. The complaint does not show any injury to the plaintiff by the alleged violation of the contract pleaded. It is nowhere alleged that he ever attempted to avail himself of the right given by the contract, although a period of sixteen years has elapsed since its execution; nor is it averred that he has any use for the water, or is damaged or injured in any way by its alleged diversion.

It follows that the decrees of the court below must be reversed, the demurrer overruled, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion, and it is so ordered.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

CENTRAL OHIO NATURAL GAS & FUEL COMPANY, Piff. in Err.,

v.

CAPITAL CITY DAIRY COMPANY.

(60 Ohio St. 96.)

*1. The implied powers which a corporation has in order to carry into effect those expressly granted, and to accomplish the purposes of its creation, are not limited to such as are indispensable for these purposes, but comprise all that are necessary, in the sense of appropriate, convenient, and suitable, including the right of reasonable choice of means to be employed.

2. Acts of a corporation, which, if standing alone, or engaged in as a business, would be beyond its implied powers, are not necessarily ultra vires when they are incidental to, or form part of, an entire transaction, that, in its general scope, is within the corporate purpose. The validity of such a transaction is to be determined from its general character considered as a whole, rather than by segregation into individual parts, and each regarded as distinct from the others.

3. Where a corporation formed for the purpose of manufacturing and dealing in a particular line of goods, instead of incurring the delay and expense incident to the construction of a new manufacturing plant and building up of an independent business, in good faith, with a view of promoting the interests of the corporation, chooses to purchase of an existing partnership engaged in a like business its established plant and assets, including its outstanding claims, among which is one for damages to the property caused by another's negligence, the corporation acquires a valid title to the claim for damages, as against the party liable, and may maintain an action thereon.

(Spear, J., dissents from paragraphs 2 and 3.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Franklin County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for negligent injuries to property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Outhwaite & Linn and A. L. Thurman for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Thomas E. Steele, for defendant in error:

Conceding that the acquisition of this chose in action was not warranted by the charter, the plea of ultra vires cannot be relied upon by a third person, not a party to the contract, against whom it is sought to enforce the right in action, and who is not injuriously affected in any way by the transfer of title.

Ehrman v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 35 Ohio St. 324.

The title of this corporation, if otherwise good, would be entirely valid, a transfer having been taken directly from Kelly and Schilder, surviving partners.

The surviving partner is, in law, the owner of the chattel property, as well as the choses in action.

Bates, Partn. § 18.

After the death of an ostensible partner, a surviving dormant partner may sue alone on a partnership contract.

Beach v. Hayward, 10 Ohio, 455.

Every corporation has by necessary implication the power to do whatever is necessary to carry into effect the purpose of its creation, unless the doing of the particular thing is prohibited by law or by its charter.

Though it might be highly improper or unlawful for the defendant in error to make a business of buying up unliquidated damages, sounding in tort, it by no 64 L. R. A.

means follows that it could not acquire this particular chose in action, intertwined and intermixed as it was with the other assets of the partnership and with the single transaction by which said partnership was transformed into the plaintiff in error.

The law recognizing our modern tendency to transform partnerships into corporations has encouraged such transformations and the conveyances incidental thereto, by sanctioning transactions by the new corporation apparently beyond the usual limits of corporate power.

The new corporation had a right expressly to assume the debts of Kelly and Schilder as surviving partners.

Waterman's Appeal, 26 Conn. 96.

It might have received notes held by someone against the former partnership or its surviving partners, and enforced their collection.

Stoddard v. Shetucket Foundry Co. 34 Conn. 542.

Whether a certain corporate act is or is not ultra vires can only be inquired into by a direct proceeding on behalf of the state.

It will be hard to imagine how the plaintiff in error was injured by the transfer of this claim to the defendant in error. It admitted the infliction of the injury and the amount of the damage, and seeks now utterly to escape paying any penalty for its negligence because its scrupulous conscience is agitated by fear that the defendant in error may have exceeded its powers in taking an assignment of this claim.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In May, 1893, a copartnership owning a plant, in the city of Columbus, equipped for the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, was engaged in carrying on that business under the firm name of the Capital City Dairy Company, and then had an established trade. At that time the Central Ohio Natural Gas & Fuel Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of furnishing and selling natural gas to the inhabitants of the city was prosecuting its business of supplying gas through pipes, some of which were laid in close proximity to the manufactory of the copartnership. That property and its contents were damaged by an explosion of the gas occasioned by the negligence of the corporation, for which it was liable to the copartnership. Shortly afterwards, in July, 1893, the property and business of the copartnership, with its accounts and bills receivable, including its demand for the damages resulting from the explosion, were sold and transferred to a corporation organized in this state by the members of the copartnership and some other persons. This corporation was formed for the purpose of continuing the business of the copartnership, adopted its name, and thereafter carried on the business at the same place; and in September, 1893, it commenced the action below against the plaintiff in error to recover the damages resulting from the gas explosion, the demand for which, it was alleged, had been sold and assigned to the plaintiff as already stated. Issue was joined by denial of the alleged transfer of the demand, as well as of the allegations of the defendant's negligence, and the cause was submitted to the court upon the evidence and the following agreement of the parties: "It is stipulated and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the amount of damages caused by the explosion set out in plaintiff's second amended petition herein was, as of the date of that explosion, the sum of $800, and that said damages were caused by the explosion of natural gas in the pipes of, and belonging to, defendant, and was caused solely by defendant's negligence. It is further stipulated and agreed by and between the parties that, as to all other questions in issue between the plaintiff and defendant, a jury may be, and it is hereby, waived, and said issues may be tried by the court." This agreement left no issue of fact for trial, except that relating to the alleged transfer of the cause of action to the plaintiff, which the court found in favor of the plaintiff, and 64 L. R. A.

rendered judgment accordingly. The judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. The legal question to which our attention is directed concerns the corporate capacity of the plaintiff to acquire the demand sued on, and enforce it by action against the defendant. The plaintiff corporation was formed, as declared in its articles of incorporation, "for the purpose of manufacturing, selling, and dealing in oleomargarine and the materials and utensils employed in the manufacture, storage, and transportation thereof, and all things incident thereto." And the contention is that the purchase of a chose in action—especially one founded on negligence or other tort—is so foreign to the objects of the incorporation of the plaintiff that it could acquire no title thereto, and consequently was without authority to prosecute the action below.

It is a general rule, as sound as it is well settled, that a corporation, in addition to the powers expressly granted, has, by necessary implication, the power to do whatever is needed to carry into effect those granted, and accomplish the purposes of its creation unless the particular act is forbidden by the law or charter. This is, in substance, the statutory rule of Ohio corporations. Rev. Stat. § 3239. And it should be reasonably applied, with a view of promoting the legitimate objects of the corporation, rather than with a strictness that would so hedge it about as to obstruct the practical attainment of the corporate purposes, or embarrass the corporate business. These implied powers which a corporation has in order to carry into effect its legitimate purposes are not limited to such as are indispensable to their accomplishment, but comprise all those powers that are necessary, in the sense of appropriate, convenient, and suitable, including a right of reasonable choice of means to be employed; and whether an act comes within those powers must be determined in each case from all its facts and circumstances. Acts which, if standing alone, or when engaged in as a business, would be beyond the powers of the corporation, are not necessarily ultra vires when they are merely incidental to, or form part of, an entire transaction, that, in its general scope, is within the corporate purpose. For instance, a railroad corporation has power to acquire and hold real property for its right of way, and other uses necessary in the operation of its road, but is without corporate power to purchase or hold such property for sale or rent; and yet if, in locating its roadway, it should be deemed expedient to run it across an improved lot, the damages to which would be enhanced on account of buildings and other improvements upon it, and to avoid the expense and uncertainty of an assessment of damages by a jury, the company should purchase the entire property, parts of which, including the buildings, would not be needed for any railroad purpose, it could hardly be claimed the corporation so exceeded its powers that it acquired no title to, or might not thereafter sell or lease, that part of the premises not actually needed for corporate purposes. So, if a corporation formed for the purpose of manufacturing and dealing in a particular line of goods, in order to obtain from an existing partnership, engaged in a similar business, an established and going concern with its good will, should in good faith buy out its whole plant, including some articles not pertaining to the objects of the corporation, instead of incurring the delay of constructing a new plant, and the expenses that usually attend the building up of an independent trade, there would seem to be no good reason for declaring the purchase void, so as to deprive the corporation of the title to the property, even of those articles not strictly necessary in its business. The corporate objects might be materially promoted by such transaction as an entirety, and the power to make a reasonable choice of means to accomplish that end properly belongs to the corporate body. The transformation of partnerships into corporations by this method is not uncommon. In Thomp. Corp. § 1645, that author says: "The ordinary way of reorganizing a partnership in the form of a corporation is to organize the corporation in form, whereupon the partners make a formal deed of the partnership to the corporation, in exchange for its shares, which are distributed among them according to their respective holdings in the partnership. That assets of the partnerships, of all kinds, may be thus turned in to the corporation in payment of its shares, where the corporation is capable of engaging in the business of the partnership, and is not disabled from holding the property which the partners may own, is a proposition which has the sanction of every-day experience, to say the least." And see Franclyn v. Sprague, 121 U. S. 215, 30 L. ed. 930, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 951. The validity of transactions like these is to be determined from their general character, considered as a whole, rather than by segregation into individual parts, and each regarded as distinct from the others; though undoubtedly a corporation would not be sustained in uniting a legitimate corporate act with one forbidden or unauthorized, for the purpose merely of enabling it to accomplish the latter.

The proper application of the doctrine of ultra vires depends largely on the relation of the parties to the litigation. When the action of a corporation is challenged by the sovereignty which gave it existence, or by whose favor it is permitted to pursue its business, it may be required to show a clear warrant for the acts so called in question; while in suits between individuals and corporations, or between corporate bodies, where private rights only are involved, the rule is not inflexible and yields to considerations of right and justice. In suits of that kind, it is maintained by the highest authority that the title of a corporation to real or personal property cannot be assailed, nor its enjoyment defeated, on the ground that its acquisition was in excess of the corporate power, or in a mode not conformable thereto. This is held in Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 621-628, 25 L. ed. 188-190, where it is said by Mr. Justice Swayne that, "where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take a title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable, and the sovereign alone can object. It is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose." This principle is approved and applied in a number of cases subsequently decided by the same court,—among them, Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547; Reynolds v. First Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 405, 28 L. ed. 733, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 213; Fortier v. New Orleans Nat. Bank, 112 U. S. 439, 28 L. ed. 764, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 234; Fritts v. Palmer, 132 U. S. 282, 33 L. ed. 317, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 93. And the same principle was recognized and enforced in Ehrman v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 35 Ohio St. 324, as far as was necessary in the decision of that case. It was there held that the title of a corporation to a chose in action which it had purchased from another corporation could not be controverted by the debtor on the ground that the purchase was made in a mode or for a purpose not authorized, and a judgment in favor of the purchasing corporation against the debtor was sustained. The debtor, it was said, was a stranger to the transaction by which the chose in action was purchased, was not injured by the transfer, and had no right to question its validity. In this case the plaintiff virtually became the successor of the partnership, by the purchase of all its assets, and continuing the same business at the same place and in the same name. The primary object of the purchase was to obtain an equipped and going manufacturing establishment, and the transfer was completed under one entire contract, in which was included the claim in suit, for damages which the property had recently sustained. No party to that agreement questions the plaintiff's title, and the defendant was neither injured by, nor interested in, the transaction. On the trial the liability of the defendant was admitted, and the parties agreed on the amount of the damages. Either the plaintiff or the copartnership is entitled to the money, and, as the latter in no way disputes the right of the plaintiff to it, we see no good reason for disturbing the judgments which the courts below have rendered.

Judgment affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

NATIONAL HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION, Appt.,

v.

(181 Ill. 35.)

1. A corporation, being a creature of the law, has no powers which the law has not conferred upon it.
2. A building and loan association has no power to engage in the business of trading in real estate or acquiring the same, except as incidental to its legitimate business.
3. The right of a building and loan association to purchase such real estate as it has a mortgage on for its necessary protection in making collections does not extend to the purchase of additional real estate, though taken as a part of the same transaction.
4. A contract of a corporation which is beyond its corporate powers and ultra vires in the strict and legitimate sense, and against public policy, cannot be made binding on the corporation by way of estoppel.
5. A party dealing with a corporation having limited and delegated powers conferred by law is chargeable with notice of them and their limitations, and cannot plead ignorance in avoidance of the defense of ultra vires.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage and recover a deficiency judgment against the building and loan association. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cutting, Castle, & Williams and Wagner, Bingham, & Long, for appellant:

The appellant could lawfully act only through its board of directors, and unauthorized acts by an individual director, or by an officer or agent, without the sphere of his powers, are not binding on the appellant.

Appellant had no power to purchase real estate upon which it had no mortgage, lien, or other encumbrance, or in which it had no interest, and therefore no power to assume and agree to pay a mortgage on such real estate so purchased by it.

When the officers or agents of a corporation openly exercise powers affecting the interests of third parties, which presupposes a delegated authority for that purpose, and other acts subsequently performed show that the corporation must have contemplated the legal existence of such authority, the acts of such officers or agents will be deemed rightful, and the delegated authority will be presumed.

Co.* 31 Fed. 257; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 58.

If it is possible, under any hypothetical condition of facts, for an act to be within the express or implied power of a corporation, the corporation will be estopped in a particular instance to say that the act is not within such expressed or implied power, when such a defense would be to the injury of a party contracting with it, unless the act itself is malum prohibitum or malum in se.

Bissell v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Cos. 22 N. Y. 258; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 30; Grommes v. Sullivan, 43 L. R. A. 419, 26 C. A. 320, 53 U. S. The plea of ultra vires should not, as a general rule, prevail, whether interposed for or against a corporation, when it would not advance justice, but, on the contrary, would accomplish a legal wrong.

When a party dealing with a corporation has acted in good faith, and the contract has been completely executed, so that nothing remains to be done except the payment by the corporation to the party, the corporation is always estopped to set up its want of authority as a defense, unless the action is malum in se or malum prohibitum. This is always the law, even though the party contracting with the corporation knows at the time that the corporation is transacting business beyond its chartered powers.

Under such circumstances, when the contract has been fully executed, the question of ultra vires can only be raised by a direct proceeding in quo warranto.

Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In November, 1893, Flora D. Bishopp made a trade of lots in the city of Chicago with the National Home Building & Loan Association, appellant, in pursuance of which appellant conveyed to her lot 10 in Lee Bros.' addition to Englewood, lots 15 and 16 in block 60 in Chicago University subdivision, and lot 36 in block 2 in Herring's subdivision. In exchange for these lots said Flora D. Bishopp and Jonathan D. Bishopp, her husband, conveyed to the building and loan association lots 5 and 6 in block 2 in Johnson & Clement's subdivision, and in the deed of the same it was agreed that the building and loan association should assume and pay an encumbrance on said lot 5 in the form of a trust deed executed by said Flora D. Bishopp and husband for Charles T. Page, trustee, to secure a note for $3,000 and interest. The trade was negotiated and carried out on the part of the association through J. O. Duncan, agent, who was employed by the association to negotiate loans and examine abstracts for it in Chicago, and he acted under the direction of the secretary of the association. After the exchange the association paid a mortgage of $600 on said lot 5, and the delinquent interest on the mortgage assumed in the conveyance. On May 14, 1895, the board of directors passed a resolution that the assumption clause in the deed was made without authority of the association, and directed the execution and tender of a quitclaim deed of the lot to Flora D. Bishopp. The deed was made and tendered unconditionally, and the association thereby offered the lot to her without a return of the consideration, or any other condition. The note for $3,000 secured by the trust deed was transferred to the Home Savings Bank, one of the appellees; and it filed its bill in the superior court of Cook county to foreclose the same, asking for a decree against Flora D. Bishopp, a sale of the mortgaged premises, and a decree against the building and loan association for such deficiency as might exist. The building and loan association answered that the trade was consummated by direction of its president and secretary, but the clause assuming the mortgage was inserted without their knowledge or authority, and without the knowledge and authority of its board of directors, that such an agreement was ultra vires the corporation, and that it had tendered a quitclaim deed of the lot to the said Flora D. Bishopp. The bill was answered by Flora D. Bishopp and her husband, who admitted its material allegations, and filed their cross bill, alleging the agreement for an exchange of the properties and the conveyances, and asking for a deficiency decree against the association. The building and loan association answered the cross bill, setting up the same defense as before, and the cause was referred to a master, who reported in favor of a foreclosure and sale, and a decree against the building and loan association for any deficiency in the payment of the debt, interest, fees, and costs. Exceptions to the report were overruled, and a decree was entered in accordance with it, which has been affirmed by the appellate court.

No objection is made to the foreclosure of the trust deed, or the sale of the premises; and the only question involved in this appeal is whether the contract inserted in the deed, by which the defendant, the National Home Building & Loan Association, agreed to assume and pay the debt, is binding upon it. This defendant, which denied the binding force of the agreement, is a corporation organized under the provisions of an act entitled "An Act to Enable Associations of Persons to Become a Body Corporate to Raise Funds to be Loaned only among the Members of Such Association," in force July 1, 1879. Laws 1879, p. 83. As a corporation, it is a creature of the law, having no powers but those which the law has conferred upon it. A corporation has no natural rights or capacities, such as an individual or an ordinary partnership; and, if a power is claimed for it, the words giving the power, or from which it is necessarily implied, must be found in the charter, or it does not exist. The law on this subject is stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 24, 35 L. ed. 55, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 478, as follows: "The charter of a corporation, read in the light of any general laws which are applicable, is the measure of its powers, and the enumeration of those powers implies the exclusion of all others not fairly incidental." The purpose of this corporation is the raising of funds to be loaned to its members upon the security of its stock and unencumbered real estate. Manifestly, the business of trading in real estate or acquiring the same, except as incidental to their legitimate business, is wholly foreign to the purpose for which the state has created such corporations, and conferred upon them corporate powers. They have no power to take and hold real estate, and contracts made for the purchase of it are not enforceable. Endlich, Bldg. Asso. §§ 305-308. But for the purpose of collecting debts it is essential that they should have some power with respect to the real estate mortgaged to them, and for that purpose § 13 of the act for their incorporation provides as follows: "Any loan or building association incorporated by or under this act is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase at any sheriff's or other judicial sale, or at any other sale, public or private, any real estate upon which such association may have or hold any mortgage, lien, or other encumbrance, or in which said association may have an interest, and the real estate so purchased, to sell, convey, lease, or mortgage at pleasure to any person or persons whatsoever." Such corporations are not authorized, either by their charters or as an incident to their existence, to acquire or hold any real estate except such as has been mortgaged to them, or which they may have an interest in. Not only is this the rule to be derived from the act of the legislature authorizing their incorporation, under the general principles of law, but it is, and always has been, against the policy of the state to permit corporations to accumulate landed estates, or to own real estate beyond what is necessary for their corporate business, or such as is acquired in the collection of debts. Carroll v. East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 16 Am. Rep. 632; United 64 L. R. A.

States Trust Co. v. Lee, 73 Ill. 142, 24 Am. Rep. 236; People ex rel. Moloney v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 175 Ill. 125, 51 N. E. 664; First M. E. Church v. Dixon, 178 Ill. 280, 52 N. E. 887. It is also a settled principle of American jurisprudence. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 5772. If a building and loan association were permitted to invest its money in the purchase of real estate, or to traffic or trade in such property, instead of keeping within the powers conferred upon it, by loaning such money and collecting it, it would not only be exercising powers not granted, but it would be carrying on a business inconsistent with the purpose of its creation, and against the fixed and uniform policy of the state. In People ex rel. Peabody v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 22 N. E. 798, it was said (page 292, 130 Ill., page 505, 8 L. R. A., and page 803, 22 N. E.): "The word 'unlawful,' as applied to corporations, is not used exclusively in the sense of malum in se or malum prohibitum. It is also used to designate powers which corporations are not authorized to exercise, or contracts which they are not authorized to make, or acts which they are not authorized to do, or, in other words, such acts, powers, and contracts as are ultra vires." In Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 48, 35 L. ed. 64, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 484, the result of the decisions as to the exercise of powers not granted is summed up as follows: "All contracts made by a corporation beyond the scope of those powers are unlawful and void and no action can be maintained upon them in the courts; and this upon three distinct grounds: The obligation of everyone contracting with a corporation to take notice of the legal limits of its powers; the interest of the stockholders not to be subjected to risks which they have never undertaken; and, above all the interest of the public, that the corporation shall not transcend the powers conferred upon it by law."

It is first contended in support of the decree that the contract by which the corporation assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage on lot 5 as a part of the consideration, was within its powers. The ground of this claim is that the corporation had a mortgage on lot 6 (the other lot which was conveyed to it) and the acquisition of that lot was a legitimate exercise of power. We do not see how the fact that it had power to purchase one lot would operate to give it power to purchase another. The right to acquire property in which it had an interest could not be extended to other property in which it had no interest. If it could make a loan on a lot and buy other property in the vicinity or adjoining it by merely including in the deed the mortgaged lot, the law would be evaded, and the policy of the state subverted. The law has given such a corporation power to purchase such real estate as it has a mortgage on, for its necessary protection in making collections; but that does not authorize it, by including such real estate, to buy another lot, or a subdivision or part of a town, and enter into the business of trading in real estate. If it could not purchase lot 6, upon which it held a mortgage, without buying other real estate, it was not authorized to buy it at all.

It is also argued that the building and loan association is estopped to raise the question whether the contract was ultra vires, because it has received the benefit of the contract, by the conveyance of property to it. That depends, as we think, upon the sense in which the term ultra vires is used. It has been applied indiscriminately to different states of fact in such a way as to cause considerable confusion. When used as applicable to some conditions, it has been frequently said that a corporation is estopped to make such a defense where it has received the benefit of the contract. For example, the term has been applied to acts of directors or officers which are outside and beyond the scope of their authority, and therefore are invasions of the rights of stockholders, but which are within the powers of the corporation. In such a case the act may become binding by ratification, consent, and acquiescence, or by the corporation receiving the benefit of the contract. Again, it has been applied to cases where an act was within the authority of the corporation for some purposes or under some circumstances, and where one dealing in good faith with the corporation had a right to assume the existence of the conditions which would authorize the act. Where an act is not ultra vires for want of power in the corporation, but for want of power in the agent or officer, or because of the disregard of formalities which the law requires to be observed, or is an improper use of one of the enumerated powers, it may be valid as to third persons. In the more proper and legitimate use of the term, it applies only to acts which are beyond the purpose of the corporation,—which could not be sanctioned by the stockholders. There would, of course, be no power to confirm or ratify a contract of that kind, because the power to enter into it is absolutely wanting. If there is no power to make the contract, there can be no power to ratify it; and it would seem clear that the opposite party could not take away the incapacity, and give the contract vitality, by doing something under it. It would be contradictory to say that a contract is void for an absolute want of power to make it, and yet it may become legal and valid as a contract, by way of estoppel, through some other act of the party under such incapacity, or some act of the other party chargeable by law with notice of the want of power.

The powers delegated by the state to the corporation are matters of public law, of which no one can plead ignorance. A party dealing with a corporation having limited and delegated powers conferred by law is chargeable with notice of them and their limitations, and cannot plead ignorance in avoidance of the defense. Franklin Co. v. Lewiston Inst. for Savings, 68 Me. 43, 28 Am. Rep. 9; New Orleans F. & H. S. S. Co. v. Ocean Dry Dock Co. 28 La. Ann. 173, 26 Am. Rep. 90. Concerning this subject, it is said in Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950: "To hold that this can be done is, in our opinion, to hold that any act done under a void contract makes all its parts valid, and that, the more you do under a contract forbidden by law, the stronger the claim to its enforcement in the courts." We quote again from Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. as follows: "The view which this court has taken of the question presented by this branch of the case, and the only view which appears to us consistent with legal principles, is as follows: A contract of a corporation which is ultra vires in the proper sense,—that is to say, outside the object of its creation, as defined in the law of its organization, and therefore beyond the powers conferred upon it by the legislature,—is not voidable only, but wholly void, and of no legal effect. The objection to the contract is, not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it, but that it could not make it. The contract cannot be ratified by either party, because it could not have been authorized by either. No performance on either side can give the unlawful contract any validity, or be the foundation of any right of action upon it. When a corporation is acting within the general scope of the powers conferred upon it by the legislature, the corporation, as well as persons contracting with it, may be estopped to deny that it has complied with the legal formalities which are prerequisites to its existence or to its action, because such prerequisites might in fact have been complied with. But, when the contract is beyond the powers conferred upon it by existing laws, neither the corporation nor the other party to the contract can be estopped, by assenting to it or by acting upon it, to show that it was prohibited by those laws." See also Reese, Ultra Vires, §§ 46-72, for a full discussion of the subject. In Durkee v. People, 155 Ill. 354, 46 Am. St. Rep. 340, 40 N. E. 626, the same rules were laid down, and it was pointed out that the cases where a corporation is estopped from asserting that a contract is ultra vires when it has received a benefit under the contract is where the making of the contract is within the scope of the franchise, and the contract is sought to be avoided because there was a failure to comply with some regulation, or the power was improperly exercised. The following was there quoted from the opinion in Davis v. Old Colony R. Co. 131 Mass. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 221: "There is a clear distinction, as was pointed out by Mr. Justice Campbell in Zabriskie v. Cleveland, O. & C. R. Co. 23 How. 381, 16 L. ed. 488, by Mr. Justice Hoar in Monument Nat. Bank v. Globe Works, 101 Mass. 57, 3 Am. Rep. 322, and by Lord Chancellor Cairns and Lord Hatherly in Ashbury R. Carriage & Iron Co. v. Riche, L. R. 7 H. L. 653, between the exercise by a corporation of a power not conferred upon it, varying from the objects of its creation as declared in the law of its organization, of which all persons dealing with it are bound to take notice, and the abuse of a general power or the failure to comply with prescribed formalities or regulations in a particular instance, when such abuse or failure is not known to the other contracting party."

The cases in this court where the corporation has been held to be estopped have been where the act complained of was within the general scope of the corporate powers. Ottawa Northern Pl. Road Co. v. Murray, 15 Ill. 336, was a case where the corporation was expressly authorized to borrow money and to mortgage its road. Money was borrowed and received by the corporation, and a bond and mortgage were executed. The corporation sought to question the official character of the persons who borrowed the money and executed the mortgage as directors of the company. It was held that the corporation could not dispute their official relation after receiving the money. In Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413, 8 Am. Rep. 656, the North Star Gold & Silver Mining Company had given its notes for borrowed money. The court said: "The borrowing of the money was not in itself an act ultra vires, nor was the giving of the notes. The money was not borrowed to be used for an illegal or immoral purpose. The lenders have been guilty of no violation of law, nor wrong of any kind." The bill was filed in the case by one of the stockholders to enjoin the payment of the notes because the money was appropriated to mining in the territory of Colorado. It was not decided whether engaging in mining in Colorado was ultra vires or not, but the doctrine of ultra vires has never been carried to the extent of requiring one who honestly lends money to a corporation authorized to borrow it to see that it is not applied to an improper purpose. The transaction was perfectly lawful, and not ultra vires the corporation, and the rights of the lender were maintained, with some natural and proper remarks about honesty as applied to corporations. In Dart v. Gale, 83 Ill. 136, an insurance company borrowed money which it had a right to borrow to carry on its business, and mortgaged real estate to secure its payment. A purchaser of the real estate subsequent to the trust deed, and therefore subject to it, tried to avoid the encumbrance on the ground that the company had no right to execute the mortgage. The court said: "That in certain cases it might have lawfully done so, even against the remonstrance of those who had the right to directly interfere in its management, we think can admit of but little controversy." It was deemed unimportant whether it was in fact necessary to make the mortgage, because, conceding that the evidence did not show such a necessity, the defense could not be availed of by the corporation, or by the purchaser, who bought with full knowledge of the trust deed. The case belongs to a class already explained. The corporation had the right to do the very thing complained of, and neither it nor the purchaser could set up that the requisite conditions for the exercise of the power did not exist. In Kadish v. Garden City Equitable Loan & Bldg. Asso. 151 Ill. 531, 42 Am. St. Rep. 256, 38 N. E. 236, the court purposely avoided deciding whether corporations for manufacturing purposes could become members of homestead and loan associations, and whether such an association could loan money for general business purposes. The corporation had a right to loan money, and the loans were made to actual members. All that was insisted upon was that the borrowers, though in fact members, were ineligible to membership, and the money was applied to general business purposes. It was held that the eligibility to membership could not be questioned, nor the purpose for which the money was borrowed; and the term ultra vires, as there used and defined, did not embrace unlawful acts which the corporation could not perform, as being different from the purpose of its organization and against the policy of the state. In this case the transaction was beyond the corporate powers, and ultra vires, in the strict and legitimate sense, and against public policy. It could not be ratified or become valid by acquiescence since there was no power to make it. Flora D. Bishopp, who dealt with the corporation, was chargeable with notice of its powers and their limitations and its inability to enter into the contract. She could not make the void contract valid by acting under it. No action can be maintained upon the unlawful contract, and in such cases, if the courts can afford any remedy, it cannot be done by affirming or enforcing the contract, but in some other manner.

The decree of the Superior Court against the National Home Building & Loan Association for any deficiency that may exist, and for execution to collect the same, and the judgment of the Appellate Court affirming said decree in that respect, are each reversed.

Carter, J., dissenting:

I do not agree to the doctrine announced in the decision of this case,—that a corporation may not be estopped from pleading its own lack of corporate power. As I understand the decisions, it has long been the settled doctrine of this court that where the contract has been wholly executed, and the corporation has received the benefit of it, it will be estopped from setting up in defense of payment its own lack of power under its charter to enter into the contract, where the contract is not one either malum in se or malum prohibitum; and I do not understand that the application of the doctrine of estoppel is confined to those cases where the contract is within the powers of the corporation, but only beyond the mere authority of its officers or agents. The doctrine of estoppel does not rest upon the principle of agency, that there may be a ratification of the unauthorized acts of agents. It has been held, not only by this court, but by many others, that in many cases the question of ultra vires can only be raised in a direct proceeding by the state to oust the corporation of its assumed and usurped powers. Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 413, 8 Am. Rep. 656; Kadish v. Garden City Equitable Loan & Bldg. Assn. 151 Ill. 531, 42 Am. St. Rep. 256, 38 N. E. 236; Darst v. Gale, 83 Ill. 136; *Eckman v. Chicago, B. & Q. PITTSBURGH, CINCINNATI, CHICAGO, & ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

*1. An association, established by a railway company, composed of some or all of its employees and the company, for the purpose of accumulating and maintaining a relief fund created by the voluntary contributions from their wages by employees who apply for membership in said fund and are admitted,—the railway company to take charge of, and be responsible for, the funds, make up deficiencies in the same, supply facilities for conducting the business, and pay the operating expenses, supply surgical attendance for injuries received in its service and to pay the members or their designated beneficiaries the stated share of the benefit fund so raised from wages retained by the company,—is not an insurance company or association; and, in agreeing to perform and in performing each and all of said acts, such railway company is not engaged in the transaction of insurance business.

2. The said acts of the railway company are within the implied powers of a railway corporation, and are not ultra vires.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Franklin County to review a judgment dismissing a petition for a writ of quo warranto to determine by what authority defendant was operating a relief department for the benefit of injured employees. Affirmed.

Statement by Price, J.:

The plaintiff in error filed in the circuit court of Franklin county a petition in quo warranto against the railway company, now defendant in error, in which petition it is alleged that, on or about the 28th day of August, A. D. 1890, the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, & St. Louis Railway Company and the Chicago, St. Louis, & Pittsburgh Railroad Company were consolidated under and pursuant to the laws of the state of Ohio, under the name of the defendant, the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, & St. Louis Railway Company, whereby, under the latter name, it became, and still is, a corporation duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Ohio. It is further stated that the purpose of the incorporation of said company was to "acquire, build, maintain, and operate a line of railroad along certain lines and between certain points designated in its articles of consolidation and incorporation." The relator then charges that, "in violation of law and in abuse of its corporate powers, and in the exercise of privileges, rights, and franchises not conferred upon it by law, the defendant, from and after the 1st day of October, 1890, has been engaged, and still is engaged, in transacting the business of life and accident insurance, whereby it insures its employees against sickness, accident, and death, in consideration of the payment, to wit, by the insured, of stipulated monthly sums, and an agreement on the part of such insured that in case of accident or death neither the insured, nor his legal representatives, shall be entitled to ask, demand, or receive, by suit or otherwise, any compensation whatever on account of such injury or death resulting from the negligence of the defendant or the Pennsylvania Company, or their servants or agents." The relator further states that "the profits, if any, growing out of said business of insurance, belong to the defendant, and the losses, if any, incident thereto, are borne by it." The prayer is for a judgment ousting the defendant from further continuing the business of insurance by means of its relief department, or in any other manner whatever. The defendant answered, admitting the official character of the relator, and that the defendant is a corporation duly organized in the manner, at the time, and for the purposes stated in the petition. Each and every other allegation of the petition is denied.

In the circuit court the parties agreed upon the following facts, and other facts which appear in the opinion:

"The parties to this cause, for the purpose of the trial of the issues made by the pleadings herein, agree upon the following facts subject to exceptions by either party at the hearing for irrelevancy or incompetency:

"First. The printed pamphlet entitled 'Regulations Governing the Voluntary Relief Department of the Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh,' hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made part hereof, is a true and correct statement of the organization, regulations, and mode of conducting the business of the relief department of the defendant, mentioned in the petition herein. The defendant has not been, from or after the said 1st day of October, 1890, and is not now, engaged in transacting the business of life and accident insurance, or either, unless the business set forth in said printed pamphlet should be held to be such life and accident business.

"Second. The defendant since about the said 28th day of August, 1890, has owned, and still does own, more than 1,000 miles of railroad, and during said period has operated, and still does operate, more than 2,300 miles of railroad, extending from the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, through the state of Ohio, to the cities of Cincinnati, Chicago, Indianapolis, and Louisville, with many branch lines, and, together with the lines of the Pennsylvania Company, mentioned in said petition, and of other companies mentioned in said regulations, forms one of the main systems of railroads between the Atlantic seaboard and the Mississippi river."

The third fact agreed upon is a table showing the number of employees of the defendant company at the close of each fiscal year from June 30, 1890, to June 30, 1901, and the number of employees who at such times were actually members of said relief fund, and also shows the percentage of membership to the number of employees; the percentage being 47.7 in 1890, and 65.9 in 1901. The fourth fact agreed upon is a table showing the amount contributed by members during each triennial period, amounts of benefits paid members during such period, and the operating expenses paid by defendant. The fifth and sixth facts agreed upon relate to amounts of benefit payments, according to certain regulations of the relief department.

Among sections of the regulations of this relief department above referred to under Exhibit A, the following are quoted as pertinent in this case:

"(1) The 'voluntary relief department' is a department of the service of the several railroad companies, respectively, associated as set forth in the agreement to which these regulations are attached, in the executive charge of a superintendent, whose directions in carrying out its regulations are to be complied with, subject to the control of the general manager.

"(2) In these regulations, unless otherwise indicated, the titles 'company' and 'general manager' will be understood as meaning the Pennsylvania Company, and the general manager of that company.

"(3) The object of this department is the establishment and management of a fund to be known as the 'relief fund,' for the payment of definite amounts to employees contributing to the fund, who under the regulations shall be entitled thereto, when they are disabled by accident or sickness, and in the event of their death, to the relatives or other beneficiaries specified in the applications of such employees.

"(4) The relief fund, from which the proposed benefits are to be paid, will be formed by voluntary contributions from employees; appropriations, when necessary to make up any deficit, by the several companies respectively, and income or profit derived from investments of the moneys of the fund, and such gifts or legacies as may be made for the use of the fund.

"(5) The associated companies under the stipulations of the agreement between themselves, hereinbefore set forth, will take general charge of the department, guarantee the fulfillment of the obligations assumed by them respectively, in conformity with the regulations from time to time established, supply the necessary facilities for conducting the business of the department, and pay all the operating expenses thereof. The company will take charge of the funds, and be responsible for their safe-keeping."

Section 6 provides for the selection of an advisory board; one member to be chosen by the contributing members of the six or more constituent companies composing the association, and three to be selected by the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Company, and three to be selected by the directors of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, & St. Louis Railway Company.

"(10) The moneys received for the relief fund shall be held by the company in trust for the relief department. The advisory committee shall, subject to the approval of the board of directors of the company, direct the investment, and any changes therein, of money which is not required to be kept on hand for current use. Such investments shall be in the name of the company, 'in trust for the relief department.'"

"(17) No employee will be required to become a member of the relief fund."

The other important facts necessary to an understanding of the case are stated in the opinion.

Price, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We assume that the relator commenced the action in the circuit court against the defendant railway company under favor of § 6761, Rev. Stat., which is: "A like action [quo warranto] may be brought against a corporation: (1) When it has offended against a provision of an act for its creation or renewal, or any act altering or amending such acts. (2) When it has forfeited its privileges and franchises by non-user. (3) When it has committed or omitted an act which amounts to a surrender of its corporate rights, privileges, and franchises. (4) When it has misused a franchise, privilege, or right conferred upon it by law, or when it claims or holds by contract or otherwise, or has exercised a franchise, privilege, or right in contravention of law." Inasmuch as neither the voluntary relief department, so called in the statement of the case, or its members, are parties to the suit, it would seem that the right to the remedy is not under clause 3 of § 6760, but under clause 4 of § 6761, just quoted. And the prayer of the petition is "that the defendant be ousted from further continuing said business of insurance by means of its said relief department, or in any other manner whatever, and asks such other relief as the nature of the case may require." So it is the complaint against the railway company that, under its charter and franchise as a railway company, it is conducting an insurance business in contravention of law, from which it should be ousted. The answer denies that the defendant company transacts an insurance business, and in the circuit court certain facts were agreed upon in the trial and submission of the issue, some of which appear in the statement of the case. But there are some additional facts contained in the agreement which are necessary to be noticed in the determination of the important controversy, for it is not contended that the defendant openly and in the usual manner conducts insurance, and holds itself out to the public as an insurance company, and clearly such is not the fact in the case before us.

It is claimed by the relator, however, that the business done under the name of the "Voluntary Relief Department," and in the manner and by the means employed, amounts, in substance, to an insurance business, and which exceeds the charter powers of the company. A proper determination of this question necessarily requires of us something more than a casual examination of the plans, structure, and operation of the machinery by which the business in question is advanced and carried forward.

It, no doubt, is true that the organization of the so-called relief department was in the first instance projected by the defendant and other railway companies under the control and management of the Pennsylvania Company, and perhaps the plan may have emanated from the latter company; but this is not important in this case, for the record discloses that the defendant, having a relief department, such as is now under criticism, in November, 1890, by written contract with a number of other railway companies who had leased their respective lines to the Pennsylvania Company, associated themselves in the administration of their respective relief departments, and they are denominated the "Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh." They adopted certain regulations, and it is recited that one of the objects of the association is to "secure uniformity and economy;" that to accomplish this they "associated themselves" for the purpose of a joint administration and regulation of said respective relief departments under one common organization, to be known as the "Voluntary Relief Department of the Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh." It further appears that prior to November, 1890, the Pennsylvania Company and the defendant company had "each respectively established a relief department for the benefit of its service and employees," and any other companies owning lines west of Pittsburgh which were being operated by the Pennsylvania Company, and which had adopted or would adopt similar relief departments, might associate with the former companies for the joint administration of the relief departments.

This brief history explains the character and form of the application for membership which is found in the record, and may give some color to the other features of the case. But the defendant, as did each of the other companies so associated, no doubt, continued its own separate relief department, with a subordinate or separate advisory board, partly composed of men selected by the contributing members, and partly of men selected by the boards of directors of the constituent companies.

With this understanding of the general outlines of the origin, purpose, and character of the relief department connected with the defendant, is it guilty of conducting an insurance business in contravention of law? This question suggests another: What is insurance business? Various definitions have been given in brief of counsel, but we are content with the summary given in Bouvier's Law Dictionary (Rawle's Revision) 1068: "A contract whereby, for an agreed premium, one party undertakes to compensate the other for loss on a specified subject by specified perils." In another form, on the same page, it is said: "An insurance in relation to property is a contract whereby the insurer becomes bound, for a definite consideration, to indemnify the insured against loss or damage to a certain property named in the policy, by reason of certain perils to which it may be exposed." Life and accident insurance is a contract whereby one party, for a stipulated consideration, agrees to indemnify another against injuries by accident or death from any cause not excepted in the contract. In the parlance of the business of insurance, ordinarily the contract is called a "policy;" the consideration paid, the "premium;" and the events insured against are called "risks and perils." In case of injury or destruction of the property insured, or injury by accident, or liability for death, the liability is called a "loss." Policies of this character may be preceded by an application for the same. In the relief department practice under review, an application is made the basis for membership, and the applicant must be an employee of the company to which the department is attached. It is required to be addressed as follows: "Pennsylvania Lines West of Pittsburgh, Voluntary Relief Department. Application for Membership in the Relief Fund. To the Su-

The applicant then states his name and residence, and the name of the company with which he is employed, the nature of the service engaged in, and that he has knowledge of, and will be bound by, the regulations of the relief department; and he constitutes the proper agent of the railway company, his agent to apply, as a "voluntary contribution" to the relief fund, from his wages according to the rate of wages earned, as graded in the regulations, for the purpose of securing the benefits provided for in the regulations for a member of the "relief fund" and "additional death benefit;" stating his class, and name of the beneficiary in case of death. The application contains the following stipulation, which will be discussed later in the opinion: "And I agree that the acceptance of benefits from the relief fund for injury or death shall operate as a release of all claims for damages against said company, arising from such injury or death, which could be made by or through me, and that I or my legal representatives will execute such further instrument as may be necessary formally to evidence such acquittance." There are other statements in the application not material to our inquiry, and a certificate is issued in pursuance of the terms of such application, if it be approved.

Section 31 of the regulations provides that "the word 'contribution' wherever used in the regulations, or in the organization adopted in connection therewith, shall be held and construed to refer to such designated portion of the wages payable to an employee as he agrees to receive in the form of a right to benefits, in and through the relief fund; and the words 'contributors,' 'contributing employees'—and like words and phrases—are descriptive of employees so agreeing." It is stated in the third regulation, that "the object of this department is the establishment and management of a fund to be known as the 'relief fund,' for the payment of definite amounts to employees contributing to the fund . . . when they are disabled by accident or sickness, and, in the event of their death, to the relatives or other beneficiaries specified in the application of such employees." And by regulation 4 it is said that this fund is formed by voluntary contributions from employees, appropriations by the railroad company when necessary to make up a deficit, etc. In regulation 10 it is provided that "the money received from the 'relief fund' shall be held by the company in trust for the relief department." Investments made of the fund, if any, shall be in the name of the company "in trust for the relief department."

The railway company is the depository of the fund so raised, and is responsible for its management and safe-keeping, and agrees to make good any deficit in the fund which becomes necessary to meet the proper demands on the relief department. This management is by the general manager of the company and the advisory board, the latter being composed of persons mutually selected by members of the fund and the companies. Moreover, the railway company defrays all the expenses of the management, and the emergency services of the surgeons are rendered free by the company surgeons. Not a dollar of the fund ever belongs to the railway company, and it primarily is made up of a certain part of the wages of the employee, retained for that purpose by his direction. The concern has no capital stock. The doors to membership in this fund are not open to the general public. While an employee is not required to become a member, none but employees can do so. While it is true that the railroad company is the depository of the fund, and stands good for its safe-keeping and proper disbursement, it is, after all, but the custodian of a certain portion of wages which the employee directs shall be retained to produce the benefit fund, from which he may draw in times of sickness or other disablement.

Is this an insurance business? It is not held out to be such. The objects stated in the organization and regulations are clearly otherwise. Neither the railway company, nor its relief department, advertises for or in any other way solicits patronage. The members of the fund are volunteers. The business transacted, while in part done by an officer of the company, aided by representatives of the members, is not mingled with the business and accounts of the railway company. It has no offices set apart for an insurance business, and has no agents to promote its interests. It does not undertake to insure or indemnify against either sickness, accident, or death. Such is not the language or spirit of the relation between the member and the fund. On the contrary, in case of sickness or injury the members may draw from the relief fund what they mutually have created from a portion of their wages retained for that purpose, and the payment of the benefit is not the payment of a loss on a risk named in a policy or other instrument of insurance. This differs from an insurance business as commonly, and we might say universally, conducted. It is organized on an insurance basis,—advertised as such. It needs and uses agents to represent it, and it solicits from the general public. It has offices and current expenses, etc.; and, to protect the public, insurance laws have been enacted, 64 L. R. A.

requiring publicity of its resources and methods of business, and in most cases periodical sworn statements of the condition and extent of the business being transacted. All this to prevent imposition upon the public, which might be misled by the representations of agents, or by published inducements for patronage. Another marked distinction between the relief department and insurance business is that there is no profit to the railway company, and no profit, in the business or commercial sense, to the members of the fund, except such increase of the fund as may arise by way of interest on its investment in case of a surplus. Those who organize or embark in insurance business have profit in view as a recompense for the industry, ability, and capital invested, and it would be a strange insurance business that would omit this great incentive from its plans and purposes.

But it is said there is a resulting benefit to the railway company from the maintenance of the relief department, in the nature of profit, and that it consists in the stipulation in the application for membership that the acceptance of benefits under the certificate of membership releases the company from all liability to him or his beneficiary for damages on account of injury or death. We have hereinbefore quoted that stipulation, but it must be observed that the member or beneficiary, after the injury, and all its facts and circumstances are fully known, has the right to elect as between the acceptance of benefits and a claim against the company for damages. He is not compelled to accept benefits or nothing, and he waives no right to proceed against the company until he has accepted the benefits provided for him. It is true that very many may accept the benefits and release the company, but it is not every injury to the employee, and not every case of his death from injury in the service, that furnishes a good cause of action against the company. Whatever benefit may accrue to the company by the acceptance of benefits cannot be called profit, because it is but a remote or probable sequence to the membership of the employee. Indeed, it seems that the liability of the railway company is enlarged by the relief department. It vouches for the payment of benefits if accepted, and independent of any right of action against it, and leaves open the option to accept benefits, or decline them and claim damages of the railway company.

If it is said that the company expects to realize from the relief department by reason of more loyal service and increased confidence of the employee in his employer, we may reply that loyalty of service and reasonable confidence are due the employer so long as he faithfully and honorably performs his contract and discharges all his duties to his employee. It seems difficult to figure out of the relation that exists after and on account of this membership the idea of profit to the company. If it breeds good will and contentment, the same is laudable, and we see nothing in the rules of the department that takes away or jeopardizes a single legal right of the employee. If sick, he may receive the aid. If injured in the service, even through his own negligence, or in a service the risks and perils of which he assumed, he is entitled to his share of the fund. And if his injury is the fault of the company, he can elect to take the benefits provided or sue at law.

In one form or another, the controversy we are dealing with has been before other courts of final resort, and the almost if not altogether unanimous holding is that managing and conducting such a relief department is not insurance business, but, on the contrary, a beneficial provision, merely, for employees, which the railway company might aid in promoting. We will note but a few of such cases:

Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Asso. 137 Pa. 412, 18 Atl. 1112, is a case where there was a proceeding in quo warranto to require the defendant to show by what authority it claimed the right to make contracts of insurance and issue policies of insurance. The defendant answered the writ, and denied making contracts of insurance or issuing policies of insurance as alleged by the attorney general. In the syllabus the supreme court of Pennsylvania says: "(1) A contract of insurance is purely a business adventure, not founded on any philanthropic, benevolent, or charitable principle; and the design and purpose of an insurance company, and the dominant and characteristic feature of its contract, is the granting of an indemnity, or security against loss, for a stipulated consideration. (2) But the design of what are known as benevolent societies, which are purely of a philanthropic or benevolent character, is not to indemnify or secure against loss, but from the contributions of members to accumulate a fund to be used in their own aid or relief in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, or death."

At the risk of being prolix, we are tempted to adopt here a paragraph from the opinion of Justice Clark, on page 419 of that case (137 Pa., page 1113, 18 Atl.): "To grant indemnity or security against loss, for a consideration, is not only the design and purpose of an insurance company, but is also the dominant and characteristic feature of the contract of insurance. What is known as a 'beneficial association,' however, has a wholly different object and purpose in view. The great underlying purpose of the organization is not to indemnify or to secure against loss. Its design is to accumulate a fund from the contributions of its members . . . to be used in their own aid or relief in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, or death. . . . The motives of the members may be, to some extent, selfish, but the principle upon which they rest is founded in the considerations mentioned. These benefits, by the rule of their organization, are payable to their own unfortunate, out of funds which the members have themselves contributed for the purpose, not as an indemnity or security against loss, but as a protective relief in case of sickness or injury, or to provide the means of a decent burial in the event of death. Such societies have no capital stock. They yield no profit, and their contracts, although beneficial and protective, altogether exclude the idea of insurance, or of indemnity, or of security against loss."

The above case was quoted from with approval in Northwestern Masonic Aid Asso. v. Jones, 154 Pa. 99, 35 Am. St. Rep. 810, 26 Atl. 253.

More directly in point is Beok v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 232, 76 Am. St. Rep. 211, 43 Atl. 908. The facts in that case show that it involved a relief department, organized precisely like the one under consideration. The opinion was by a unanimous court, and it held that the transaction was not an insurance contract within the meaning of insurance law. It also held that it was neither ultra vires, nor against public policy. On page 241 of the opinion (63 N. J. L., page 216, 76 Am. St. Rep., and page 911, 43 Atl.) Magie, Ch. J., speaking of the relief department, says: "It is limited to such of the employees of the company as voluntarily apply for admission to the fund and are admitted. They agree with each other and the company to contribute a portion of their wages to create a fund out of which they shall be paid certain sums in case of sickness or injury, and out of which, in case of death, certain sums shall be paid to the beneficiaries or next of kin. The sum so paid may save from want, but does not increase the estate of the employee. . . . I can perceive no reason why the establishment of such a fund, and the agreement of those who contribute to it as to its distribution, can be held to fall within the regulations of the insurance laws. Such an association creates its own fund by voluntary action, and distributes it by an agreed-upon plan, and the contract between them is not of insurance, but of beneficial relief. As they have neither sought nor obtained corporate powers for their purpose, they are not amenable to prohibitions against the use of corporate powers for that purpose, if any such exists."

The question was also before the supreme court of Iowa in two different cases. In Donald v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 284, 33 L. R. A. 492, 61 N. W. 971, the character of a similar relief department was under review. One proposition of the syllabus is: "An association organized by a railroad company for its employees, which agrees to pay stated sums to members or their beneficiaries in case a member is killed or injured in the employment, the company paying operating expenses and making good deficiencies after assessment, is not an 'insurance company,' but a 'beneficiary society.'" It was also decided in that case that the contract involved was not against public policy, and the reasons for the conclusion, we think, are unassailable.

Again, in Maine v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 109 Iowa, 260, 70 N. W. 630, 80 N. W. 315, the same holding was made. It is there decided, also, that a railroad company has implied power to make such contract.

The foregoing cases cite many others to support them, but we have no further room for their consideration. The cases form a uniform current of judicial opinion. We have not been cited to a single case holding a contrary view, and our research has not been rewarded with one. We think the tide of judicial opinion is irresistible.

There is another reflection in this case. We have, to a reasonable extent, examined our statutes upon the subject of insurance and insurance companies. They provide carefully for their charter and organization, and for the deposit of the required amount of money or securities before proceeding to business. Certain sworn statements and annual reports are to be filed with the insurance department, etc. But we find no section that makes a call upon such an association as this relief department. The legislature thus far has not recognized its business as that of insurance. On the contrary, there seems to be an express exception in favor of such associations. Section 3631a, Rev. Stat., provides: "This act [viz., §§ 3630a to 3631] shall not apply to any association . . . [of] religious or secret societies, or to any class of mechanics, express, telegraph, or railroad employees, or ex-union soldiers, formed for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, and their families, or blood relatives, exclusively, or for purely charitable purposes"—and then provides how such associations may incorporate. See also § 3631-23, Rev. Stat., where there is an exception of similar associations from the operation of insurance laws. We think it apparent from these and 64 L. R. A.

other sections that it has been the legislative intent to permit some of the plain and useful things of everyday life to be attended to without the wearing of a corporate charter.

It is also urged in argument for the relator that the acts of the railroad company in promoting and managing the relief department are ultra vires, and therefore the defendant should be ousted from performing them. Some of the cases we have cited deny this proposition, and there are many others of the same tenor and import. For the purposes of this branch of the case, we need seek no further than a decision of this court in Central Ohio Natural Gas & Fuel Co. v. Capital City Dairy Co. 60 Ohio St. 96, 53 N. E. 711. The first section of the syllabus expressed the opinion of the entire court, and it declares: "The implied powers which a corporation has in order to carry into effect those expressly granted, and accomplish the purpose of its creation, are not limited to such as are indispensable for these purposes, but comprise all that are necessary, in the sense of appropriate, convenient, and suitable, including the right of reasonable choice of means to be employed." The second section of the syllabus lacked the support of but one member of the court, and it declares: "Acts of a corporation, which, if standing alone, or engaged in as a business, would be beyond its implied powers, are not necessarily ultra vires when they are incidental to, or form part of, an entire transaction, that in its general scope is within the corporate purpose. The validity of such a transaction is to be determined from its general character, considered as a whole, rather than by segregation into individual parts, and each regarded as distinct from the others."

The most of the work of an employee of a railroad company is hazardous, and frequent injuries are sustained, requiring surgical and medical attention. The company has its surgeons along its lines to respond in case of injury, and, the more efficient the organization of this beneficent branch of the service, the better for both the master and servant. And yet the company should not be charged with conducting a medical or surgical school. If it should establish hospitals for its injured employees, and equip them with everything conducing to comfort and speedy recovery, including surgical attention, its acts should not be regarded as ultra vires, in that it conducts hospitals. It may, for the purposes of careful and successful management of its business as a railroad, establish telegraph and telephone facilities, and install a proper number of competent operators, and yet it may not be charged with carrying on a telegraph and telephone business. It may establish hotels and eating rooms along its lines, and not be in the hotel business. All these things are incidental to the main occupation, and are within the implied powers conferred.

Again, it is said that the scheme adopted and the conditions of membership meet the condemnation of public policy. Some of the cases already cited consider this question also. There are very many others, a few of which we cite: Otis v. Pennsylvania Co. 71 Fed. 136; Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Moore, 152 Ind. 345, 44 L. R. A. 638, 53 N. E. 290; Johnson v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. 163 Pa. 127, 29 Atl. 854; Beck v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 232, 76 Am. St. Rep. 211, 43 Atl. 908; Hamilton v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. 118 Fed. 92. These cases cite many others to the same effect, and, as on the first branch of this case, the authorities present a solid front. We need not pursue this discussion further than to cite a leading case decided by the court: Pittsburgh, C. O. & St. L. R. Co. v. Cos, 55 Ohio St. 497, 35 L. R. A. 507, 45 N. E. 641. That case involved the same relief department developed in the present inquiry, and the certificate of membership is precisely like the form now in use by the defendant, and this court held expressly that the contract between the members and the company is not contrary to public policy. We are still satisfied with that decision, and believe it to be entirely sound.

The grounds for ousting the defendant have not been sustained. The Circuit Court correctly so held, and its judgment is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

O. R. COOKE

v.

James L. MARSHALL, Appt.

(191 Pa. 315; 196 Pa. 200.)

1. The increase of stock is not within the implied powers of a corporation.
2. The issue of stock by a cemetery corporation is ultra vires when it is issued without any specific legislative authority.

On rehearing.

3. The acts of trustees of a corporation elected in strict conformity with the by-laws of the corporation for a long period of time, during which their title was unquestioned, will be regarded as entirely legal, although they were elected by holders of stock which the corporation had no power to create.
4. Original members of a corporation, who organized and chose officers to represent the corporation as their successors, cannot, after the lapse of thirty-two years, ignore their former action, and choose new officers upon discovering that the original choice was illegal, where, in the meantime the affairs of the corporation have been regularly carried on under the belief that the first action was legal.

quo warranto proceeding brought to determine the validity of plaintiff's election as secretary and treasurer of the Chartiers Cemetery Company. Reversed.

Plaintiff was elected secretary and treasurer of the company at a meeting of the reorganized board of directors after the stock had been increased. Defendant and others organized a new board of directors ignoring the stock and stockholders by which defendant was elected secretary and treasurer. The stock board has been in control of the property except the corporate seal and books, which were in the defendant's possession. This suit was brought to settle the conflicting rights to the property.

Messrs. William M. Watson, C. S. Fetterman, and J. J. Miller, for appellant:

The creation of the stock was wholly contrary to the purpose of the charter, and void, for it sought to divert the control and management of the company away from the plan intended by the charter, and sought to convert a corporation created for general welfare into one for private control and gain.

Evergreen Cemetery Asso. v. Beecher, 53 Conn. 551, 5 Atl. 353.

If the creation of the stock, or the voting power attached to it, be a matter of doubt, then that doubt requires a decision against the stock.

Whenever anything is authorized, and especially if as matter of duty required to be done by law, and it is found impossible to do that thing unless something else not authorized in express terms be also done, then that something else will be supplied by necessary intendment.

When charters of incorporation prescribe the main objects of the companies formed under them, authority to use the means necessary to attain these objects must be supplied by implication.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Chartiers Cemetery Company was created by an act of assembly approved the 5th day of April, 1862 (P. L. 419). The 1st section of the act created certain named persons, and other persons who might become their associates, into a body corporate "by the name, style, and title of the Chartiers Cemetery Company, and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and shall be capable in law to have and use a common seal and from time to time change the same; to hold, purchase, and dispose of property, real or personal, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded in any court of law or elsewhere; to ordain, pass, and put in execution all such laws, rules, and regulations, not contrary to the Constitution and laws of the United States or of this commonwealth, as shall be necessary or convenient for carrying into effect the objects of the company; and generally to do all such other matters and things as are incident to a corporation." By the 3d section it is made the duty of the corporators to establish a cemetery on the land of James L. Marshall, not less than 30 nor more than 100 acres in extent. The 4th section authorizes the corporation to lay out the ground into lots, plots, avenues, lanes, sites for offices, dwellings for its necessary officers or servants, chapel for religious services, etc., and to sell and convey by deed or otherwise lots, plots, etc., to individuals, societies, or congregations. The remaining sections contain minor provisions for the regulation and management of the cemetery. After the passage of the act, the corporators met and organized the company, 64 L. R. A.

and passed a resolution to establish a cemetery on the ground designated in the act, containing 32 acres and 75 perches, "and for this purpose the capital stock of the said Chartiers Cemetery Company shall be $8,000, divided into 160 shares of the par value of $50 each." A committee was appointed to take subscriptions, and on May 14, 1862, the full amount of stock was subscribed by several persons, and the said stock was issued to J. L. Marshall and his associates in payment for the cemetery grounds. At successive meetings after that the stock was increased,—first to $50,000, and later to $150,000, in consideration of various improvements and expenditures made upon the ground.

The question, then, is, Was the original creation and issue of stock lawful, and, if so, were the subsequent increases lawful? The issue was made for the purpose of performing the original duty to establish a cemetery. It was necessary to acquire land in order to create the cemetery, and the corporators adopted the method of obtaining the land by issuing stock in payment for it. It is not denied that the corporation might have borrowed money for this purpose, and made a mortgage on the property to secure the payment of it, although no such power was expressly conferred by the charter. On the question whether capital stock might be issued for the same purpose where the charter has not specially authorized a capital stock, not a single authority is cited for or against in the paper books of either party. There is no doubt that this particular corporation did possess full corporate powers, and there is also no doubt that it was not only authorized, but expressly enjoined, to create a cemetery of not less than 30 acres in extent, and after that to lay it out into lots and plots, and roads and walks, and to do various other things necessary to its proper development as a cemetery. No method of raising money to acquire the land and do these various things was provided in the charter. The ordinary method in which such things are done is by the creation and issue of capital stock, and it may be argued with apparent reason that it is a necessary implication from the grant of corporate existence and powers that a right to issue stock is conferred. It was decided by this court in Gordon v. Preston, 1 Watts, 385, 26 Am. Dec. 75, that a corporation which, by its charter, is authorized to purchase in fee or for any less estate "all such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and estate, real and personal, as shall be necessary and convenient for them in the prosecution of their works, and the same to sell and dispose of at their pleasure," has power to mortgage its real estate to secure the payment of a debt. In that case there was no power to mortgage conferred by the charter. It is also established by very numerous authorities that corporate stock may be issued in payment for land and other property purchased by the corporation. The rule is thus stated in 1 Cook, Corp. Law, § 18: "An issue of stock for property is one which finds support, not only in the decisions, but in the daily transactions of corporations, and the law does not compel the corporation and the subscriber to go through the useless form of a payment by the corporation to the subscriber of the value of the property, and an immediate repayment of the same money by the subscriber to the corporation on his subscription." Numerous supporting authorities are cited in the notes.

But, while this may be true, it does not reach the present question. In those cases the right to issue stock under the authority of the charter was unquestioned, and it was only a matter of paying for the stock with the property transferred. In this case, however, the charter confers no power to issue any stock, and for such a company as this no such power is needed. It is remarkable that it is so difficult to find either text-book discussion of this subject or adjudicated cases. Whether a corporation without capital provided for in its charter may create and issue capital stock is certainly a fundamental and radical matter in corporation law. In 1 Cook, Corp. Law, § 279, it is said: "The capital stock of all incorporated companies is generally fixed by the charters, which give them an existence." Section 281: "In the absence of express authority from the state, a corporation has no power whatsoever to increase or reduce the amount of its stock, and any attempt on the part of the corporation, either by the corporate officers or by the stockholders, to do so, is wholly illegal and void. . . . Where the attempted increase or reduction of the stock is not authorized by the charter, not even the unanimous assent and agreement of all the parties concerned will legalize it." For this last proposition the case of Droitwich Patent Salt Co. v. Curzon, L. R. 3 Exch. 35, 37 L. J. Exch. N. S. 2, 17 L. T. N. S. 180, is cited, and an examination of that case shows that it fully supports the text. In support of the general proposition as expressed in § 281, supra, there are a number of citations, one of which is Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968, and another is Sutherland v. Olcott, 95 N. Y. 93. Of course, these matters of increase and decrease of capital stock are now regulated by the statute law of the several states, including our own. But the principle upon which the adjudged cases proceed is that the capital stock which is fixed by the charter can neither be increased nor decreased by the officers or the stockholders. In 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 434, the doctrine is thus stated: "A corporation has no implied authority to alter the amount of its capital stock where the charter has definitely fixed the capital at a certain sum. The shares of a corporation can neither be increased nor diminished in number or in their nominal value, unless this be expressly authorized by the company's charter,"—citing many cases. This being the law, it is not easy to see how the two increases of capital stock made in the present case can be sustained. The first increase was made on May 4, 1868, from $8,000, as originally established, to $50,000, and it was done by a resolution passed at a special meeting of the stockholders. The next increase was made on October 5, 1874, from $50,000 to $150,000, also at a meeting of the stockholders. It follows, hence, that the increase of stock being void, all the elections held thereunder since that time are void and confer no authority upon the persons elected. This ruling would dispose of the present contention, but it is perhaps desirable that the original creation of the $8,000 of capital stock should be considered. It is extremely difficult to understand, under the foregoing decisions, how any issue of capital stock by this company can be regarded as valid. The company was chartered to establish a cemetery. While a cemetery company is not necessarily a religious or charitable corporation, yet in many instances it is of that character, and perhaps as a rule this is so. Yet they may be established as merely private enterprises, and carried on for profit. But in either case, if the charter confers no right or power to create capital stock, it is difficult to understand how any right to create and issue such stock has any existence. If capital stock may neither be increased nor diminished without an express power to that effect, how can any stock be created or issued when there is no capital stock fixed by the charter, and no power is given to create it?

In 1 Cook, Corp. Law, § 9, the following definition of capital stock is given: "Capital stock is the sum fixed by the corporate charter as the amount paid in, or to be paid in, by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, and for the benefit of corporate creditors." This definition is quoted and incorporated in the opinion of the supreme court of New Jersey in the case of American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Board, 56 N. J. L. 389, 29 Atl. 160. Mr. Justice Depue, delivering the opinion said: "Capital stock is the sum fixed by the charter as the amount paid in, or to be paid in, by the stockholders for the prosecution of the business of the corporation, and for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation." In the foregoing citations the necessity of fixing by the charter the amount of the capital stock in cases where the authority to issue capital stock is to be conferred is fully expressed. It is true, however, that corporations without capital stock may be created, and may have and exercise valid corporate authority, and of these there are very numerous instances. But the proposition remains that, where a right to issue any capital stock is claimed, the authority to make the issue must be found in the charter. In the case of Barry v. Merchants' Exch. Co., 1 Sandf. Ch. 280, much learning is exhibited in the opinion in the description of various kinds of corporations. Among other things, it is said: "On this subject of the capital stock of a corporation, the elementary treatises are comparatively barren. It is the aggregate amount of the funds of the corporators which are combined together, under a charter, for the attainment of some common object of public convenience or private utility. This amount is usually fixed in the act of incorporation, although we have seen in the statutes of 1823 one exception to this practice. It is thus limited in reference to the convenience of the intended corporators, and for the information and security of the public at large."

In the case of Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 971, Mr. Justice Woods, delivering the opinion, and discussing the question of the right to increase or decrease the stock of a corporation, said: "As a general rule, corporations can have and exercise only such powers as are expressly conferred on them by the act of incorporation, and such implied powers as are necessary to enable them to perform their prescribed duties. . . . And it is well settled that a corporation has no implied power to change the amount of its capital as prescribed in its charter, and that all attempts to do so are void [citing a number of authorities]. In this case the attempt to increase the stock of the company beyond the limit fixed by its charter was ultra vires. The increased stock itself was therefore void. It conferred on the holders no rights, and subjected them to no liabilities."

In the case of Sutherland v. Olcott, 95 N. Y. 100, the corporation having the right to increase its capital stock, which was fixed by the charter at $300,000, from that sum to $1,000,000, did increase it to $600,000, which was held valid. It then undertook to decrease the amount to $489,500, and its right to do this was the question in controversy.

In the opinion the court said: "This action of the company, if valid, was in legal effect a reduction of the capital stock from $600,000 to $489,500, and the inquiry is whether this reduction was authorized. The legal capital stock of a corporation is that fixed by its charter, or by authority derived from the legislature, a corporation has no implied authority to increase or diminish its capital stock. 'If,' said Parker, J., in Salem Mill Dam Corp. v. Ropes, 6 Pick. 23, 'a corporation is created with a fund limited by the act, it cannot enlarge or diminish that fund but by a license from the legislature; and, if the capital stock is parceled out into a fixed number of shares, this cannot be changed by the corporation'" (citing a number of authorities).

Now, if the doctrine of these cases (and there are many more of them) be true, and the act of increasing or decreasing the capital stock of a corporation without specific charter power to do so, is a void act, because it is ultra vires, how can it be true that a corporation may issue any capital stock without having specific legislative authority to do so? We cannot see. If it is ultra vires to increase, it is ultra vires to issue any stock where no power to do so is conferred by the charter. The power to create corporate capital stock is a legislative function, and in any given case, in order that such stock may have a legal existence, the function must be exercised. We are therefore of opinion that all the issues of capital stock made by the Chartiers Cemetery Company were ultra vires and void, and that the plaintiffs were and are not the legally constituted board of trustees of the said company.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and judgment is now entered for the defendant, with costs, under the case stated.

A reargument having been granted, the following response thereto was handed down by Green, J., on May 30, 1900:

We were very willing to grant a rehearing in this case, as it is one of a quite exceptional character, and the leading question at issue is so barren of authority as to make it a case of first impression. We have heard with much interest the able arguments of counsel upon the second hearing, and have given a patient study of the case, but we are unable to see any sufficient reason for changing the conclusions expressed in the first opinion filed. For the reasons there stated, we still think that all the issues of capital stock were entirely illegal and void. As the claimants represented by the plaintiff (of the office of trustees) found their title to the office upon the votes of the holders of capital stock, and we hold that there never was any valid issue of stock, we cannot consider them as having any title to the office claimed. But there can be no doubt, we think, that the administration of the affairs of the company during the long period succeeding the organization of the company must be regarded as entirely legal in all respects. The trustees were originally elected in strict conformity with the by-laws of the company, and their title was never questioned until in the present litigation. They were trustees de facto, and the acts done by them were within the line of their duty as such officials. The claim of title to the office by the defendant and those whom he represented we cannot consider as valid. The function of the original corporators was exhausted when their successors were designated by them, and we do not see how their original authority could be resuscitated by the action of two of their number after a delay of thirty-two years, and a constant acquiescence in the action of the original corporators in establishing their successors in office. We do not consider the title of the defendant and those he represents, to the office of trustee, as of any validity. In this situation, it seems to us that immediate steps should be taken to remedy this anomalous condition of affairs. The corporation is certainly the owner of the property, except such as has been sold to plot holders, and is devoid of a legally constituted managing body. As the private interests of certain parties have always been recognized in the way of a proportionate holding of the corporation, it seems to us that there ought to be no difficulty in effecting a reorganization under the general corporation law of the commonwealth. Of course, we cannot undertake to give advice as to what should be done, nor to be bound by any suggestions we now make; but it may be quite possible that in any such reorganization the proportionate interests of the several parties holding stock can be recognized as the basis upon which the ultimate division of interests may be founded. We make no decision upon the subject, but leave the whole matter open for future consideration. We make no change in the judgment as formerly entered. The judgment of the court below is reversed, and judgment is now entered for the defendant, with costs, under the case stated.

Mitchell, J., dissenting:

By the act of incorporation certain persons were declared and created to be a corporation under the name of the Chartiers Cemetery Company, and as such empowered, not only to carry into effect the objects of the company, but, also, "generally do all such other matters and things as are incident to a corporation," and specifically to establish a rural cemetery on Marshall's land. The power to issue stock was necessarily implied. No mode was provided for the acquisition of the land, and the natural and usual method "incident to a corporation" for that purpose was to obtain subscriptions for stock, and buy the land from the fund thus raised, or by the direct issue of stock to the landowner. It is said that the corporators might mortgage the land, and thus obtain the money. Perhaps so, and perhaps not. There is nothing to show whether they could or not. But, conceding that they might, they were not confined to this mode. The money had to be raised, and there is no evidence that the organizers were willing to contribute it in equal amounts. If not, they could only protect their proportionate interests by a partnership, which the statute did not contemplate, or by the creation of stock. Even if not the only, or even the best, way, it was a reasonable and effective way of performing the express duty laid on the corporation, and was therefore within the discretion necessarily implied by the command of the act. The power subsequently to increase the number of shares is not so clear, but it is not now material to consider.

But, secondly, even if the original issue of stock was ultra vires, the title of the complainants should be sustained until they are deprived of office in some regular and orderly way. They are the de facto and de jure board of trustees, to which the government of the affairs of the corporations is committed by the charter. Section 2 of the act of incorporation provides that "the government of the said company and the management and disposition of its affairs is hereby vested in a board of trustees who shall be elected at such times and in such manner as the said company shall by its rules and regulations direct." Under this section the corporators met and elected the predecessors of complainants by a vote in proportion to the funds each contributed to start the corporation. It was a perfectly lawful mode of election. Even if they had formed a partnership, a regulation that each should have a voice in the management in proportion to his capital invested would have been entirely valid. The act of incorporation commanded the creation of a board of trustees, but left the mode of election wholly to such rules and regulations as the company should establish. The company established the mode of election by stock vote, and, even if the stock was invalid and ultra vires as stock, it was a legitimate means of carrying out the regulation established by the company for the election of its trustees, and has been recognized and acted under as such for thirty-five years. Under it the plaintiffs were duly elected in the same manner as all their predecessors had been, and their title now should be held clear and valid until their successors are elected in accordance with the practice, or the regulation itself is changed in some orderly and legal manner by the full board of the corporators, or their successors or representatives in the present corporation. The appellants are a body of disgruntled stockholders, mere intruders into the government, self-elected by a disorderly and illegal proceeding, not authorized by any regulation of the corporation, but in direct violation of the only corporate regulation on the subject, and the uniform usage for thirty-five years.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Tennessee ex rel. Walker WELL-FORD, Appt.,

v.

J. J. WILLIAMS, Mayor of Memphis.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A citizen and taxpayer of a municipal corporation is not deprived of the right to inspect its books by the facts that an ordinance requires the submission of the books to the inspection of certain officers or committees appointed by them, and that the grand jury has a right to make such inspection.
2. That one seeking to inspect the books of a municipal corporation is politically hostile to their custodian does not deprive him of the right of inspection, unless it is sought with the corrupt purpose of merely furthering such animosity.
3. That inspection of the books of a municipal corporation by a taxpayer will produce worry and inconvenience, and that the transactions shown by them are numerous and involve vast amounts of money, are not sufficient grounds for denying the inspection.

4. Although the right of a taxpayer to examine the books of a municipal corporation is absolute, the court has discretion to refuse to enforce it by mandamus, unless a proper case for the exercise of that right is shown.

5. A citizen and taxpayer should be allowed by the court to make a general examination of the books of the municipal corporation when it is shown to be important to the public interests that such examination be made.

6. The right to make a general examination of the corporate books by a taxpayer of a municipal corporation should not be lightly granted, or permitted with unnecessary frequency; the occasion should be grave and important; and the persons seeking the examination should be trustworthy and reliable, and at all times and at every stage subject to the supervision of the court.

NORM.—Right of taxpayer to inspect books of municipality.

- I. What is a sufficient interest, 418.
- II. Necessity of a sufficient purpose.
 - a. In general, 419.
 - b. What is a sufficient purpose, 420.
- III. The right under statutes, 424.
- IV. Effect of statutory authority to inspect, vested in designated board, 425.
- V. Regulations as to manner of inspection, 426.

I. What is a sufficient interest.

In a number of decisions, while the right of taxpayers or rate payers to inspect municipal or parish records is not in question, the right of freemen, burgesses, corporators, citizens, inhabitants, or residents is discussed, thus being, in effect, relevant decisions as to a taxpayer's right, since the greater class includes the lesser.

Some cases, especially the earlier ones, would seem to indicate that nothing but residence within the municipality was necessary to give a right to inspect public records. Thus, in one early English case, Herbert v. Ashburner, 1 Wils. 297, apparently no restrictions are placed upon the right of inspection on the ground that any special interest in the applicant is necessary. In response to a contention that the applicant ought not to be allowed to inspect the session books of the town, unless he could show that they contained information relating to the specific thing in question, the court said: "These are public books which everybody has a right to see," and ordered a rule absolute without hearing the other side.

So, being an inhabitant of the parish seems to be regarded as the only prerequisite to a right to inspect the records thereof, in Rex v. Clapham, 1 Wils. 305, where mandamus was granted ordering the old overseer of the poor to deliver the books of the poor's rate to the new overseer on the ground that they were public records, and that the overseer and church wardens for the time being ought to have the custody of them, so that all the parishioners might have access to them.

And in Anonymous, 2 Chitty, 290, it was held that a rule for an inhabitant of a parish to inspect parish books might be absolute in the first instance.

In Ex parte Stafford, 1 L. J. K. B. 41, it was declared that the freemen of a borough have an undoubted right, at all seasonable times, to have access to inspect all the charters and grants made to the borough.

And the sworn application of freeholders for a public highway was held, in People ex rel. Palmer v. Vail, 2 Cow. 623, to be a public document belonging in the town clerk's office, and which every inhabitant had a right to inspect.

According to the digest proposition in vol.

7. A writ of mandamus to enable a taxpayer to secure a general examination of the books of the municipal corporation should be allowed where a period of several years is to be covered, and, notwithstanding the collection of vast sums as taxes which are heavy and burdensome, and the borrowing of additional sums, and the opportunity to secure from the legislature the means of raising additional taxes, the mayor finds it necessary to call a meeting of taxpayers to devise means of paving and repairing streets in the city.

8. Pending judicial proceedings to obtain the privilege of making a general examination of the books of a municipal corporation cannot be thwarted by the appointment of a committee on the part of the custodian of the books, or his associates in authority, to make an examination in lieu of the one sought.

4, Brightly's N. Y. Digest, 6500, it was held, in People v. Flack, Daily Reg. May 18, '86, that "the right of the public to have access to indices to records in the office of the clerk of the city and county of New York will be enforced by mandamus."

The case of People ex rel. Henry v. Cornell, 47 Barb. 329, very fully set out in the opinion in STATE ex REL. WELLFORD V. WILLIAMS, went so far in holding that a corporator had the right to a general inspection of the public record of the municipal corporation, even in the absence of any especial interest, as to be a strong authority in favor of a taxpayer's right to do so; but, as is also stated in the opinion above referred to, that decision was reversed without opinion, but by the general term of the supreme court in 35 How. Pr. 31, instead of by the court of appeals, as the opinion states.

A few late American cases go on the theory that a taxpayer, by virtue of his interest as such, has an absolute right to inspect the records of his municipality.

Thus, it was held, incidentally, in McChesney v. People, 178 Ill. 542, 53 N. E. 356, that a property owner had the right to inspect any public record or book in a county tax collector's office, and might enforce that right by appropriate proceedings.

And in Barret v. Godshaw, 12 Bush, 592, where it appeared that the charter of a city provided that all records, official proceedings, and papers of the mayor and general council and other officers under the charter should be deemed public records, the court held that the citizens and taxpayers were bound to take notice of the contents of those records.

In a dissenting opinion in Payne v. Staunton (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 927, it is said: "All that the applicants should be required to show is that they are citizens, taxpayers, and voters, and as such have an interest in the records of an election in which they participated, and have demanded, and been refused, the right to inspect the poll books of such election deposited with the clerk; and on such showing a mandamus should issue as a matter of course, unless the clerk shows that the purposes for which such inspection is desired are unlawful, scandalous, or for some other reason improper."

But, in order to be entitled to an inspection, petitioner must be a resident, for the right of a

A PPEAL by relator from a decree of the Chancery Court for Shelby County denying a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to permit relator to make a general examination of the books of the city of Memphis. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carroll, McKellar, & Bullington and Caruthers Ewing for appellant.

Mr. W. B. Henderson, for appellee:

Neither at common law nor by statute is the duty imposed upon the custodian of public records to allow continuing and permanent inspection and use of the books.

Bean v. People, 7 Colo. 200, 2 Pac. 909; Webber v. Townley, 43 Mich. 535, 38 Am. Rep. 213, 5 N. W. 971; Buck v. Collins, 51 Ga. 391, 21 Am. Rep. 236; 19 Am. & Eng.

rate payer or parishloneer to inspect does not extend outside of his own parish or municipality, and a rate payer outside of a parish has no interest sufficient to allow him to inspect the records thereof.

Thus, in Queen v. Sewer Comrs. 3 Q. B. 670, 3 Gale & D. 92, 11 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 231, 6 Jur. 1059, certain rate payers were allowed to examine all entries of rates and other matters relating to their own parish, but were not allowed to examine documents relating to matters outside.

And where a rate payer claimed that his premises were not within a certain parish, and therefore not liable to be rated therein, he was afterwards refused permission to inspect parish rate books, because he had disclaimed being a parishloneer, and notwithstanding the parish authorities had averred on record that he was a member of that parish. Burrell v. Nicholson, 3 Barn. & Ad. 649.

A rule to allow a freeman of a city, as such, to inspect corporation records in reference to a matter for which he was being sued by the city was discharged upon its appearing to the court that the applicant was not a freeman of that city when the cause of action arose. Bristol v. Visger, 8 Dowl. & R. 434.

II. Necessity of a sufficient purpose.

a. In general.

But most of the decisions, while going on the theory indicated in division I., that a taxpayer or parishloneer, by virtue of his interest as such, has a right to inspect municipal records, nevertheless turn on the sufficiency of the purpose for which the applicant shows that he desires the inspection, and therefore, as the court says in the opinion in STATE ex REL. WELLFORD V. WILLIAMS, "in theory the right of examination is absolute, but in practice it is at last only a matter of discretion."

The court stated in Ex parte Briggs, 1 El. & El. 881, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 272, 7 Week. Rep. 445, that an unqualified right in every taxpayer to inspect parish accounts at any time, and know all that was going on, did not exist; that a parishloneer's right to inspect parish rate books was a mere private right, and that, in order to entitle him to a mandamus to inspect, he

N. S. 4, 31 L. T. N. S. 588, 23 Week. Rep. 136.

If the relator moves for a peremptory writ must show, besides his private right, some special grounds of a public nature.

The rule is stated in State ex rel. Ferry v. Williams, 41 N. J. L. 332, 32 Am. Rep. 219, to be that every person is entitled to the inspection of public documents, provided he shows the requisite interest therein.

In Owens v. Woolridge, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 237, the court was of the opinion that, in view of the fact that several statutes expressly gave the right to examine particular records, the privilege of examining records did not exist in Pennsylvania in the absence of statute, unless the applicant had some particular, tangible interest in the records he wished to examine.

Therefore, the question really comes to what is a reason or purpose for examining municipal records sufficient to entitle a taxpayer to do so. The decisions upon this point are collected in subdivision II., b, following.

b. What is a sufficient purpose.

In England, by the common law, the right of inspection is very guardedly granted by the courts after a consideration of the purpose for which it is desired.

Thus, it has been denied when the inspection was desired for private, rather than public, purposes.

A parishioner was held to have no right to inspect parish books for the purpose of gaining information which might be useful to him in supporting his claim to an estate in the parish, and therefore the court refused a mandamus for that purpose, in King v. Smallpiece, 2 Chitty, 288.

The court refused to compel the vestry clerk to produce and permit copies of parish documents to be taken by an inhabitant of the parish who was defendant in a libel suit prosecuted against him by the vestry clerk, although the applicant contended that an inspection of the documents was absolutely necessary for his defense. But the court held that the vestry clerk could not be compelled to furnish evidence against himself; although, "if the papers had been wanted for the purpose of advancing any parochial right, the case would have been different." May v. Gwynne, 4 Barn. & Ald. 301, 23 Revised Rep. 273.

And in Rex v. Osmond, 4 L. J. K. B. 52, the 64 L. R. A.

upon the pleadings, this motion is equivalent to a demurrer to the action for not stating facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

Harris v. State, 96 Tenn. 513, 34 S. W. 1017; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 521-523; State ex rel. Stewart v. Marks, 6 Lea, 12.

The writ of mandamus is not a writ of right, but lies within the discretion of the court, and should never be granted in doubtful cases.

State v. Commissioners, 1 Shannon's Code, 490; Memphis Appeal Pub. Co. v. Pike, 9 Heisk. 704; Harris v. State, 96 Tenn. 516, 34 S. W. 1017.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding instituted in the chancery court of Shelby county for a man-privilege of inspecting vestry books was denied a parishioner who had appealed against the poor rate, on the ground that the inspection was not clearly shown to be desired for parochial purposes and those only.

So, in Ex parte Briggs, 1 El. & El. 881, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 272, 7 Week. Rep. 445, a mandamus to allow a rate payer the privilege of inspecting church warden's accounts was denied because the affidavit did not clearly show that he desired the privilege bona fide in order to contest a particular church rate for the benefit of the public. The court stated that, had the applicant shown that a church rate was to be made in the parish; that he was liable to be rated to it; that, as such rated inhabitant, he wished to inspect the accounts in order to qualify himself for taking part in the proceedings at the vestry meeting at which the rate would be made; and that he had applied for leave to inspect for that purpose and been refused,—the court would have been bound to grant mandamus.

It was contended in King v. Nottingham Justices, 3 Ad. & El. 500, 5 Nev. & M. 160, 1 H. & W. 318, 4 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 113, that a rate payer had the right to inspect the items of bills and charges to be defrayed out of the county rate for the town and county, for the purpose of contesting them; but the application was denied, partly on the ground that no proper demand had been made, but also for the reason that, if the principle and practice contended for were allowed, the rate payers would become auditors instead of the justices, and the latter would be stripped of their jurisdiction.

In Cox v. Copping, 5 Mod. 396, where an impropiator brought an action in ejectment against parishioners for a house which the parishioners claimed belonged to the parish, he was refused the privilege of inspecting parish books, because it was not a parochial right, but a title, which was in question; also because the production of the parish books would show the parishioner's defense.

While conceding that a burgess has a right to inspect the corporation books where his rights as a burgess are affected, it was held in Stevens v. Berwick-upon-Tweed, 4 Dowl. P. C. 277, 1 H. & W. 517, that an attorney who was suing the corporation for payment for services damus upon the defendant, as mayor of the city of Memphis, to compel him to allow the relator to examine the corporation books of the said city of Memphis with an expert accountant. An alternative writ was issued by the chancellor, to which the defendant responded. Thereupon the relator demanded the peremptory writ on the pleadings as they then stood. The chancellor denied the relief sought, and complainant has appealed and assigned errors.

In order to fully understand the scope of the litigation, it will be necessary to set out the substance of the bill or petition, and of the defendant's response or answer to the alternative writ. Before doing this, in order to properly understand the legal effect of the allegations and averments in the pleadings referred to, it is necessary to state certain rules applicable thereto. In Harris v.

State, 96 Tenn. 496-513, 34 S. W. 1017, it is said: "The power to issue mandamus, and the practice under it, is to some extent regulated in this state by statute. Code 1858, §§ 3567 et seq.; State ex rel. Stewart v. Marks, 6 Lea, 12. By these provisions the return to the writ is made traversable, and the averments of the petition may be put in issue by a denial in the return or answer, in which event the case will be determined by the court, or tried by the jury on evidence. With these exceptions, the proceeding is one largely controlled by the rules of pleading established by the common law. . . . Among these rules, we think the following are well established: (1) Whenever it appears that 'the return fails to answer the important facts alleged in the petition, every intendment and presumption will be made against it.' High, Extr. Legal rendered would not be allowed the right of inspection, although he was a burgess. The court says: "The mere accidental circumstance of his being a burgess cannot give him a right to inspect the corporation books for the purpose of sustaining his private claims. If such applications were allowed, the time of public officers would be perpetually occupied in consequence of them."

But a resident within a town, although not a corporator thereof, was held entitled to inspect the corporation books for the purpose of seeing what a law was which he was charged with having violated, in Harrison v. Williams, 4 Dowl. & R. 820.

And one of the justices, in King v. St. Mary-le-Bone, 5 Ad. & El. 278, 6 Nev. & M. 600, 6 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 150, stated that, on the trial of a cause arising out of disputes in the parish, it was wrong to withhold the public rate books, etc., from any respectable person; but that he did not in this instance feel justified in granting a mandamus in view of local acts in which the right was not clear.

But where the applicant is involved in litigation in the interest or on behalf of the public, the right to inspect the necessary public records has been granted.

A parishioner who was prosecuting a suit to try the validity of a rate was held entitled to inspect the parish books without paying any fee to the person attending to exhibit the books in question, in Newell v. Simpkin, 6 Bing. 565, 4 Moore & P. 895, 8 L. J. C. P. 228. The court refers to a similar rule in St. Martin's in the Fields, St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and St. Paul's, Covent Garden, cases which do not seem to be otherwise reported.

The report of this case, as given in 4 Moore & P. 894, is somewhat different. The reporter there states that a rated parishioner who had sued church wardens for turning him out of a vestry room where the church wardens had met for the purpose of making a rate for the relief of the poor was permitted to inspect and take copies of certain minutes and proceedings entered in the parish books without paying any fees to the person producing them, it appearing that he could not safely proceed to trial without such inspection.

Freemen and burgesses of a corporation were granted a mandamus allowing them to inspect 64 L. R. A.

corporate deeds and documents when they were involved in a dispute with the corporation which was the successor of an old corporation under which they claimed their rights. Reg. v. Beverly, 8 Dowl. P. C. 140, 1 W. W. & H. 343.

But the right to inspect is limited to the necessary records.

In King v. Babb, 3 T. R. 582, a rule in the nature of quo warranto had been granted on the relation of some of the corporators of a town against one claiming to be mayor, to show by what authority he made the claim, and another rule was made, in the same cause, for inspecting "all the corporation" books. It was held, however, that allowing an inspection only of such as related to the election and office of mayor was a sufficient compliance with the order.

It was ordered in Ex parte Stafford, 1 L. J. K. B. 41, that, since the applicants were agreed as to what they desired to inspect, a mandamus should issue confined to those particular documents.

At one time, in King v. Leicester, 4 Barn. & C. 891, a more liberal rule was adopted in regard to what is a purpose sufficient to entitle the applicant to the privilege of inspection. In that case rate payers who desired to inspect and take copies of all records relative to rates imposed upon their parish by the justices of the borough, for the reason that, "upon due investigation, they doubted not, and believed, it would appear that the said justices had raised greater sums upon the inhabitants of the said borough than were necessary and warranted by law," were granted an absolute mandamus allowing them to inspect and take copies of the last two assessments made, orders for the expenditures of the same, and documents and proceedings relating thereto. But this decision met with criticism in a number of subsequent instances where the question arose. One of the justices, in King v. St. Mary-le-Bone, 5 Ad. & El. 278, 6 Nev. & M. 600, 6 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 159, said that he doubted whether King v. Leicester was well decided, and the reporter states, in a note, that, upon a subsequent hearing on return to the mandamus, King v. Leicester was overruled. Upon its authority, counsel contended in King v. Nottingham Justices, 3 Ad. & El. 500, 5 Nev. & M. 180, 1 H. & W. 318, 4 L. J.

Rem. § 461. (2) That allegations not denied, nor confessed and avoided, are taken to be true. Merrill, Mandamus, § 274. (3) That, if the relator moves for a peremptory writ upon the pleadings, this motion is equivalent to a demurrer to the return for not stating facts sufficient to constitute a defense. High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 521, 523; State ex rel. Stewart v. Marks, 6 Lea, 12. With these principles in view, we shall now endeavor to ascertain the facts, as contained in the pleadings.

The petition contains the following allegations: That the relator is a resident citizen and taxpayer of the city of Memphis, and as such one of the incorporators of the city, which is a municipal corporation under and by virtue of chapter 11 of the Acts of 1879 and the acts amendatory thereof; that the defendant is the mayor and chief executive of the said municipality; that as such mayor and chief executive he has the custody of the books of the said city, on which are kept the receipts and expenditures of the funds of the said city; that in the said receipts and expenditures the relator, as a taxpayer and citizen, has a direct interest; that some time before the petition was filed the relator, uninvited, attended a meeting of 200 invited citizens, called by the mayor, for the purpose of devising ways and means to assist the city administration to pave, repair, and "round up," more or less, the streets of the city, and, being interested in the material prosperity of the city, he afterwards attended the meeting of a committee of 15 appointed at the aforesaid meeting of citizens; that the relator, having the interest of a coporator and taxpayer (the financial condition of the city showing the necessity for

Mag. Cas. N. S. 113, that rate payers had the right to demand the inspection of items charged by the justices against the county, but the application was denied. In King v. Staffordshire Justices, 6 Ad. & El. 99, 1 Nev. & P. 260, 6 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 85, the court said that the great authority attached to King v. Leicester induced the granting of an alternative mandamus in order to see what return would be made, and in order deliberately to revise the principles upon which that decision rested, with the result that it would not be supported by deciding the case at bar according to its doctrines. And further, the court declared that rate payers who had nothing more than a rational curiosity to gratify, or the ascertainment of facts useful to them in advancing some contemplated measures in regard to the regulation of their county's expenditures, had therefore merely an interest in the general subject which would furnish an equally good reason for inspecting the records of any other county; and that there was not that direct and tangible interest, which is necessary to bring them within the rule on which the court acts in granting inspection of public documents.

So, too, in Queen v. Harrison, 9 Q. B. 794, 2 New Sess. Cas. 490, 16 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 33, 10 Jur. 981, where King v. Leicester was cited by counsel, a rate payer was denied a mandamus commanding overseers of the poor to permit an inspection of their appointment, when the ground for the inspection was a belief, merely, that the appointment was bad. The court said that it was only a fishing application made in the hope of finding out some defect, the existence of which was not suggested.

An American case, Payne v. Staunton (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 927, adheres to a similar doctrine. It appearing that the object of an attempt by certain citizens, taxpayers and voters, to obtain a mandamus allowing them to inspect poll books and ballots in a county clerk's office, was to know whether election officers had honestly and lawfully performed their duty, and for the purpose of instituting criminal proceedings against them if the disclosure of the facts would warrant it, the court declared that mandamus could not be made a "fishing writ;" also that it could not be had when no pecuniary interest was involved, or to gather evidence for a criminal prosecution; and the relief demanded was refused. Two judges dissented.

But, in conflict with Payne v. Staunton (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 927, it was held, in State ex rel. Ferry v. Williams, 41 N. J. L. 332, 32 Am. Rep. 219, that an inhabitant and taxpayer of a city had such an interest in the proper observance of the provisions of the city charter for licensing saloons as to entitle him to the right to inspect the letters of recommendation filed with the collector of taxes, upon which liquor licenses to sell liquor were granted, when he was aiming at the accomplishment of a public purpose which the courts would allow him to prosecute in a suit instituted by him in the public behalf.

The writer of the dissenting opinion in Payne v. Staunton (W. Va.) 46 S. E. 927, supra, was of the opinion that the inspection of public records (in that case, poll books) for the purpose of the institution of a criminal suit was not an improper purpose, since it was for the benefit and for the interest of the public.

Another, and still more emphatic, authority in favor of the taxpayer's right to inspect, even when his purpose is not direct and tangible, but is for the purpose of examining into the management of the public affairs, and discovering, if possible, any dereliction in that regard, is State ex rel. Colscott v. King, 154 Ind. 621, 57 N. E. 535, where, many of the citizens and taxpayers of a county believing that there had been an unlawful conversion and use of the public funds, one of their number, in a representative capacity, went to the auditor's office for the purpose of inspecting the public records, and, upon being refused permission to do so, applied by petition for a mandamus, which petition was demurred to and the demurrer sustained; but that judgment however, was reversed on appeal. The court, in discussing the sufficiency of the grounds, or nature of the reason, upon which the taxpayer claimed a right to inspect the public documents, has this to say: "The various county officials, in a political sense, are considered as the agents of the people in managing and conducting the business of the county. These officials are commonly denominated—and properly so—"public servants," and are directly responsible to the people who select them for the honest and faithful discharge of the duties and powers with which, under the the providing of additional means for the purposes aforesaid and the tax rate being already very high and very burdensome), thought that business men, in the conduct of their own affairs, ought to know the sources of the revenue of the city and the items of expenditure of that revenue, and thereupon the relator proposed to the said committee to provide for an examination of the books of the city, for the sole purpose of ascertaining the exact financial condition of the city, the sources from which it was received, and for what it had been paid out; that afterwards a subcommittee of 5 was appointed from the said committee of 15; that this subcommittee undertook to make such investigation as was practically of a superficial character, and, having called upon the defendant for such information as would enable the members thereof to have a conception of the amount of revenue received, the sources from which it had been received, and the accounts to which it had been appropriated, the defendant, as mayor, furnished the committee with certain figures, which are exhibited with the bill and marked "A;" that the proposition of the relator for the examination of the city books by experts resulted in a declination by the chairman of the committee of 200 before referred to; and that thereupon the relator demanded of defendant the right to make an examination of the books, records, papers, and vouchers in his possession, claiming as a corporator and taxpayer in and of the city, the right to make a general inspection of the public records of the city, and to make copies of its public documents and records, under such rules and regulations as would insure their safety,—the relator stating at the time law, they are invested. Under such conditions and circumstances, as they exist under the peculiar structure or genius of our government, it would certainly be a harsh interpretation of our laws, and one which would be, in our opinion, adverse to sound reason, to deny any taxpayer or citizen the right, subject to the reasonable rules and regulations previously mentioned, to inspect or examine the public records of his county in order to discover or ascertain whether the public officers had properly administered the funds of the county to which such taxpayer had been required to contribute. In fact there can be no sound reason advanced for depriving a citizen of this right, for it is evident that the exercise thereof, for the purpose in view in this case, will serve as a check upon dishonest public officials; and will in many respects conduce to the betterment of the public service."

State ex rel. Colscott v. Brockman, 154 Ind. 695, 57 N. E. 268, is a companion case to State ex rel. Colscott v. King, 154 Ind. 621, 57 N. E. 535, with identical facts, and decided along the lines laid down in the latter decision.

Thus, it must be admitted that in America, while the sufficiency of the taxpayer's interest in the records he desires to inspect is subject to the consideration of the court, which may, in its discretion, refuse an application for a mandamus giving him the right, nevertheless, the existence of a desire to obtain information for the purpose of ascertaining whether public officers have properly administered the public affairs, and, if they have not, for the purpose of correcting the abuses discovered, is, by several decisions, considered a reason sufficient, according to the spirit of our laws and Constitution, for the granting of judicial permission to inspect the necessary public records, subject, of course, to such regulations as will prevent any interruption or interference with the orderly course of business, or any mutilation or loss of the records or documents examined.

Poll books were held, in State ex rel. Thomas v. Hoblitzelle, 85 Mo. 620, to belong to that class of public records which are open to inspection when the applicant who desires to inspect them shows that the purpose of the inspection is to vindicate some public or private right.

Following State ex rel. Thomas v. Hoblitzelle, 85 Mo. 624, it was held, in State ex rel. Conran v. Williams, 96 Mo. 13, 8 S. W. 771, that registration lists of voters were public records, and therefore subject to inspection for any proper purpose by any inhabitant of the corporation.

The English rule has some adherents in Pennsylvania.

The county marriage license docket was held, in 4 Pa. Dist. R. 162, to be a public record, and therefore open to the free inspection of a citizen and resident of the county for the purposes of publication, during business hours.

But in 4 Pa. Dist. R. 284, where the same question again arose, the court held that, in the absence of statute, the English rule is observed in Pennsylvania,—that only those persons who have a special interest in public records are entitled to an inspection of them; and the order of inspection prayed for was refused.

Subsequently, by the act of May 22, 1895, the Legislature provided that the marriage license docket should be kept open to public inspection.

In Com. ex rel. Walton v. Bair, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 489, the publisher of a newspaper was held entitled to inspect the records relating to liquor licenses, for the purpose of publishing the names of applicants for licenses, by virtue of the interest and right which he held in common with every other citizen. This holding, however, was made in view of a statute which directed the publication of lists of applicants for liquor licenses, and thus apparently invited the examination of such records by the public.

Com. ex rel. Biddle v. Walton, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 287, is based upon the authority of the decisions of other states. In this case mandamus was granted to compel the custodian thereof to permit inspection of all documents relating to a poll tax by a citizen and candidate for office. The court declares it to be settled law in America that every corporator or citizen of a municipality has the right, on all proper occasions, to inspect and copy its records, books, and documents; and that the right, which is not confined to such persons only as may have a special interest in the result of the examination, may be enforced by mandamus against any custodian who fails to give it recognition.

But it was held in Owens v. Woolridge, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 237, that the publishers of a newspaper could not compel the right of inspection by mandamus for purposes of publication, although claiming the right on account of being citizens and taxpayers. The ground of the decision was that the books would be examined with the least possible inconvenience to the mayor and to the other officers of the city government, and that he trusted that the examination might be made without any hard feelings between any officers of the city government and himself, but that this demand was ignored and refused, and treated with contempt and derision.

The petition then proceeds: "The relator is advised by counsel that the books of the city of Memphis are public records, and that as a corporator and taxpayer of said city of Memphis he has the right to inspect them, to make copies of them under such rules and restrictions as will preserve their safety; and he is entitled, to this end, to the benefit of agents and employees, and to the right of a general inspection. That the relator is informed and believes, and upon information of a public character avers the fact to be, that the refusal to grant him the right he claims by the defendant is not based upon any abuse or inconvenience likely to arise by inspection, examination, and making note of the records, or any damage or loss that is likely to ensue by reason of such examination of the records, but is predicated wholly upon the assumed and unwarranted claim of the defendant that the examination sought by the relator and demanded as of right is predicated of political animosity, which the relator, says is ill-founded in fact; he claiming the right purely because of his interest as a corporator and taxpayer, and making the demands to the end that he may know that which he has the right to know,—the exact status financially of the corporation of which he is a member, and what has become of its funds."

that their petition disclosed no particular right or privilege existing in them peculiar to themselves independently of that which they held with the public at large; and the rule is stated to be that records, although public in their nature, are not open for inspection, except to those who have a special and definite interest in them. This case is distinguished by the court from Com. ex rel. Biddle v. Walton, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 287, supra, on the ground that in the latter decision the applicant showed a direct and personal interest in the records he sought to inspect.

Owens v. Woolridge is the last case in which the question has arisen in Pennsylvania so far as discovered.

The whole subject of inspection of public documents in England is, since 1892, almost entirely regulated by statute, as shown in III., infra.

III. The right under statutes.

A few decisions are reported under statutes giving the right of inspection to rate, or tax, payers, or corporators, of specified records or documents.

Thus, it was provided by 17 Geo. II. chap. 28, § 1, that any person assessed for poor rates should be allowed to inspect and take copies from the rate book upon payment of a specified sum.

A rate payer was given permission to inspect poor-rate accounts under this statute, in Rex v. Great Farlington, 9 Barn. & C. 541, 8 L. J. Mag. Cas. 3, although they had been examined and passed. The court said: "We have no doubt that the party is entitled to inspect the books at a reasonable time. Assuming that he has no right to appeal, or that the time for appeal is gone by, he may have other good reason for inspecting the books. He has a right to see what has been done."

But in Rex v. Clear, 4 Barn. & C. 899, 7 Dowl. & R. 393, 4 L. J. K. B. 53, 28 Revised Rep. 498, a rate payer who had applied to inspect church warden's account under the same statute was refused permission to do so because he did not state the reason for which he wished to make the inspection.

Where a statute (32 Geo. III. chap. 58) provided that the officer having the custody of corporation records must permit any member of 64 L. R. A.

the corporation, upon payment of a fee, to inspect the records of the swearing in of freemen, or be liable to a penalty, it was held, in Davies v. Humphreys, 3 Maule & S. 223, that the town clerk did not render himself liable to a penalty when he offered to permit inspection of the entries of admission and swearing in of burgesses, but refused to permit inspection of the common-council book, in which orders therefor were made.

But, according to Schuldham v. Bunniss, 1 Cowp. 192, candidates, agents, or any two freemen empowered by 3 Geo. III. chap. 15, to inspect the entries of freemen entitled to vote, are entitled to inspect all books, papers, etc., in which the admissions of freemen are entered.

In King v. St. Mary-le-Bone, 5 Ad. & El. 276, 6 Nev. & M. 600, 6 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 159, a rate payer claimed the right to inspect rate books ordered by a local statute to be kept for the parish, containing the names of persons assessed, the amount, and the arrears against each outstanding at the end of the year; but the statute, however, did not expressly give the right of inspection. Under another statute other books were kept, containing an account of all the money received and disbursed for parochial purposes, and by this statute it was expressly provided that any person rated might inspect and take copies from said books. By virtue of this latter statute, which, it was claimed, provided for and included the keeping of such a rate book as was compelled to be kept by the act first above referred to, the right of inspection was claimed; but the court, while seemingly of the opinion that ordinarily a rate payer would have a right of inspection of the parish rate books, held that, under the circumstances, the parish having chosen to obtain a peculiar act of Parliament which did not expressly allow inspection, there was no power in the court to interfere in the presence of the statutes and grant mandamus.

In considering a return to a mandamus previously granted to show cause why an inspection should not be allowed, it was held, in King v. Staffordshire Justices, 6 Ad. & El. 99, 1 Nev. & P. 260, 6 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 65, that rate payers could not inspect and copy bills of charges of county officers, which, having been paid by the treasurer under orders of the justices, had become items in his accounts which

The prayer of the bill was for an alternative mandamus and for ultimate relief in accord with the substance thereof. An alternative writ was issued in accordance with the prayer of the petition or bill, and thereupon the defendant filed his answer.

The answer does not deny that the relator was, at the time the petition was filed, a resident citizen and taxpayer of the city of Memphis; that he attended the meeting of citizens mentioned in the petition; that this meeting was called for the purpose stated; that the relator also attended the meeting of the subcommittee of 15, and that he proposed to the committee to provide for an examination of the books; that the subcommittee of 5 was appointed as stated, and that the defendant furnished to that committee the figures mentioned in the petition; that the relator's request for an examination of the city's books by experts was declined by the chairman of the committee of 200; and that thereupon he demanded of the defendant the right to make an examination of the books, records, papers, and vouchers of the city, claiming as a corporation and taxpayer the right to make a general inspection of the public records of the city, and to make copies of its public documents, under such rules and regulations as would insure their safety, and that this demand was refused by him. These facts, therefore, must be treated as established.

In response to the allegation that he was the custodian of the books and papers referred to, the answer contains the following: "He denies that he is the custodian of the city's books as set forth in complainant's bill of complaint. His connection with or power over said books is controlled by or-had been passed by orders of sessions, and, the treasurer having been discharged, had been deposited by the clerk of the peace among the county records, and an abstract thereof had been published in pursuance of statute. One of the grounds of this decision was that the statute providing for the course of proceedings did not in express terms provide for an inspection by rate payers.

Under consolidation act (Laws 1882, chap. 410), § 50, providing that all books or papers in any department of the city government of New York, except the police department, should at all times be open to the inspection of any taxpayer, subject to reasonable rules and regulations, a petitioner showing by his petition that he was a citizen and taxpayer of that city, and had been refused permission to inspect, for a proper purpose, records of death in the vital statistics of the health bureau, by the clerk in charge, was granted an order permitting him to inspect the records specified. Neville v. Board of Health, 29 Abb. N. C. 59, 21 N. Y. Supp. 574.

Where, by statute, it was provided that the officers of any county, city, or town records should furnish proper facilities for the examination of the records upon file in their offices, to all persons having occasion to make examination of them for any proper purpose, it was declared, in Burton v. Tuite, 78 Mich. 363, 7 L. R. A. 73, 44 N. W. 282, to be the intent of the legislature to assert the right of all citizens, in the pursuit of a lawful business, to make such examinations of public records as the necessity of their business might require.

Even when the right is conferred by statute the application will be denied if not made in good faith.

Thus, in Reg. v. Wimbledon, 77 L. T. N. S. 599, a rate payer who applied for a mandamus to compel a burial board to allow his attorneys to inspect its books, under a statute allowing the privilege to rate payers, was refused his request, it appearing that the attorneys were in the employ of other parties who were not rate payers, and for whom the inspection was in reality desired.

The English municipal corporation act of 1882 provides, in reference to the inspection of public documents, that the minutes of proceedings of the council shall be open to the inspection of a burgess upon payment of a fee of 1 64 L. R. A.

shilling, and that a burgess may make a copy thereof or take abstracts therefrom. The treasurer's accounts are open only to the inspection of the city council, members of which may make copies thereof or take abstracts therefrom; but the abstracts of the treasurer's accounts, made by the city council, are open to the inspection of all rate payers of the borough, and copies thereof may be had by them upon payment of a reasonable fee. By the same act a burgess is defined to be one of full age, in occupation of any qualifying property in the borough, who has been rated according to such property for all poor rates for the parish, and has paid the same, etc.

IV. Effect of statutory authority to inspect, vested in designated board.

It was contended in State ex rel. Colscott v. King, 154 Ind. 321, 57 N. E. 535, that since a statute provided that the county treasurer should at all times keep his office and books subject to the inspection of the board of county commissioners, the right and duty, therefore, of the county commissioners must be held to be an exclusive one, debarring any citizen or taxpayer from that right; but the court held the contention to be of no force,—especially in view of another statute providing that "all the books, accounts, vouchers, papers, and documents, touching the business or property of the county, shall be carefully kept by the auditor, and open to the inspection of any person."

This bears out the holding of the court in STATE EX REL. WELLFORD V. WILLIAMS, that the existence of an ordinance requiring the submission of the municipal records to the inspection of the mayor, or members of the legislative council, and providing that the grand jury has the right to make such an inspection, is not exclusive, and does not thereby deprive a citizen and taxpayer of the right of inspection.

But in Owens v. Woolridge, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 237, it appearing that provision had been made by statute for the investigation, annually, of the official conduct of county commissioners, and the settlement of their accounts by the county auditors, to whom all papers, records, and vouchers were directed to be exposed,—from whose settlement, ordered to be published annually, the taxpayers were given the right of dinance, which provides as follows: "The mayor shall have power to inspect such of the books, papers, and records of the officers of the city as may, in his opinion, be necessary to enable him to discharge the duties imposed upon him, and may call upon all of the officers of the city to furnish him in writing with any information connected with the respective offices." Respondent states that under the legislative enactment creating the city of Memphis, and the acts amendatory thereof, the government of the said city is vested in a board of fire and police commissioners, a board of public works, and a legislative council. "The entire government of the city of Memphis, under and by virtue of the charter of the taxing district of Shelby county and the amendments thereto, is lodged in said two boards and legislative council and such agents as they and the mayor may appoint. The custody and the control of all of the property of the city, its books, and cash funds are under the control and supervision of said boards and legislative council, and county trustee of Shelby county; he being the tax collector of the city. Respondent further states that, under the legislative enactments creating the city of Memphis and the ordinances thereof, the custody of all the city books is vested in the secretary and bookkeepers of the various city departments, the county trustee, and a general secretary of the city government, who do not hold them for, or subject to, the orders of the mayor, but as the officers and representatives of the board of fire and police commissioners and the board of public works and the legislative council of the city of Memphis, and subject to such duties with regard to the same as are imposed upon them by law. Respondent has not the right, under and by virtue of the laws and ordinances of the city of Memphis, to grant the inspection of the books demanded by complainant in his bill."

In an amended answer he adds concerning the custody of the books as follows: "Respondent does not have the charge or control of the books of the city, as he has already explained; they being in the possession and control of W. B. Armour, the secretary of the city, and other secretaries and bookkeepers, who are under heavy bond for the correct and honest keeping of the books, their custody, preservation of papers, etc." The matters here referred to are partly matters of law and partly matters of fact, and the question as to the defendant's right of custody to the papers and records referred to will have to be determined later by the language of the charter, taken in connection with the ordinance above referred to and the facts above stated.

As to the refusal on his part to allow the relator to make the extended examination he demanded the opportunity of making, while not denying that he had so refused, he answered, further, that he had never refused to relator, as a citizen of Memphis, "the right personally to inspect the appeal.—It was held that no right existed to have the minute books and other records of the commissioners kept open for public inspection prior to the annual settlement by the county auditors.

V. Regulations as to manner of inspection.

It was contended in State ex rel. Colscott v. King, 154 Ind. 621, 57 N. E. 535, that the examination sought to be obtained by a taxpayer was incompatible with public policy, inasmuch as it might subject the public records to loss and mutilation, and interfere with the duties of the office, and consume the time of public officials without compensation; but the legislative intention to recognize the right of any person to inspect the public records in the county auditor's office was held to be plainly indicated by a statute providing that "all the books, accounts, vouchers, papers, and documents, touching the business or property of the county, shall be carefully kept by the auditor, and open to the inspection of any person;" although the court said that, of course, this right of inspection was not to be viewed as one wholly unqualified or free from all restrictions, but must be so accepted and exercised by the inspector as not materially to interrupt or interfere with the officer in the discharge of his official duties; and that it was the right and duty of the latter to make and enforce such reasonable rules and regulations as would prevent the mutilation or loss of the records or documents.

The court remarks, in Com. ex rel. Biddle v. Walton, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 287, that the right of inspection of the public records of a city, by the citizens thereof, must be exercised under such regulations as are reasonably necessary for the safety of the records sought to be inspected, and in such manner and at such times as not to interfere with the business of the office where they are stored.

The privilege of custodians of public records to make and enforce proper regulations consistent with the public right of inspection is recognized in Burton v. Tuite, 78 Mich. 363, 7 L. R. A. 73, 44 N. W. 282.

It is stated, arguendo, in Cormack v. Wolcott, 37 Kan. 384, 15 Pac. 245, that "the right to inspect must, of necessity, have some restrictions, and must be exercised under such rules as the register may fairly impose, that will tend to the safety and preservation of his trust."

It was declared in State ex rel. Thomas v. Hoblitzelle, 85 Mo. 620, that courts will, by mandamus, compel the inspection of public records on condition that the inspection be made under such reasonable rules and regulations as the court or officer having them in charge may impose.

The right of the court granting the mandamus, to regulate the manner of the inspection by orders from time to time, is declared in the opinion in STATE EX REL. WELLFORD v. WILLIAMS.

M. M. M.

books of the city in any reasonable manner, which this respondent has never denied to any citizen, but has at all times been ready to concede and accord [this] to all." We construe this to mean that he has not denied the right to make an examination for any special or particular matter. But, taking this in connection with other parts of the answer, we infer that the defendant did not consider as reasonable the demand made by the relator for a general examination, such as is claimed in the petition, and that the demand for such examination he did refuse.

Upon the subject of the motive and animus of the relator, after referring to the proposition for an examination made by the relator to the committee called by defendant, the answer proceeds: "Respondent states that the complainant is very hostile politically to him, and to the present city administration, and he believes that the design of the said proposition, made at the time it was, or the effect of it, was, or would be, not to promote and aid, but rather to impede and thwart, the objects and purposes had in view when said citizens were invited to meet to consider the subject of streets. Respondent, under the circumstances, regarded the proposition of complainant as an intended obstacle to what he was desiring to accomplish for the good of the city of Memphis, and did not accede to the demand."

After setting out the fact that he had addressed a letter to certain well-known gentlemen in Memphis, asking them to consent to act as a committee to examine the books of the city, and that, upon their expressing a willingness to act, they had been appointed for that purpose and to perform that duty by the legislative council of the city of Memphis, the answer set forth the following correspondence that passed between the chairman of that committee, Mr. A. S. Caldwell, and the solicitors of the relator, as indicating and throwing light upon the motive and purposes of the relator in demanding the examination. The first letter is as follows:

Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 11, 1903.

Carroll, McKellar, & Bullington and Caruthers Ewing,

Attorneys for W. L. Wellford.

Dear Sirs:—

I am instructed by the committee who have accepted Mayor Williams's invitation to supervise the examination of the city's books to address this communication to you and to make the same public. We call your attention to the letter of the mayor, dated February 10, 1903, published in the daily papers, which conferred upon us full authority to make this examination without any limitations whatever, and with the power to increase our membership. We accepted the mayor's invitation because we believed this work was a public duty we should not shirk. We desire the investigation to be made in a thorough and comprehensive manner, and under such supervision that the report, when made, will command the respect and confidence of the whole community. We believe that this can best be accomplished with the co-operation of your client, and therefore suggest that all legal proceedings be dismissed, and that you select five prominent citizens, irrespective of their business occupations, and we will appoint them members of our committee. If desirable to further increase the committee, the new committee of ten may do so. If this proposal is accepted by you, it will not be necessary for Mr. Wellford, or those interested with him, to contribute any money toward the examination. Our sole object in making this proposal is a sincere desire to obtain your co-operation, to the end that only one examination shall be made, and that by a committee representing all of the citizens of Memphis. Will you kindly let me hear from you by 11 o'clock tomorrow?

By order of committee.

Albert S. Caldwell, Chairman.

The reply to this is set forth in the answer as follows:

Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 11, 1903.

Mr. A. S. Caldwell,
City.

Dear Sir:—

Referring to your call on yesterday, when you requested that Mr. Wellford select five more members to be added to your committee, and let the increased committee of ten select accountants and examine the books of the city, we wish to make the following suggestion in lieu thereof: Mr. Wellford has put up his money and can close his contract at any time with accountants to examine the books. We suppose that your committee has the funds and can do likewise. Why not, then, simply let the accountants employed by your committee and those employed by Mr. Wellford get to work on the books and examine them? In this way there will certainly be an examination of the books, concerning which no one can complain, and in which examination no one can be injured. We submitted the matter to our client, Mr. Wellford, who directs us to say that, the mayor having assumed such a hostile attitude toward him, he is now, in justice and fairness to himself, unwilling to take part in any examination of the city books unless he has the legal right to do so. Mr. Wellford directs us to say to your committee that we shall be glad to meet you in conference at any time.

Very truly yours,
Carroll, McKellar, & Bullington.
Caruthers Ewing.

The answer further avers that, prior to the reception of this letter from the attorneys of Mr. Wellford, the aforesaid Mr. Albert S. Caldwell, as chairman of the committee of five, had addressed another communication to the said attorneys, and in reply thereto received the following:

Memphis, Tenn., Feby. 12th, 1903.
Mr. A. S. Caldwell,
Chairman, City.

Dear Sir:—

After conferring with our client, Mr. Walker L. Wellford, we have concluded to accept for him your proposition that we select five prominent citizens, who, with the five gentlemen selected by the mayor, shall constitute a committee of investigation of the city's books and affairs, subject, however, to the following express conditions: The scope of the investigation to be conducted shall embrace the following:

(1) A thorough and complete examination of all books, contracts, vouchers, and other documents in any way bearing on the conduct of the city's affairs during Mayor Williams's administration. The committee to be aided by such reputable expert accountants and other agents and employees as may be necessary, who shall be named by the five citizens selected by us.

(2) A searching and exhaustive investigation, with a view of being able to report definitely as to: (1) The disposition of all taxes and revenues collected by the city. (2) The amount collected, and the methods employed in collecting money, from gamblers and other violators of the law, and the disposition made of same. (3) Whether all persons appearing on the city's pay rolls rendered services to the city. (4) Whether improper influences have been brought to bear on any member of the city council for the purpose of securing franchises or other concessions; if so, specify same. (5) Whether relations between members of the city council and corporations granted franchises or concessions have been entirely proper and legitimate. (6) Whether money has been borrowed, or direct or indirect benefits of any kind have been received by members of the city council, from such corporations or individuals granted franchises or privileges. (7) Whether any city official has been or is interested, directly or indirectly, in contracts awarded by the city for paving or other purposes. (8) Whether mayor or other member of the city council has used his position for personal profit. (9) The relation of the mayor or any member of the city council, directly or indirectly, to gamblers, those selling liquors without license, and those who are permitted to carry on their business, though under the ban of the law. (10) Whether the city has received adequate compensation for its franchises, and whether it has received materials, services, etc., on reasonably fair terms, or whether considerations other than those of the best interests of the city have entered into such matters. (11) Whether the affairs of the city during Mayor Williams's administration have been conducted in an honest, economical, and businesslike manner, or otherwise. (12) Whether the contracts, purchases, or sales made by the city during the present administration have been made in accordance with the law, after proper advertising, or whether any of such contracts, purchases, or sales have been made privately, or in any other way in violation of the law.

(3) That every member of the committee shall bind himself to adopt such means and to employ such agencies as may be necessary to conduct a thorough and earnest investigation in accordance with this agreement, and to this end that any witnesses whose names may be suggested by three or more of the committee shall be summoned, and every member of the committee shall demand that said witness shall answer any and all questions that may be propounded by the committee bearing on the subjects of inquiry herein set forth, and a refusal to answer shall call forth the censure of the entire committee. That the money provided for the examination shall be used by the committee for the above purposes. That the chairman of the organized committee of ten shall be named by the five gentlemen selected by us.

Having stated that you desire the investigation to be made in a thorough and comprehensive manner, and under such supervision that the report, when made, will command the respect and confidence of the whole community, we feel assured that you will accept the above conditions, by which alone, in our opinion, this much desired result can be achieved. On receiving the unanimous approval of these terms, we will at once select the five gentlemen whom we wish to co-operate with the five appointed by the mayor, all of whom can then meet, organize, and proceed to business.

Very truly yours,
[Signed] Carroll, McKellar, & Bullington.
Caruthers Ewing.

To this letter the committee replied as follows:

Memphis, Tenn., Feby. 12th, 1903.
Messrs. Carroll, McKellar, & Bullington, and Caruthers Ewing, Attorneys for Walker L. Wellford.

Dear Sirs:—

Your letter of Feby. 12th has been referred to my committee, and I am instructed to reply as follows: Your proposals that we shall have no voice in the selection of accountants and other agents and employees connected with the investigation, and that the chairman of the reorganized committee shall be selected by you, reflects such want of confidence in us that we can see but little hope for useful and harmonious action along the lines you suggest. We are still of the opinion that the investigation should be impartial, and, as far as possible, free from public criticism; and to evidence our entire disinterestedness we now propose that you and we jointly request Chancellor Heiskell to select a committee of five or ten, as his judgment may seem best, to conduct this investigation. If you agree in this, we will join you in an immediate request to the chancellor to name this new committee, and upon its appointment we will tender to the city council our resignation, with a request that they appoint the chancellor's committee in our stead. Kindly give me an answer as early to-morrow as possible.

Sincerely yours,

[Signed] Albert S. Caldwell, Chairman.

The answer avers: "Thus closed the repeated attempts of the city government and a committee of five to bring about the representation of all conflicting interests in an examination which should have been satisfactory to every citizen in the entire city of Memphis."

With respect to the selection of the committee whose chairman conducted the foregoing correspondence with the attorneys of the relator, the answer contains the following: "Respondent further states that, as complainant persisted in insisting on an investigation of the city's books by himself or others designated by him, without pursuing the course prescribed and authorized by law, this respondent, in order to satisfy any reasonable demands of the complainant, or the desires of any other citizens, addressed a communication to Messrs. M. S. Buckingham, J. A. Omberg, James Nathan, C. W. Schulte, and A. S. Caldwell, requesting that they take charge of the matter of the investigation of the city's books, and to have them thoroughly examined by bonded expert accountants. These gentlemen agreed to serve in the matter. The complainant objected to this, and was himself determined to have a hand in such examination. Re- 64 L. R. A.

spondent states that the above five named gentlemen are citizens of Memphis, of the very highest character and standing in the community, socially and commercially, and are men of spotless reputation for fairness, honor, and integrity. Not one of them will suffer if a comparison is made between him and the complainant. Any work which they may agree to undertake will be honestly done, and the result would entirely satisfy the public at large."

The answer then sets out the correspondence between the gentlemen referred to and the defendant, Williams, the substance of which was an offer to appoint them a committee to make an examination and their acceptance. The answer then sets out a communication from the mayor to the legislative council, asking that body to ratify his action in appointing the committee, and a resolution of the council making such ratification of the appointment and organization of the committee for the purpose of conducting a fair, impartial, and thorough examination of the books of the city of Memphis by such means and in such manner as they may decide on, and appropriating $5,000 for the purpose.

The amended answer contains the following upon the same subject: "Respondent states that, since the filing of the answer on yesterday, February 18, 1903, the said committee reported to the board of police and fire commissioners that they had selected to do the said work the American Audit Company of New York, which is an institution of as high standing, character, and integrity as any in America; and the board of fire and police commissioners approved of said selection and recommendation, and placed said audit company immediately in charge of the books, papers, and vouchers of the city for the purpose indicated, and it is in charge and control of the same, in pursuance of the authority given said committee by said city council. Respondent submits that there should be no interference with the said work by either the complainant, respondent, or this honorable court. While respondent denies the right of the complainant to make such an examination as he had demanded of the books of the city through any agent he may appoint, and while respondent does not have the control of said books, yet so far as he is concerned, or is permitted to express his views, he states that he is perfectly willing that the complainant, Wellford, should select, and that the court should appoint, a competent bonded expert accountant to examine, check over, and verify the work of said American Audit Company, and he would be glad to have this done. Respondent believes that the legislative council of the city would not object to this, although he has no authority to speak for them. The matter, however, is entirely in charge of the aforesaid committee of five, and respondent cannot interfere with them, nor in any way speak for them; but he believes from their high character, impartiality, and disinterestedness, that they would accede to any reasonable request made of them in the matter, to the end that the result shall be satisfactory."

The answer contains the following as further reasons why the relator has not a right to enforce a personal examination of the city's books on his part: "In addition to the lack of control of said books as already stated, respondent states that it is provided by the ordinance of the city of Memphis how an examination of the books shall be made, and who has the right and authority to grant the same. The ordinance controlling this matter was passed as early as the year 1879, in the month of February, shortly after the city of Memphis under its present form of government was created, and years before this respondent held any official position in the city government. The ordinance is as follows: 'Every officer or agent of the city shall at all times, when requested, submit his books and official papers to the inspection of the mayor, or any member of the legislative council, or to any person or committee appointed or authorized by the legislative council to examine the same.' City Digest (Watkin's ed.) p. 168. Respondent avers that by this ordinance the mayor or any member of the legislative council may inspect the books, and that the legislative council of the city is vested with the sole and exclusive authority to determine when, how, and by whom examinations shall be made of the papers, books, and records of the city of Memphis; and therefore your respondent denies the right of the complainant to inspect, or to make copies of the records from, the books of the city of Memphis, and this honorable court is without authority of law to grant or decree the same. Respondent would aver that it would cause a great deal of confusion, worry, and much inconvenience to the business of the city of Memphis, and to the various officers of the said city and other employees, to allow any and every one, at their own whim and desire, to make a continuous examination of the books, vouchers, and papers of the city, as the various officers thereof and their deputies would be required to keep a close and careful supervision over any and all examinations of the books and vouchers constituting the public records of the city of Memphis. They involve transactions covering a period of five years, and many millions of dollars, and it would take at least five or six months to make a complete and thorough investigation of all of the affairs of the said city, during which period much valuable time would be lost by its employees and officers, public business would be interfered with, and the establishment of such a right would cause great damage to the public service, and would place within the power of the political enemies of the city administration, or any person, upon the least pretext and slightest suspicion, to demand and inaugurate examinations of the city books, which examinations would impede the public service and impair the usefulness of the various departments of the city. With such possibilities confronting it, the city of Memphis, as set forth herein, in the year 1879, passed the ordinance hereinbefore referred to, in order to provide and regulate such an examination as this complainant is now desiring at the hands of this honorable court. Respondent further states that, in addition to the said authority for and mode of examining the city books, under the law and ordinance aforesaid, the power to examine the books of all officials, state, county, and municipal, is vested by the law in the grand jury of Shelby county, which body has full power in the premises, not only to inspect and examine the papers, books, and records of the city officials, but also to summon witnesses and interrogate them, and examine and report upon the condition of the records of the city, and any wrongdoing or delinquency of this respondent, or any other official of the city of Memphis. Respondent submits that, under the foregoing provisions of the law, the complainant has no right to the inspection of the city records, as is claimed by him in his bill, in person and by his agents and employees, but that the grand jury of the county is the body designated by the law to perform this public service, and that it is their province and duty to act in the premises; and if they fail in this regard, or if any citizen or committee desire an investigation of the books of any city official, the law prescribes that the legislative council, upon proper application to it, may have this done."

It was stated in the beginning of this opinion that the relator, upon the coming in of the answer to the alternative writ, had made demand for the peremptory writ. As a matter of fact, while this was, in substance, what was done, the form of the proceeding was different. The decree of the court below recites that the cause has been specially set down for hearing by the complainant, or petitioner, on the bill or petition and the answer of the defendant, and was so heard. The effect of such an order would be, under our chancery rule, to treat every fact properly set out and averred in the answer as proved and as true. So the same result is reached as if the petitioner had formally demanded the peremptory writ, upon the coming in of the aforesaid answer to the alternative writ; the latter act, as already stated, being equivalent to a demurrer to the said answer or return. It results that we must treat every averment of fact in the answer, for the purposes of the present hearing, as true, and, after consideration thereof, either grant or deny the peremptory writ.

Turning to the legal questions involved, we shall first consider whether the relator, as one of the corporators of the municipality, has the right to make the general examination he asks for in the petition. Several authorities have been cited to us by the counsel for the respective parties.

For the petitioner we are cited to Herbert v. Ashburner, 1 Wils. 297; King v. Babb, 3 T. R. 582; Rea v. Great Faringdon, 9 Barn. & C. 541, 8 L. J. M. C. 1, and other authorities which will be presently stated.

In Herbert v. Ashburner there was a rule made to show cause why the defendant should not have the liberty of inspecting the books of the session of the corporation of Kindale. It was objected that the party was not entitled to see the books, unless he could show to the court by affidavit that they contained matters relating to the thing in question, which was whether certain park lands were within the town or corporation of Kindale. Upon this matter the court said: "These are public books which everybody has the right to see." The rule was thereupon made absolute, without more.

In King v. Babb, when a rule had been granted for an information in the nature of a quo warranto against A. to show by what authority he claimed to be mayor of G., on the relation of some of the corporators, and another rule in that cause for inspecting all the corporation books, papers, etc., directed to the town clerk, an inspection of such only as related to the election and office of mayor was held to be a sufficient compliance with the latter rule, so as to protect the town clerk from an attachment as for a contempt of the court; it appearing that he had acted bona fide. But Lord Kenyon, in that case, in rendering judgment, assumed "that in certain cases the members of the corporation may be permitted to inspect all papers relating to the corporation."

In Rea v. Great Faringdon, 9 Barn. & C. 541, 8 L. J. M. C. 1, it was held that a rated parishioner had a right to inspect the accounts of the expenditure of the parish moneys, kept by the guardians for the poor, appointed under 22 Geo. II., chap. 83, and the court granted a mandamus to the guardians, etc., commanding them to allow such inspection.

In Glover on Municipal Corporations, 262, it is said: "Every corporator has a right to inspect all the records, books, and other documents of the corporation upon all proper occasions, and if, upon application for that purpose, the officer who has the custody refuse to show them, the court will grant a mandamus to enforce his right."

In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 303, it is said: "The following points have been ruled as stated by Mr. Willcock: Every corporator has a right to inspect all the records, books, and other documents of the corporation upon all proper occasions; and if, upon application for that purpose, the officer who has the custody refuse to show them, the court will grant a mandamus to enforce his right." Again the same author says in § 848: "In this country the records, books, and by-laws of municipal corporations are of a public nature, and if such a corporation should refuse to give inspection thereof to any person having an interest therein, or perhaps for any proper purpose, to any inhabitant of the corporation, whether he had any special or private interest, or not, a writ of mandamus will lie to command the corporation to allow such inspection, and copies to be taken under reasonable precautions to secure the safety of the originals."

The relator also referred to People ex rel. Henry v. Cornell, 47 Barb. 329, not as an authority (because the decree in that case was subsequently reversed by the court of appeals, without any written opinion, however), but for the benefit of its reasoning. In the course of his opinion in that case, Mr. Justice Barnard in part said: "Upon the argument, I was strongly of opinion that such corporator had such right, and subsequent reflection and investigation have confirmed that opinion. It was claimed, and strongly urged upon in the argument, that the corporator had the right to inspect such records only when he had some private interest for the enforcement and protection of which the inspection of said document is necessary, and that even then the inspection must be limited to those documents; and it was claimed that this rule was established by the English decisions. I have examined the English authorities referred to on the argument, and also such as I have been able to discover in the books, and think that none of them so restrict the right of inspection, while many of these distinctly uphold the right of a general inspection." And, again: "I see no principle upon which it can be held that the corporator of a municipal corporation has not the right to a general inspection of the public records. It is true that the whole body of the corporators acting through their legally constituted representatives, as well, perhaps, as the legislature under which the corporation holds its charter, may make laws and ordinances restricting the right of general inspection; but, unless there is such restriction, I am unable to see any principle upon which it can be held that a corporator has not the right to a general inspection of 'public records of the corporation.' In the language of the court in Herbert v. Ashburner: "These are public books, which everybody has a right to see." And, again: "The citizens within the corporate limits constitute the corporation, while the mayor, aldermen, common council, street commissioner, and others, are its officers or agents, to whom are confided, under certain restrictions, the care and management of the property, business, and interests of the corporation. If, from the bare facts that the corporation can only act through officers or agents, and that, therefore, officers are appointed to whom the care of the property, business, and interests of the corporation are intrusted, and who are subject to removal before the time for which they are appointed has expired, and who are also subject, on the expiration of their terms, to be replaced by others at the will of the corporators, it results that, immediately on the appointment of such officers, the corporators have no longer any interest in the manner in which their property, business, and interests are cared for, conducted, and looked after by their agents, then it also follows that the corporators would have no right to inspect the books and papers in the custody of the officers relating to their official business. If, however, the corporators, notwithstanding the appointment of such officers, still retain an interest in the manner in which their property, business, and interests are cared for, conducted, and looked after, then it follows that they have a right to as full knowledge of all the official acts of their officers as the officers themselves have, so as to enable them to ascertain whether their officers have performed their duty in such manner as is acceptable to them, with the view to determine whether they will continue them in office or not."

In that case it appeared that the relator was a citizen of New York, and that the defendant was an officer of the corporation, being the head of the street department, and the street commissioner. The affidavit, among other things upon which the application was founded, set forth that the defendant, as such street commissioner, had in his custody certain contracts for various public works done under his direction, and certain vouchers, pertaining to the payment of public moneys of the corporation, made out for such works; that the relator had the right, as a member of the corporation, to see and inspect all such contracts and vouchers, and that it was the duty of the defendant to exhibit them to any member of the corporation; and that the relator had applied to the defendant in August, 1866, for permission to see such documents, and had been refused. It was held, under the foregoing opinion, that the relator was entitled to the inspection he asked, and had the right to make such copies of the record as he desired, and accordingly a peremptory writ of mandamus was awarded him. As before stated, however, the decree in this case was reversed in the court of appeals; but, no opinion having been handed down, we do not know what the ground of reversal was.

The relator refers to certain other cases—King v. Shelley, 3 T. R. 141, 1 Revised Rep. 673; King v. Allgood, 7 T. R. 746, 4 Revised Rep. 574; Rogers v. Jones, 5 Dowl. & R. 484, 27 Revised Rep. 529; King v. Lucas, 10 East, 235, 10 Revised Rep. 283; King v. Tower, 4 Maule & S. 162, 16 Revised Rep. 428,—which, indeed, are referred to in some of the text-books above mentioned; but they do not seem to bear, in strictness, on the point we now have under examination, referring, as they do, to the inspection of court rolls or records.

The defendant replies the American cases bearing substantially upon the same class of records, or similar ones. He refers to Buck v. Collins, 51 Ga. 391, 21 Am. Rep. 236. It appears that the complainant there insisted upon the legal right to go into the office of the clerk of the supreme court, who was also the register of deeds, and make from the books an abstract of them. As he did not need the aid of the clerks, he insisted that he was entitled to do this without paying any fees. Section 14 of the Code of Georgia declares that all books kept by any public officer shall be subject to the inspection of all citizens of the state, within office hours, every day except Sunday. The fee bill provided fees for inspection and abstracts as follows: For such inspection when the clerk's aid is required, 25 cents, and for examination of books and abstracts of result, $1. Under this law the complainant insisted that he had a right to go into the clerk's office, during office hours, from day to day and from month to month, at his pleasure, and copy from the books when they were not in use, and thus collect material for a book which he proposed to publish for sale. As he was able, by employing experts, to do this inspection and compilation himself, without the assistance of the clerk, he insisted that no fee was required, and, as the clerk refused to allow him to go on, except upon the payment of a fee for each separate investigation of the title, he prayed that the clerk might be enjoined.

To the same effect, in substance, was cited, also, the cases of Webber v. Townley, 43 Mich. 538, 539, 38 Am. Rep. 213, 5 N. W. 971, and Bean v. People, 7 Colo. 201, 2 Pac. 909. They are cited by the defendant as supporting the general proposition that neither at common law nor by statute is the duty imposed upon the custodian of public records to allow continuing and permanent inspection and use of the books; that he is not bound to give so much of his time as would be required to watch the books while thus continuously examined and used; and that he is not bound to intrust them to persons who desire to so inspect and use them, and who require no aid from him in doing so. These cases are also cited as raising the objection that the right of inspection, whatever it may be, exists without regard to the character of the applicant.

Both sides quote from High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 330, as follows: "Upon principles analogous to those already considered, the courts interfere by mandamus to compel municipal authorities to allow the inspection of their records by persons entitled thereto, and the writ will be granted, in behalf of a member of the municipality who is entitled to an inspection of its books, to permit him to make such inspection and to take copies and abstracts of the records at his own cost. It is, of course, essential to the exercise of the jurisdiction in such cases that the relator should show some interest in the records which he seeks to inspect, and it may well be doubted whether the writ would in any case be allowed upon the relation of a mere stranger. But a resident within a municipality, who has been sued by the corporation for a violation of one of its by-laws, is entitled to the aid of a mandamus to procure an inspection of the books of the corporation, so far as they relate to the matter in dispute, and to compel the clerk of the corporation to furnish him with copies of its by-laws at his expense." The complainant relies for authority upon the first sentence of the excerpt, and the defendant upon what follows.

Both sides seek support in the cases which refer to the examination of the books of corporations other than municipal bodies. Among other cases, the relator refers to Re Steinway, 159 N. Y. 250, 45 L. R. A. 461, 53 N. E. 1103, and our own case of Deaderick v. Wilson, 8 Baxt. 108, and to the following text-books: 4 Thomp. Corp. § 4406; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 473; 2 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 511. The defendant cites: Reg. v. Mariquita Min. Co. 1 El. & El. 289, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 67, 5 Jur. N. S. 725, 7 Week. Rep. 98; Com. ex rel. Sellers v. Phoenix Iron Co. 105 Pa. 111, 51 Am. Rep. 184; King v. Merchant Tailors' Co. 2 Barn. 64 L. R. A.

& Ad. 115, 9 L. J. K. B. 146; Birmingham, B. & T. Junction R. Co. v. White, 1 Q. B. 282, 4 Perry & D. 649, 2 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 863, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 121, 5 Jur. 800; Imperial Gas Co. v. Clarke, 7 Bing. 95, 4 Moore & P. 727, 9 L. J. C. P. 28; Hoyt v. American Esch. Bank, 1 Duer, 652, and other cases. Also the following text-books: 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 231-233; Taylor, Ev. § 1495.

We shall not undertake an examination of the cases. The conflict of opinion upon the subject will sufficiently appear from a few excerpts made from some of the text-books referred to.

In Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 473, it is said: "The members of a simple copartnership are entitled to examine the partnership books and accounts whenever they desire; but this rule is inapplicable to large joint-stock companies and corporations. The control over the affairs of associations of this description is, by common consent, delegated to directors and managing agents elected by the majority, and individual shareholders have no authority or control except by their votes at shareholders' meetings. If every shareholder in a large joint-stock association were allowed to examine its books and accounts at pleasure, it would become impossible, in practice, to keep the books in a proper manner. Moreover, it is evident that the result would be to lay open the affairs of the company to the public, and render any privacy in its dealings impossible [citing Reg. v. Mariquita Min. Co. 1 El. & El. 289, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 67, 5 Jur. N. S. 725, 7 Week. Rep. 98; King v. Merchant Tailors' Co. 2 Barn. & Ad. 115, 9 L. J. K. B. 146; Re v. Hostmen, 2 Strange, 1223; Southampton v. Greaves, 8 T. R. 590, 5 Revised Rep. 480]. It is reasonable, however, that the majority of a company should have the power to examine its books and accounts, through agents appointed for that purpose at a meeting duly convened. However, in the United States the prevailing doctrine appears to be that the individual shareholders in a corporation have the same right as the members of an ordinary partnership to examine their company's books, although they have no power to interfere with the company's management. The supreme court of Pennsylvania said: 'Unless the charter provides otherwise, a shareholder in a trading corporation has the right to inspect its books and papers, and to take minutes from them for a definite and proper purpose at reasonable times. The doctrine of the law is, that the books and papers of the corporation, though of necessity kept in some one hand, are the common property of all the stockholders [citing Com. ex rel. Sellers v. Phoenix Iron Co. 105 Pa. 28

111-116, 51 Am. Rep. 184; Cockburn v. Union Bank, 13 La. Ann. 289; Deaderick v. Wilson, 8 Baxt. 108; State ex rel. Rosenfeld v. Einstein, 46 N. J. L. 479; Union Nat. Bank v. Hunt, 76 Mo. 439; Wannell v. Kem, 57 Mo. 478; People ex rel. Field v. Northern P. R. Co. 18 Jones & S. 456]."

In Thompson on Corporations, vol. 4, § 4418, after citing several cases that confined the right to inspect to a case with reference to some defined, distinct dispute, as to which it appeared that it might be to his advantage to see the minutes of the corporation, all of them English cases except one (Com. ex rel. Sellers v. Phoenix Iron Co. 105 Pa. 111-116, 51 Am. Rep. 184), he adds: "It should be carefully added, however, that this theory has gained no considerable footing in America, nor is it based upon any foundation of sense. Subject to the convenience of the others, or of the common agency, which acts for all, it is the right of every proprietor to know how the business in which he has embarked his money is being carried on, whether there is any dispute about it or not."

In Cook on Stock & Stockholders, on the other hand, after stating (§ 511) that the stockholders of a corporation had, at common law, a right to examine at any reasonable time any one or all of the books or records of the corporation, and that this rule grew out of an analogous rule applicable to public corporations and to ordinary copartnerships, "the books of which, by well-established laws, are always opened to the inspection of members," he adds, in § 515, that, in order to justify the granting of a mandamus, either the property, or "some property rights of the stockholder, must be involved, or some controversy exist, or some specific and valuable interest be in question, to settle which an inspection of the corporate records becomes necessary."

Passing from this conflict, it is said, in § 4419, vol. 4, of Thompson's work, that the right of a shareholder to inspect the books of a corporation will not be enforced for speculative purposes or the gratification of curiosity. It is also said, in § 4422, that it is no answer to an application to inspect that it is inconvenient to grant the right. Individual shareholders cannot, of course, appropriate the books of a corporation for the purpose of inspecting them to an unreasonable extent, and to the detriment of the interests of the corporation and the rights of other shareholders. But, the right of a shareholder to such an inspection being clear, it is not a sound view that the corporation can deny it upon the mere plea that it would be inconvenient to grant it. The convenience of the corporation and the convenience of the shareholder must to some extent yield to each other, and the law will not permit either, in the exercise of its rights, to act unreasonably toward the other. The stockholder must take the inspection in a peaceful manner. § 4424. But he may exercise the right of inspection through an agent, attorney, or expert. § 4426. And he has the right to make copies and extracts. § 4421. The courts may control the manner of the inspection. But it is not always a matter of course for the court to grant the inspection when applied to. In § 4427 will be found numerous examples or instances in which inspection was granted, while in § 4428 will be found numerous other instances where the mandamus was refused.

Upon this subject the following from Cook on Stock & Stockholders is appropriate (§ 514): "The writ of mandamus, however, does not issue herein as a matter of course. It is an extraordinary remedy, to be invoked only upon special occasions. The courts do not grant the mandamus until they have taken into careful consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case, —the condition and character of the books, the reasons for refusal by the corporation. The specific purpose of the stockholder in demanding inspection, the general reasonableness of the request, and the effect on the orderly transaction of the corporate business in case it is granted, are all considered in granting or refusing the writ. It is granted in furtherance of essential justice."

Passing, for the present, the question as to who is the true custodian of the books of the city, we shall now consider some of the other reasons given in the answer of the defendant, or his return, to the alternative writ.

We do not think it material that there is an ordinance which provides that "every officer and agent of the city shall, at all times when requested, submit his books and official papers to the inspection of the mayor, or any member of the legislative council, or to any person or committee appointed or authorized by said legislative council to examine same." This provision is not exclusive, nor are we prepared to admit, as intimated in People ex rel. Henry v. Cornell, 47 Barb. 329, that the city authorities could, through a by-law, cut off the right of a corporator to make an examination on suitable occasions. It is likewise immaterial that the grand jury has the right to make an examination. This right is not exclusive. Moreover, such examination is nearly always cursory and wholly inadequate. Nor is it a sufficient reply that the applicant is politically hostile to the custodian of the papers, unless it appear that the examination he asks is sought with the corrupt purpose of merely furthering such animosity. If it appear that the examination is sought for an honest and laudable purpose, the personal antagonism of the parties will not be sufficient ground upon which to deny the right. It should not be granted for any political or other improper purpose. Nor is it sufficient reply that such an examination could produce worry and inconvenience, nor that the transactions to be examined are numerous and involve many millions of dollars. The inconvenience and obstruction to business can be very much modified by the order of the court prescribing the method of examination, and the court's reserving the right to make additional orders from time to time as occasion therefrom may appear; and, indeed, that the objections referred to in this paragraph are not insuperable is shown by the fact that the defendant felt able to overcome them in making a way for such examination by the committee over which Albert S. Caldwell was named as chairman.

Before going further, we shall determine the question whether there is enough set forth in the answer, taken in connection with the admissions made, under the forms of the pleadings, of certain allegations in the bill or petitions, to show that the relator is actuated by a fraudulent and dishonest purpose. It appears that when the relator made his application the defendant had already called together the committee of 200, and had made known the fact that the city was badly in need of money to take care of the streets and was without funds for that purpose. The committee was convened for the purpose of devising ways and means to meet the city's needs. Under these circumstances it was natural that a citizen and taxpayer should desire to know the exact condition of the city's finances, and the plan of a thorough and exhaustive examination necessarily arose in the mind. The purpose he professed was to ascertain the real condition of affairs, how much money had come in, and where it had gone to, as a necessary preliminary to fiscal ameliorations. The defendant does not aver in terms that the present proceeding was instituted for a fraudulent and corrupt purpose, nor, indeed, would mere opinions prevail; but he states that he refused the request because he believed that the proposition was made rather to impede and thwart the object had in view by calling the committee of citizens together, than to forward such object. This is, at most, but the mere expression of an opinion, and, besides, refers to the proposition made by the committee. The correspondence that passed between the counsel for the relator and the chairman of the Caldwell committee was merely an attempt at an adjustment, and, while it manifests a very persistent purpose to obtain leave to make examination, if possible, it contains no word of vituperation or anything indicating malice.

We pass, now, to a statement of our conclusions upon the general question of law as to the right of a citizen and taxpayer of a city to make an examination of the books and papers of the city. In stating these conclusions we shall not discuss the authorities above referred to, or attempt to reconcile their conflicts. After considering all of these authorities and the whole subject involved, we shall state what we believe to be the sound principles applicable to the matter. In theory the right of examination is absolute, but in practice it is at last only a matter of discretion, because such application is likely at any time to be refused on the part of the custodian of the books and papers sought to be examined, and then the right must be forced by mandamus, and this writ is not of absolute right, but merely of discretion, to be awarded only in a proper case; the facts claimed as authorizing its issuance to be judged of in every case by the court, and the writ to be awarded or withheld upon a consideration of all the circumstances presented. So, while the right is, in theory, absolute, yet it is in practice so limited by the remedy necessary for its enforcement as that it can be denominated only a "qualified right." The right to an examination for a special purpose, as, for example, to obtain specific information to use in a litigation between the applicant and third parties, or between the applicant and the corporation, and the like cases, while not, in principle, standing upon higher grounds, yet is the more easily grantable, because it does not involve so much time, and so much inconvenience to the custodian of the books and papers, and so much interruption of business, as in case of a general examination. Yet it cannot be doubted, under a state of facts showing it to be important to the public interest that the general examination of the books of a municipality should be had, that the court should allow such examination at the suit of one who is a citizen and taxpayer of the corporation. The right rests, not only on the ground that the books are public books, but also on the same principle that authorizes a taxpayer to enjoin the enforcement of illegal contracts entered into by the municipality, county, or state, for the protection of the applicant and all other taxpayers from illegal burdens. And it is obvious that, in making and enforcing such application, the taxpayer acts, in a very real sense, not only for himself, but for all other taxpayers, and acts, therefore, in the capacity, as it were, of a trustee for all. It must be admitted, also, that the exercise of such power, if prudently and carefully guarded, cannot be otherwise than salutary, because the knowledge that it can be exercised by a citizen and taxpayer, and may be exercised when the public good shall seem, on sound reasons, to demand it, cannot result otherwise than in producing an added sense of responsibility in those who administer the affairs of municipal corporations, and in inducing a greater carefulness in the discharge of the trusts imposed upon them by their fellow citizens under the sanctions of law. Yet it is equally true that such general examinations must necessarily to some extent interrupt the ordinary and usual course of business in public offices, and require of the officers in charge thereof some additional duties for the time being. And it follows, from this, that such examinations should not be lightly granted, or permitted with unnecessary frequency; that the occasion should be grave and important; and that the person seeking the examination should be trustworthy and reliable, and at all times and at every stage subject to the supervision of the court, to the end that there may be no oppression practised under the guise of doing service to the public, and that the safety of the books and records subjected to the examination shall be continually provided for. All of these matters fall within the principle that the granting of permission to make the examination rests in the sound discretion of the court, in the form of granting or withholding the writ of mandamus.

It only remains to determine whether the occasion shown in the present case is of sufficient gravity to move the discretion of the court. The case presented, as drawn from the petition and answer, is that the period of the examination sought covers the space of five years, during which time many millions of dollars have been collected by the city administration and expended; that during 1902 there were receipts to the amount of $1,067,916.09 and disbursements to the amount of $1,060,053.89, and the city borrowed from one bank $53,357.04, on which $3,172.36 was paid, from another bank $52,135.43, on which $2,982.17 interest was paid, and from another bank $22,922.33, on which $552.99 interest was paid, aggregating $135,122.32, and that during the previous year there was borrowed $101,361; that the taxes collected from year to year from the taxpayers of the city are already very heavy and very burdensome; and that the mayor, notwithstanding the great revenues collected, a liberal exercise of the power to borrow money, and the recent session of the legislature, to which application could have been made for an increase of the means of raising taxes, if the property of the city could bear more, found it necessary, shortly before the petition was filed, to resort to the extraordinary expedient of calling a meeting of 200 citizens of Memphis to devise ways and means to pave, repair, and "round up" the streets of the city. Under such a state of facts, we think it not unnatural, and not unreasonable, that the taxpayers of the city should desire to have the books, papers, and vouchers of the city looked into, to the end that they may fully learn the financial condition of the municipality; and we think the facts stated make a case sufficient to justify the court in allowing the general examination sought in the petition.

Indeed the conclusion as to the propriety of making such general examination is substantially conceded in the answer of the defendant, in the fact that he replies that he has set on foot just such examination, through a committee of citizens selected by him and agreed to by the legislative council. However, the creation of that committee can in no wise interfere with the present proceeding. After judicial proceedings have been started, as in the present case, for the purpose of obtaining a general examination, they cannot be thwarted by the appointment of a committee on the part of the custodian of the books, or his associates in authority, to make an examination in lieu of the one sought. The right of the petitioner to have his application passed upon on its merits became complete upon the filing of the petition, and, of course, cannot be affected by subsequent acts of the defendant, taken without his consent, and to which he was not a party. It follows that the writ must be allowed, if the defendant is the custodian of the books and papers of the city in such a sense that he can be justly called upon to produce them.

Upon examination of the laws governing the city and the rights and power of its mayor—as shown in Watkins's Digest (1902) § 6, pp. 19, 20; Id. §§ 1, 2, p. 22; Id. art. 5, p. 170,—we think sufficient powers are vested in the mayor to make it proper that the writ should go against him for the allowance of the examination sought in the petition and for the production of the books and papers.

It results that the decree of the chancellor must be reversed, and the cause remanded for the entry of a decree awarding the peremptory writ; but such decree shall reserve to the court below the powers and control above indicated to prevent oppression, and for the preservation of the books and papers, and to so order the examination as to interfere as little as practicable with the transaction of current business, and said decree shall reserve to each party the right from time to time to apply to the court for instructions pending the examination.

NASHVILLE RAILWAY, Appt.,

v.

Edgar Meacham HOWARD, by Next Friend.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. In an action for injury to a street-car passenger because of defective condition of the track, evidence is admissible to show the existence of such defect prior to the time of the accident, where the conditions have remained substantially unchanged.
2. There is no basis for imputing to an infant passenger on a street car any negligence on the part of his mother, in whose care he is, which proximately contributes to his injury, where, he is thrown from the car by its jolting, unless the facts show heedlessness on the part of the child and negligence on the part of the mother in failing to prevent his incautious act.
3. A child four years old is not negligent in sitting alone on the seat of an open street car, holding on to the seat guard, so that, in case he is jolted from the seat and injured by the car crossing a defect in the track, the negligence of his mother, with whom he is traveling, in permitting him to occupy such position, can be imputed to him.
4. Refusal of the trial judge to instruct the jury that an infant passenger on a street car could not recover for personal injuries if the negligence of his mother, with whom he was traveling, proximately contributed to the injury, is not error, where there are no facts in the case to show such negligence.
5. A trial judge is not bound to explain to the jury, in an action to recover for injuries to a street-car passenger, the meaning of the words "as far as human skill and foresight will go," as measuring the carrier's duty to provide for the safety of the passenger, where he has not instructed them that such is the measure of the carrier's duty, but has merely told them that the carrier is bound to keep its appliances in reasonably safe order and condition.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James C. Bradford and J. M. Anderson, for appellant:

The testimony of the witnesses Sloan, Frost, and Vaughn was incompetent, and its admission was ground for the reversal of the judgment of the court below.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 52; Parker v. Portland Pub. Co. 69 Me. 173, 31 Am. Rep. 262; Hudson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 581, 44 Am. Rep. 692, 13 N. W. 735; *Cleveland, C. O. & I. R. Co. v. It is incompetent and inadmissible to prove the present existence of a defect, not by evidence of what the previous condition of the track was at the place of the alleged defect, but by evidence of the fact that other accidents previously occurred at the place where it is claimed the track is now defective.

The charge is the announcement and declaration of the doctrine of comparative negligence.

Kinkead, Torts, § 257.

The doctrine of comparative negligence has never prevailed in Tennessee.

The charge requires that the negligence of the mother, which contributed to the proximate cause, shall equal that of the defendant, before the right of action is defeated. If the negligence of the mother contributed to, or entered into, or became part of, the proximate cause in any degree, whether in the same degree as the defendant's negligence or not, it defeats the right of recovery.

The implied obligation of the street railway company's contract was to carry the child subject to the proper care on the part of the mother. The negligence here sought to be imputed to the child is based upon the negligence of the mother in failing to perform this duty, which she, on behalf of the child, assumed and agreed to do.

chequer, El. Bl. & El. 728, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 258, 5 Jur. N. S. 936, 7 Week. Rep. 311.

Messrs. Washington, Allen, & Roins for appellee.

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. A. Howard, as next friend to his minor son, E. M. Howard, recovered a verdict and judgment in the circuit court of Davidson county against the defendant railroad company for the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) as damages for injuries to the son. The company appealed, and has assigned errors.

The cause of action, as outlined in the declaration, is that the plaintiff, a minor, four years of age, took passage with his mother and sister on one of defendant's cars, for the purpose of returning to his home in Northeast Nashville; that at the intersection of Meridian and Foster streets, by reason of the defective rails and switchboard or frog, and the track thereunder, as well as the careless and negligent handling of the car by the motorman, a sudden jerk or jolt was caused, throwing plaintiff from his seat violently to the ground, and so mangling and crushing one of his legs that its amputation was necessary.

The facts are that on the 21st of November, 1900, the plaintiff, in company with his mother and sister, boarded an open Meridian street car on the public square, occupying the second seat from the front, the child being seated between his mother and sister. When the car reached the bridge, the child, indulging a natural instinct to view the river, moved across to the seat immediately in front, facing his mother, and with his back to the motorman. The child sat near the end of the seat on the left of the car, and took hold of the guard on the end of the seat with his right hand. In this position he was sitting near and readily accessible to his mother and sister. He remained in this position until he was thrown from his seat to the ground at the intersection of Foster and Meridian streets. When nearing this point the mother rang the bell for the car to stop in front of her house, but the motorman, without observing the signal, failed to stop, and continued on around the curve leading to Meridian street, and when the car wheels struck the frog at the point where the curve began, in the language of the conductor, "there was a plunging jerk, like the track going down and the car up." The result of this jerk, as already stated, was to throw the child from his seat to the track, and, before he could be rescued, the wheels ran over his foot and leg. There is evidence tending to show that the sudden plunging jerk and jar of the car was owing to the defective track. The proof of the plaintiff shows that the rails were lower than the frog, and that there were open joints or spaces between the ends of the rails and the frog, and the rails were loose on both sides of the frog, and were not in alignment with the frog rail, so that when the car passed from the rail to the frog, and from the frog to the next rail, it caused a plunging jerk and jar of the car that was both unusual and dangerous. It is further shown that this had been the condition of the track for several months prior to the injury to the defendant in error.

It is conceded by counsel for plaintiff in error there is evidence tending to show that at the place of the accident the track was in a defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition; while the defendant company introduced a number of witnesses who testified that the track was in a safe condition, and the only jolting or jerking of the car was such as was necessarily incident to passing through the frog or switch. It is conceded by counsel that in this conflict of evidence this court would not undertake to disturb the finding of the jury on the facts touching the defective character of the track.

The first assignment of error is that the court below erred in admitting the testimony of the witness Sloan to the effect that, previous to the accident, he had on several occasions been nearly thrown from the car at the same point. Sloan, it appears, was the conductor on the car at the time of the accident, and had been running as conductor for months prior to that time. He stated that in turning that curve on the occasion of the accident there was a kind of plunging jerk, like the track going down and the car up. The witness further stated there were times when he himself would have been thrown off if he had not been holding.

In this connection will be considered the second assignment of error, in which it is insisted that the court erred in permitting Dr. Frost to testify that, previous to this accident, he had seen cars derailed at this point, and had helped to put them back on the track, and that this had occurred more than one time.

The third assignment of error is that the court erred in admitting the testimony of A. B. Vaughn to the effect that previous to the accident, while attempting to leave the car at the place of the accident, he came near being thrown off.

These assignments of error raise cognate questions, and will be considered together. It is insisted that this evidence was improperly admitted, because it adduced collateral facts and issues, which were incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference as to the particular fact or matter in dispute.

We find, upon examination of the testimony of these witnesses, that this railroad track had been in this condition for eight or ten months prior to and up to the date of the injury. It is shown that there had been no changes whatever in the condition of the track.

In Railroad Co. v. Lindamood, 109 Tenn. 411, 412, 74 S. W. 113, we approved the following rule: "While in negligence cases the condition of the appliances, structure, or premises at the very time and place of the injuries is the material inquiry, evidence of conditions before or after the accident may be received, where it is also shown that the conditions testified to remain unchanged down to the occurrence of the injuries, or to the time to which the evidence relates. So, evidence is admissible of conditions existing so short a time before or after the accident as, under the circumstances, to warrant an inference of fact that the same conditions existed when the injuries were received."

It is also settled by the weight of authority that evidence of prior injuries to other persons under the same circumstances as those which produced plaintiff's injuries is frequently admitted to show the defendants' actual knowledge of the defective or dangerous conditions or appliances, or as demonstrating the fact that defendants should have anticipated injuries, and were therefore negligent. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 510.

It must, of course, in all cases be shown that the conditions at the time of the other accident and the one directly involved in the litigation were substantially the same. Id. 520; District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, 27 L. ed. 618, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 840.

The evidence presented herein shows that the condition of the track at the time specified by the witnesses was substantially the same as its condition at the time of the accident. Hence we think, under the authorities cited, the evidence was clearly competent.

The fifth assignment of error is that the court below erred in refusing the special request of the company as follows: "If you find from the proof that at the time of the accident the plaintiff, Edgar Meacham Howard, by reason of his tender years, was incapable of exercising ordinary care and prudence for his own protection and, while a passenger on the car of the defendant, was in the immediate control, care, and custody of his mother, and that the mother, as such custodian of the child, failed on her part to exercise ordinary care and prudence for the 64 L. R. A.

child's protection, and that this was the proximate cause of the accident, or contributed to it as its proximate cause, then the plaintiff cannot recover, although the defendant may have been itself guilty of negligence; provided, of course, you find that the defendant's negligence was not wilful or intentional."

Counsel aver that, in requesting this charge, he did not invoke the doctrine declared in the case of Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615, 34 Am. Dec. 273, which has been expressly repudiated by this court in two reported cases, Whirley v. Whiteman, 1 Head, 610, and Bamberger v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 95 Tenn. 18, 28 L. R. A. 486, 49 Am. St. Rep. 909, 31 S. W. 163. It was held in these cases that, in an action by a child through its next friend to recover damages for personal injuries, the negligence of its parent or guardian would not be imputed to the child, discarding the doctrine to that effect announced in Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615, 34 Am. Dec. 273. It is insisted, however, by counsel for the company, that the only point decided in Hartfield v. Roper was that the negligence of the parent in permitting the child to go unattended into a place of danger, or failing to confine it within safe limits, was to be imputed to the child, so as to defeat its action for damages predicated on the negligence of a third person. The distinction is sought to be made in this case that the negligence charged against the mother is not that she let her child go unattended upon the car. It is admitted that, under such circumstances, the company would have owed to the child a duty commensurate with its inability to care for itself; but it is insisted that, when the mother boarded the car with the child, it was under her immediate care and protection, and as such it was accepted as a passenger; that there was an implied obligation, which the mother assumed, to take care of the child. It is further insisted that the implied obligation of the street railway company was to carry the child, subject to proper care on the part of the mother, and that the negligence sought to be imputed to the child in this case is based on the negligence of the mother in failing to perform the duty which she, on behalf of the child, assumed.

The proposition formulated by counsel is that, in many of the states where the doctrine of Hartfield v. Roper has been expressly repudiated, it is nevertheless held that, while the parent's negligence in permitting the child to go into dangerous places unattended cannot be imputed to it, nevertheless where the parent is actually present and personally directing and controlling the action of the child, and the alleged breach of duty to the child arises from a contractual relation assumed by the parent for and on behalf of the child, the child must bear the consequences of the parent's failure to discharge the assumed obligations and duties. The leading English case on this subject is Waite v. North Eastern R. Co. El. Bl. & El. 719-728. It appeared in that case that a child, five years old, was in charge of its grandmother, who procured tickets for both at a railway station, with the intention of taking the train at that place. In crossing the track, for the purpose of reaching a platform on the opposite side, they were run down by a train, under circumstances of concurrent negligence on the part of the grandmother and the servants of the defendant. The grandmother was killed, and the child sustained personal injuries for which suit was brought. In the court of Queen's bench, Lord Campbell, Chief Justice, held that the infant was so identified with the grandmother that the action could not be maintained. This view was sustained in the court of exchequer chamber. The judges generally based their opinions upon the ground that the action was for a breach of duty arising out of a contract made by the defendant with the person having the infant in charge. Lord Crowder, J., said: "The case is the same as if the child had been in the mother's arms;" therefore whatever rights the plaintiff had must be predicated upon the contract of conveyance. "The contract of conveyance," said Cockburn, Chief Justice, "is on the implied condition that the child is to be conveyed subject to due and proper care on the part of the person having it in charge." In this case it was the negligence of the person in actual custody of the child at the time of the injury that was imputed to it. The rule of imputed negligence enunciated by the English courts is limited to cases where the parent or guardian is actually present and exercising control over the movements of the child. 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1182.

In East Saginaw City R. Co. v. Bohn, 27 Mich. 516, the plaintiff, a child four years old, by being thrown from the platform of a street car, was run over, injuring his left leg in such a manner that amputation was necessary. Suit was brought on behalf of the infant to recover damages sustained by him. It appeared that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was in charge of his twelve and one-half-year-old brother. The judge charged the jury that the railway company was required to act towards the plaintiff in the situation he then was; that is, considering his age and capacity, and the fact that he was there with a brother of the age named. They were not required to use towards him the same care and skill that might have been required had he been alone. They received him as he was, attended by his older brother, and were required to act toward him just as he was situated; and he further instructed them that, if the brother was of an age to have exercised reasonable discretion, and plaintiff was seated where, with the exercise of such discretion in his behalf, he could ride in safety, plaintiff could not recover, unless the injury resulted wholly from the negligence of the company. Judge Cooley said: "This charge appears to me all the defendant had a right to demand."

In Stillson v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 67 Mo. 671, the court said: "The first question which naturally presents itself, in view of the facts, is whether the responsibility of the defendant in this case is varied from that which is ordinarily exacted from it towards persons of mature years, by reason of the tender years of the plaintiff. There are cases in which it is determined that the same degree of care is not to be expected or required from a person of immature age as would be required of one who had reached years of discretion; and, therefore, that what would be contributory negligence in the one case would not be so considered in the other. The distinction was recognized by this court in Koons v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 65 Mo. 592. These are, however, cases in which the father, guardian, or other protector of the party injured is not present when the injury occurs. In the present case the father and child were together, and it was not simply a permission on his part that his little daughter should cross the railroad at the point she attempted, but the exact place was pointed out to her by her father, and she was proceeding within his view to follow his directions when the injury happened. If, under such circumstances, the father was guilty of negligence, that negligence must be imputable to the child in a suit by the child for damages. As was observed by the supreme court of Massachusetts in a similar action (Holly v. Boston Gaslight Co. 8 Gray, 132, 69 Am. Dec. 233): 'She was under the care of her father, who had the custody of her person and was responsible for her safety. It was his duty to watch over her, guard her from danger, and provide for her welfare; and it was hers to submit to his government and control. She was entitled to the benefit of his superintendence and protection, and was consequently subject to any disadvantages resulting from the exercise of that parental authority which it was both his right and duty to exert. Any want of ordinary care on his part is attributable to her in the same degree as if she was wholly acting for herself.' In Waite v. North Eastern R. Co. El. Bl. & El. 719-728, the question was whether, in an action by an infant for injuries caused to him by the negligence of the defendant, it could be set up by way of defense that the negligence of the person in charge of the infant contributed to the accident. The court of Queen's bench held that it could, and in this opinion the court of exchequer chamber concurred. Williams, J., said: "There was here, as it seems to me, from the particular circumstances of the case, an identification of the plaintiff with the grandmother, whose negligence is therefore an answer to the action. The person who has charge of the child is identified with the child. If a father drives a carriage, in which his infant child is, in such a way that he incurs an accident, which by the exercise of reasonable care he might have avoided, it would be strange to say that, though himself could not maintain an action, the child could.' In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stratton, 78 Ill. 88, the supreme court of Illinois held that the negligence of the parent or guardian having in charge a child of tender years, where it is the proximate cause of the injury by unnecessarily and imprudently exposing it to danger, prevents any recovery from the carrier corporation. In the present case the inquiry should have been whether the father was guilty of any contributory negligence, and whether such negligence, if any there was, was the proximate cause of the injury." Grethen v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 22 Fed. 609; The Burgundia, 29 Fed. 464; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Logue, 158 Ill. 621, 42 N. E. 53; Carter v. Towne, 98 Mass. 567, 96 Am. Dec. 175; Kay v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 65 Pa. 276, 3 Am. Rep. 628; North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Mahoney, 57 Pa. 187; Pittsburg, A. & M. Pass. R. Co. v. Caldwell, 74 Pa. 421.

The circuit judge on the trial of this cause did instruct the jury that the contributory negligence of the mother, who was in actual custody of the child at the time of the injury, was imputable to the child. The court said: "It further appearing that the child was brought upon the car by its mother, and was in her care and custody, the same degree of care and protection of the child was thus imposed on its mother as would have been imposed upon an ordinary passenger of intelligence and experience, . . . that degree of care and precaution that an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under like circumstances and conditions; and in arriving at that you can look to the age of the child, the kind of car they were riding on, the fact that the cars in their ordinary travel necessarily cross switches and frogs and use curves upon the track; and if the proof shows that in crossing these frogs, switches, and curves there is jerk, jolt, or jostle occasioned thereby, that fact should be considered; and, if the mother failed to exercise that degree of care and precaution for the safety and protection of the child incumbent on her as explained to you above, and such failure on the part of the mother was the proximate and controlling cause of its injuries, then the child could not recover in this action." And further on in the charge, his honor charged as follows: "Again, should you find that the mother of the plaintiff failed to exercise the ordinary care and caution for the protection of a child that has been explained to you above as incumbent upon her, and such failure upon her part was the proximate and controlling cause of his fall and injuries, then, and in that event, you should find for the defendant. So, also, should you find that the negligence of the plaintiff's mother and the negligence of the defendant company equally contributed towards the accident and injury, in such event you should find for the defendant. Should, however, you find that the negligence of the mother contributed materially to the accident and injury to the child, but was not its proximate and controlling cause, that would not deprive the plaintiff of a right to recover, but should be taken by you in mitigation of the damages you would otherwise allow."

It will thus be seen that the doctrine of imputed negligence was distinctly charged by the circuit judge. But the precise proposition presented by the assignment of error is that the court failed and refused to charge that, if the negligence of the mother contributed proximately to bring about the accident, plaintiff could not recover. It will be observed that in the general charge already quoted the jury were told there could be no recovery if the negligence of the mother was the proximate and controlling cause of the injury, or if the mother and defendant equally contributed in producing the accident; but the court refused to charge that, if the negligence of the mother proximately contributed in any degree to produce the injury, the defendant company would not be liable. Ordinarily, such failure and refusal to charge would constitute prejudicial error for which there should be a reversal. Nashville R. Co. v. Norman, 108 Tenn. 334, 67 S. W. 479. But, unless there are facts in the record showing heedlessness on the part of the child, and negligence on the part of the mother in failing to prevent the incautious act of the child, there would be no basis for imputing to the child any negligence on the part of the mother that proximately contributed to the injury.

It seems that even in jurisdictions where the doctrine of Hartfield v. Roper has been recognized, it is now held that the rule is not applicable when it appears that the injured child, although non sui juris, has exercised ordinary care to avoid the injury, or, as it is otherwise expressed, when the child used due care there is no imputability. See cases cited in 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 451.

Says Mr. Thompson, a sensible interpretation of the rule is that if a child, though non sui juris, has not committed or omitted any act which would constitute negligence in a person of full discretion, an injury by the negligence of another cannot be defended on the ground of contributory negligence of the parent or custodian in not restraining the child. In such a case the child, being in a lawful place, and exercising what would be regarded as ordinary care in an adult, is entitled to recovery for an injury occasioned by the wrongful act of another, irrespective of the conduct of the parents. McGarry v. Loomis, 63 N. Y. 104, 20 Am. Rep. 510.

A sententious statement of this rule is made by Hogeboom, J., in Lannen v. Albany Gaslight Co. 46 Barb. 270, viz.: "I know of no just or legal principle which, when the infant himself is free from negligence, imputes to him the negligence of the parent, when if he were an adult he would escape it. This would be, I think, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children to an extent not contemplated in the Decalogue, or in the more imperfect digests of human law."

The uncontradicted proof in this record is that at the time of the accident the child was seated in a place provided for passengers, with his right hand holding to the guard attached to the seat. He was not leaning out, or standing on the seat or floor, or committing any other negligent or incautious act, even if negligence might be ascribed to one so immature in years. While the child was thus in the exercise of as much care as an adult could be under similar circumstances, there was a plunging of the car into the depression caused by the defective track, and he was jostled off, just as an adult might have been under like conditions. If the child was in no fault, how is the negligence of the mother to be imputed to it? There was no negligent act of the child that should have been prevented by the mother. The record shows that the mother was seated facing the child on the seat immediately opposite, where she could see all the movements of the child, and readily restrain any imprudent act on its part. So that, upon the uncontradicted proof, we fail to perceive any negligence either on the part of the mother or the child. Hence the failure and refusal of the circuit judge to charge that any proximate contribution of negligence on the part of the mother would defeat the child's right of recovery was innocuous, and not reversible error.

It is assigned as error that the court refused to charge, viz.: "When it is said that a carrier of passengers must provide for their safety, as far as human skill and foresight will go, it is not meant that he shall exercise all that care and diligence of which the human mind can conceive, or all the skill and ingenuity of which he is capable. The law only requires of it all those things necessary for the safety of the passenger that are reasonable and consistent with the business of the carrier, and proper to the means of conveyance employed by him to be provided, and that the highest degree of practical care and diligence and skill shall be adopted that is consistent with the mode of conveyance used, and that will not render its use impractical and inefficient for its intended purposes."

It suffices to say, in answer to this assignment of error, that the court did not charge that a carrier of passengers must provide for their safety as far as human skill and foresight will go, and hence there was no occasion to explain what was meant by those terms. The circuit judge might properly have charged that rule as applied to the liability of a carrier to his passengers, but as a matter of fact he only charged that "it was incumbent upon the defendant to keep its track, cars, and appliances, . . . its switches and frogs, . . . in reasonably safe order and condition." Surely there can be no reasonable ground on the part of the company to complain of this charge.

It results there is no error in the record, and the judgment will be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Jesse J. NAIVE.

1. The jury may infer that dressed poultry was in good condition when delivered to a carrier for transportation from evidence that special pains were taken with it because of the hot weather, and that it was prepared by dressing, cooling it out, and packing it in ice, in barrels.
2. Error in permitting consignees of dressed poultry to give their opinions that nothing was omitted to be done towards the proper handling of the poultry by them after receiving it, and that delay in delivery was not caused by anything they did or failed to do, does not require reversal of a judgment against the carrier for loss caused by delay in transportation, where it appears, from uncontradicted facts in the record, that the opinions were correct.
3. One consigning goods to his agents in another city, for sale, is bound to take notice of a certain, well-established, and general custom in force there, that business will be suspended on a certain holiday, so that he cannot hold the carrier liable for failure to make delivery of the consignment on that day.
4. A custom to suspend business on the 4th of July is not unreasonable even when applied to the delivery, by a carrier, of perishable freight on that day; although the weather in the locality is usually very warm at that time of the year.
5. A custom to suspend business on a holiday does not violate the duty imposed by contract, common law, or statute, upon a carrier to transport goods delivered to it to their destination, according to its regular course of business, with all reasonable despatch, and to give prompt notice to the consignee of their arrival.
6. A carrier is not guilty of negligence in failing to notify a consignee of the arrival of perishable goods on a legal holiday, where, by general custom of the locality, all business is suspended on that day.

NOTE.—As to effect of usage to excuse carrier from notifying consignee of arrival of goods, see, in this series, Illinois C. B. Co. v. Carter, 36 L. R. A. 527.

For custom as affecting carrier's liability generally, see cases in notes to Weyand v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 1 L. R. A. 650, and Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fagan, 2 I. R. A. 76; also Beard v. Illinois C. B. Co. 7 L. R. A. 280.

As to effect of custom on liability of baggage transfer companies, see note to Arniston Transfer Co. v. Gurley, 34 L. R. A. 137.

7. The court will assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the law of another state is the same as that established by a local statute permitting the suspension of business on legal holidays.

8. The liability of a railroad company for goods in its possession for transportation as a common carrier does not cease, and its liability as warehouseman begin, until the goods are deposited in the depot or warehouse.

9. When a shipper has shown that the property was delivered to the initial carrier in good condition, any carrier against which suit is brought for negligent injury to the property has the burden of showing that the injury was not caused by its negligence.

10. Refusal to give to the jury a requested instruction which is not strictly correct is not reversible error.

11. The liability of a carrier for neglect to give prompt notice of the arrival of perishable goods is not destroyed by the failure of the consignee to make inquiries for them, although he has reason to believe that they are overdue.

12. That a bill of lading admitted in evidence in an action to recover damages for a carrier's delay in delivering goods received by it for transportation was not actually read to the jury will not justify the court's refusal to give instructions based upon its terms.

13. It is not error to refuse to give instructions which have no bearing upon the real case before the court.

14. When perishable freight in possession of a railway company for transportation reaches its destination in the evening before a general holiday, when all business will be suspended, too late for delivery that night, at a time of year when, unless cared for, it will be likely to spoil before it can be delivered, the company is bound to use the facilities at hand to prevent that result, and it will be liable for loss occasioned by its failure to do so.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sumner County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to dressed poultry while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

Statement by Neil, J.:

The plaintiff below was a dealer in eggs, poultry, and produce, having places of business at Gallatin and Nashville, this state.

On Saturday, the 29th day of June, 1901, he consigned to Wm. Soeder & Son, at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, a shipment consisting of 25½ barrels of dressed poultry. A reasonably prompt transportation of the goods would have put them into Philadelphia on Wednesday afternoon, which was

July 3, 1901; and the consignment, if in good condition, and properly packed in ice, would have been in a sound and merchantable condition on its arrival in Philadelphia.

The shipment was sent over the Star Union Line, going from Nashville and Gallatin to Philadelphia over the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to Cincinnati, and from that point over the line of the defendant railroad company to Philadelphia.

The goods arrived in Philadelphia on Wednesday afternoon, July 3, about 5 o'clock. This was after business hours, just prior to the close of business, and too late to unload during business hours of that day, and too late to notify consignees, and effect delivery.

The car containing the goods was put on the siding of the Quaker City Cold Storage & Warehouse Company about 11 o'clock P. M. of July 4th; this company being a terminal for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company's perishable freights, and acting as its agent in keeping, unloading, and delivering such freights. It is not, in terms, shown where the car was from 5 o'clock P. M. July 3d, to 11 o'clock P. M. July 4th, but no other inference can be drawn than that it was in the yards of plaintiff in error, not in cold storage, but exposed to the hot weather.

On the morning of July 5th, Geo. Soeder, one of the consignees, called at the warehouse, and was informed by the delivery clerk that he knew nothing of the shipment as yet. Shortly after this the employees of the warehouse company seemed to have looked up the property, and delivery was made about one hour later,—about 9 o'clock on the morning of July 5th. The weather at this time was extremely warm. While some of the witnesses say that the car was "good and cold," and had 2,100 pounds of ice in its ice bunkers, still, as otherwise shown, it requires at least three tons of ice to properly ice a car during such weather as prevailed on July 3d and 4th of 1901. At this time (that is, when delivery was made) the barrels containing the poultry were bare of ice. The ice had, the witnesses say, melted during the delay between the date of the arrival of the goods and their delivery to the consignees. In such weather as prevailed July 3 to July 5, 1901, dressed poultry bare of ice will spoil within a few hours.

When the poultry was unloaded and delivered to consignees, it was badly decayed. Some of it was thrown away, and the residue was immediately cleaned up, packed in finely crushed ice, and put upon the market, and within two hours thereafter was sold for the best price obtainable.

The testimony shows that the poultry was carefully and properly packed in barrels at Nashville and Gallatin, according to the best requirements of the business.

There is no direct evidence that the poultry was in good condition when it was packed, but we infer from certain statements in the testimony of the plaintiff below, Mr. Naive, that it was in good condition; that is, that it was fresh. He shows that he took special pains with the shipment, on account of the hot weather, and packed it according to the best method known to the business; and, describing the method of preparing dressed poultry for shipment, he says: "We dress it and cool it out, and then pack it in ice, in barrels." We infer from the expression, "We dress it and cool it out," that the poultry involved in the present controversy had been freshly killed immediately before the shipment was made, and then properly cooled out and packed in the manner stated.

The record does not disclose any inquiry as to the shipment, either by plaintiff, Naive, or his agents, prior to July 5th; but it does show that Mr. Lindsey, agent of the Pennsylvania Road at Nashville, called up Mr. Naive on July 4th, and informed him that the goods had arrived on July 3d.

It is admitted that the difference in the market price of the poultry in the condition in which it was when delivered to consignees and the condition in which it was when delivered to the carrier was $202.46.

The jury returned a verdict for this amount, with interest from July 5, 1901, amounting altogether to $229.48.

From this judgment the railroad company has appealed and assigned errors.

The errors assigned are as follows:

(1) That there was no evidence to support the verdict of the jury, in that there was no material evidence to show that the poultry was properly packed by defendant in error, and in that there was no material evidence to show that the poultry was in good condition when delivered to the carrier.

(2) That the court erred in permitting George and William Soeder to testify that nothing was omitted to be done towards the proper handling of the poultry after it was received by them. The ground of the objection was that the question called merely for the expression of an opinion on the part of the witnesses referred to.

(3) That the court erred in permitting George and Wm. Soeder to testify that the delay in the delivery of the poultry after it arrived in Philadelphia was not caused by anything that they did or failed to do towards procuring its prompt delivery. The ground of this objection made in the court below was the same as that stated under the preceding assignment.

(4) That the court erred in excluding the evidence as to the custom of suspending business on July 4th.

In respect of this matter, the defendant below offered to prove that July 4th was observed in Philadelphia by carriers and among business men of all classes by suspending business, and this custom of suspending business was an established one—general, certain, and uniform—in the city of Philadelphia.

The defendant offered the depositions of witnesses, showing that their answers would establish the points just indicated.

On objection of the plaintiff below, this testimony was ruled out by the circuit judge.

It was not proved that the plaintiff had any knowledge of this custom prevailing in Philadelphia when he made the shipment to that city.

(5) That the court erred in charging the law of common carriers as applicable to this case.

It is insisted that there was nothing in the case to show liability as a common carrier; on the contrary, that the liability, if any, of the plaintiff in error, was that of a warehouseman, and that the court should have charged the law regulating the liability of warehousemen.

(6) That the court erred in its charge in respect of the burden of proof. It is said that, by the court's charge, the burden of proof was thrown on the defendant to show that it was guilty of no negligence, whereas the court should have charged that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show negligence.

(7 to 15) It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to charge, or in failing to charge, as prepared, requests Nos. 1, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, offered by the plaintiff in error in the court below.

The particulars of these requests will be stated in the body of the opinion, as far as may be deemed necessary.

Messrs. Seay & Seay for appellee.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first assignment of error is not well taken, and must be overruled. We think the facts set forth in the statement are sufficient to show that there was some evidence from which the jury might reasonably infer that the goods were in good condition and properly packed when delivered by the consignor to the carrier for shipment. This meets the requirements of the rule of law applicable to the subject.

The second and third assignments may be considered together. While His Honor, for the reasons set out in the objection made by counsel, committed a technical error in allowing the witnesses Geo. and Wm. Soeder to make the statement referred to, yet the error was innocuous, and there can be no reversal on such ground. The error was innocuous because it appears from the uncontroverted facts of the record that the persons referred to (the consignees) were in no wise responsible for the delay in delivering the goods, and that, upon receiving them, they exercised the utmost diligence in separating the spoiled poultry from that which was still merchantable, and also in cleaning up, preparing, and putting the latter on the market.

The fourth assignment and the fifth and thirteenth requests all relate to the same matter,—the rights of the parties as affected by the intervention of the 4th of July. We need not specially refer to the requests, as they will be disposed of in determining the fourth assignment. The question to be decided, then, is whether His Honor erred in excluding the testimony referred to in that assignment. Our conclusion is that he did commit error in this matter.

It is true that the custom of suspending business on the 4th of July in Philadelphia was not known to the plaintiff below (that is, he had no actual knowledge of it); but when he dealt in that market, as in the present instance, through his agents, Wm. Soeder & Son, or sent goods there to his agents at that point for sale, the law visited him with constructive knowledge of a custom so certain, well-established, and general as the one referred to is shown to have been in that city. This principle is illustrated by the following cases: In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, 105 Ill. 570, 36 L. R. A. 527, 46 N. E. 374, speaking of a custom prevailing at a particular port to waive the rule requiring carriers by water to give notice of the arrival of the goods to the consignee, the court said: "While it is a general rule that a carrier by water is required to give notice of the arrival of the goods to the consignee, it is well settled that such notice may be waived, either by the previous course of dealing between the parties or by the usual course of business of carriers in the same trade in which the carrier is employed at the locality where the goods are landed; and this whether the usage was known to the shipper or not; the rule being that every person who contracts with another for services in his particular trade is understood to contract with reference to the usage of the trade. 'The carrier may therefore show, as has been repeatedly held, the usage as to the delivery of the goods by those engaged in the carriage of goods by water in the particular port or at the particular place of delivery, and that he has acted according to it.' Hutchinson, Carr. § 366." See also, Farmers' & M. Bank v. Champlain Transp. Co. 18 Vt. 131, 140; same case on third appeal, 23 Vt. 186, 56 Am. Dec. 68; McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 374, 8 Am. Rep. 264; Turner v. Huff, 46 Ark. 222, 55 Am. Rep. 580. In Skiff v. Stoddard, 63 Conn. 198, 219, 21 L. R. A. 102, 112, 26 Atl. 881, it is said: "When one employs another to deal in a particular market, he will be held as intending that the mode of performance should be in accordance with the established customs and usages of that market, as long as the custom or usage is neither immoral, unlawful, unreasonable, contrary to the express 64 L. R. A.

agreement of the parties, nor such as to change the intrinsic character of the undertaking;" citing Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73, 22 N. E. 499, and other cases.

This was said in respect of a custom of brokers to repledge stock bought for their customers on the New York market: "When the plaintiffs," said the court, "gave their orders to Bunnell & Scranton, they understood that the orders were for execution in the New York Stock Exchange. They knew the relation of Bunnell & Scranton to this exchange, and their mode of transacting business therein through New York houses, members thereof. They must therefore be held to have contemplated and authorized a course of dealing in accordance with the rules and customs of that market."

The same principle was, in effect, announced by this court in the case of Sahlten v. Bank of Lenoze, 90 Tenn. 221, 225-229, 16 S. W. 373, approving Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. 25, 7 L. ed. 37, and limiting Dabney v. Campbell, 9 Humph. 680; and it was expressly decided in Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 98 Tenn. 337, 39 S. W. 338. In that case it is stated, in direct terms, in the opinion (page 339, 98 Tenn., page 339, 39 S. W.), that the foreign bank, held bound by the local customs of the banks of Nashville, to one of which it had sent a debt for collection, had no knowledge of these customs. In Arrington v. Cary, 5 Baxt. 609-611, the parties were allowed to prove the custom prevailing in a given city in respect of the conduct of a particular business.

The cases above cited and commented upon have reference, it is true, to customs and usages of business in places to which one ships goods, or where he deals through an agent or otherwise; but the principle must be the same as to a custom existing in such market or place of delivery which affects all business alike, by suspending all business for a definite time.

The case of Grissom v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 87 Tenn. 350-354, 3 L. R. A. 273, 10 Am. St. Rep. 669, 10 S. W. 774, is not an authority to the contrary.

The custom referred to in that case was not general, uniform, and certain. The court did not have before it in that case a state of facts in any wise similar to those appearing in the present case; nor did the court in that case intend to contravene the principle that the parties are presumed to contract in view of a custom pertaining to the subject-matter of the contract, when such custom is well established and generally known and observed. Indeed, the rule is general that in all contracts, as to the subject-matter of which known usages prevail, the parties are held to have proceeded on the tacit assumption of such usages, and to have contracted in reference to them, unless the contrary appears, and the usages form a part of the contract. McCulsky v. Klosserman, 20 Or. 108, 10 L. R. A. 785, 25 Pac. 366; Union Ins. Co. v. American F. Ins. Co. 107 Cal. 327, 28 L. R. A. 692, 694, 48 Am. St. Rep. 140, 40 Pac. 431, citing Brown v. Howard, 1 Cal. 423; Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367; Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 15 Pac. 371. However, a custom or usage, to be so available against a party, must be certain and uniform, and so notorious as to affect him with knowledge of it, and raise the presumption that he dealt with reference to it, or he must be shown to have had actual knowledge of it. Blake v. Stump, 73 Md. 160, 10 L. R. A. 103, 20 Atl. 788; Foley v. Muson, 6 Md. 51; Second Nat. Bank v. Western Nat. Bank, 51 Md. 128, 34 Am. Rep. 300; Citizens' Bank v. Graflin, 31 Md. 520, 1 Am. Rep. 66; Patterson v. Crouther, 70 Md. 125, 16 Atl. 531. The custom or usage invoked in the present case is shown to have had the requisite certainty, uniformity, and notoriety in Philadelphia; and the plaintiff below, as stated, having dealt with reference to that market, and having shipped his goods there, was bound by it, even though he had no actual knowledge of the custom at the time he shipped the goods. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, 165 Ill. 570, 36 L. R. A. 527, 46 N. E. 374; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Champlain Transp. Co. 16 Vt. 52, 140, 42 Am. Stoddard*, 63 Conn. 198, 21 L. R. A. 102, 112, 26 Atl. 874, 28 Atl. 104; Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73, 79, 22 N. E. 490; Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 98 Tenn. 337, 30 S. W. 338; Sahlien v. Bank of Lonoke, 90 Tenn. 221, 225-229, 16 S. W. 373.

It is true that a custom or usage will not be held binding if it be unreasonable. Dempsey v. Dobson, 184 Pa. 588, 40 L. R. A. 550, 551, 63 Am. St. Rep. 809, 39 Atl. 493; *Rumpel v. But we see nothing unreasonable in suspending business for one day in commemoration of the greatest event in our national history. The fact that the weather is usually very warm at this time of the year, and that perishable freight may decay in a few hours, cannot alter the conclusion. The same thing might be said in respect of a delivery on Sunday at that time of the year. Such a peril should be guarded against either by so timing the shipment as that the goods will not, in due course of transportation, encounter a nonbusiness day when ready for delivery, or by superior precautions in the packing or preparation of the property for shipment, or by adequate care on the part of the carrier, pending the delay. Where dressed meat was being carried, and, owing to a delay of the vessel, the ice in which it was packed melted away, it was held that the carrier was liable for the damage resulting from its failure to supply ice, it appearing that it was practicable to have done so. Sherman v. Inman S. S. Co. 26 Hun, 107; Peck v. Weeks, 34 Conn. 145. When, in the course of transportation, certain furs became wet through an accident to the boat, it was held that it was the carrier's duty to unpack them and allow them to dry immediately, and for a failure to do so the carrier was liable for the damage which such attention would have averted. Chouteau v. Leech, 18 Pa. 224, 57 Am. Dec. 602. So where coffee was wet. Bird v. Cromwell, 1 Mo. 81, 13 Am. Dec. 470. In Nashville & C. R. Co. v. David, 6 Heisk. 261, 19 Am. Rep. 594, cited in Lamont & Co. v. Nashville & C. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 66, the principle is stated by this court to be that, in case of an accident or emergency endangering goods in the hands of a carrier, it "is bound to use such means as would suggest themselves to, and be within the knowledge and capacity of, well-informed and competent business men in such positions, and such diligence as prudent, skilful men, engaged in that kind of business, might fairly be expected to use under like circumstances, and that this diligence and these means should be actively used to protect and secure the property confided to their care."

A custom or usage is not admissible for the purpose of varying the terms of a special contract. Baltimore Base Ball Club & Exhibition Co. v. Pickett, 78 Md. 375, 22 L. R. A. 690, 692, 44 Am. St. Rep. 304, 28 Atl. 279; Fairly v. Wappoo Mills, 44 S. C. 227, 29 L. R. A. 215, 22 S. E. 108.

Nor is a custom or usage admissible which makes a substantial change in the rights and relations of the parties, and which violates a settled rule of law. Geyer-Marion Gold Min. Co. v. Stark, 53 L. R. A. 684, 690, 45 C. C. A. 467, 106 Fed. 558, citing Irvine v. William, 110 U. S. 499, 28 L.

ed. 225, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160; Allen v. St. Louis Nat. Bank, 120 U. S. 20, 39, 30 L. ed. 573, 578, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 460; Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 816, 828, 836, 44 L. J. C. P. N. And this is true whether the rule so attempted to be violated is one established by statute (Scott v. School Dist. No. 9, 67 Vt. 150, 27 L. R. A. 588, 589, 31 Atl. 145), or a common-law rule (Missouri P. R. Co. v. Fagan, 72 Tex. 127, 2 L. R. A. 75, 13 Am. St. Rep. 776, 9 S. W. 749; East Birmingham Land Co. v. Dennis, 85 Ala. 565, 2 L. Co.* 104 Ala. 611, 28 L. R. A. 433, 437, 53 Am. St. Rep. 88, 16 So. 620). These cases are in accord with our own authorities. Turney v. Wilson, 7 Yerg. 342, 27 Am. Dec. 515; Cooper v. Sanford, 4 Yerg. 452, 26 Am. Dec. 239; Wilson v. Knott, 3 Humph. 475; Mays v. Jennings, 4 Humph. 106; Dabney v. Campbell, 9 Humph. 685, 686; Bedford v. Flowers, 11 Humph. 242; Dean v. Vaccaro, 2 Head, 488, 75 Am. Dec. 744; Saint v. Smith, 1 Coldw. 52; Charles v. Carter, 96 Tenn. 607, 613, 614, 36 S. W. 396; Sands v. Southern R. Co. 108 Tenn. 2, 12, 64 S. W. 478. Of these cases, Dean v. Vaccaro is specially relied upon by defendant in error. In that case an attempt was made to wholly dispense with the rule of law requiring carriers by water to give notice of the arrival of the goods, by a custom or usage at Memphis to disregard it altogether. The court held that this could not be done.

But the custom or usage under examination in the present case does not vary the terms of the contract between the parties, nor does it violate any statute or any rule of the common law. The contract and the law required that the railway company should transport the goods to their destination, according to its regular course of business in the transportation of such articles, with all reasonable dispatch, and that, on arrival of the goods, prompt notice should be given to the consignee, and that, on their demand therefor, delivery should be made to them. East Tennessee & G. R. Co. v. Nelson, 1 Coldw. 272, 276; Butler v. East Tennessee & V. R. Co. 8 Lea, 32. And see Shannon's Code, § 3597, as to notice to consignee. No proof being made as to law of 64 L. R. A.

Pennsylvania upon this latter subject, we must presume that it is the same as our own.

Our statute provides that "all common carriers and express companies doing business within the limits of this state shall, after the receipt of freight or merchandise for delivery at their warehouse, depot, or station, notify the consignee by written or printed notice, to be delivered to the consignee in person at his place of business, if in the city or town where received; or, if not residing or doing business in the city or town, then through the postoffice, within three days after the arrival of said goods." Acts 1870-71, chap. 17, § 1; Shannon's Code, § 3597. We understand this act to mean that prompt notice shall be given upon the arrival of the goods, and that three days is fixed as the limit allowed for delay; that is to say, the carrier would not be justified in all cases in delaying notice for the full three days, or, rather, in giving it so as to fall just within three days. The matter would be controlled to a considerable extent by the nature of the goods. For example, what would be prompt notice of the arrival of a consignment of iron would fall far short of the duty of the carrier in the case of perishable goods. But the meaning of the term "prompt notice" cannot be settled with precision, as applicable to every case. The expression is a relative one, designed to mark the degree of diligence required of the carrier; and, while a failure to comply with the rule indicated by this expression would be sufficient to charge the carrier with negligence, the rule itself—within the three-days limit—is subject to modification by custom or usage. It was held in a Pennsylvania case that the rule that a carrier must give notice to the consignee of the arrival of goods at destination is subject to exceptions growing out of special circumstances, and out of customs that have grown up for the mutual advantage of shipper and carrier. Allen v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 183 Pa. 174, 39 L. R. A. 535, 38 Atl. 709. So, in an Illinois case, it was held that while, ordinarily, a carrier by water must notify the consignee of the arrival of goods, before its liability as carrier terminates, yet such notice may be waived by a former course of dealing with the consignee, or by usage prevailing among carriers in the same trade at that port. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Carter, 165 Ill. 570, 36 L. R. A. 527, 46 N. E. 374. A custom or usage not to give notice of arrival or make delivery on the 4th of July would fall clearly within the principle governing these cases. Such a custom having been, presumptively, within the contemplation of the parties, negligence could not be predicated of the conduct of the railway company in failing to give notice of the arrival of the goods in the present case on the 4th of July. The following authorities also bear upon, illustrate, and support the conclusion we have reached: Gibson v. Culver, 17 Wend. 305, 31 Am. Dec. 297; J. Russell Mfg. Co. v. New Haven S. B. Co. 50 N. Y. 121; Bowen v. Decker, 18 Fed. 751; Gates v. Ryan, 37 Fed. 154. And in Ely v. New Haven S. B. Co. 53 Barb. 207, it was held that, where the consignee's place of business was closed, on account of the day being the 4th of July when the goods arrived, the carrier was excused from giving notice of arrival.

We may add that, if we are mistaken in any of the foregoing views, our statute, it seems, would place the matter beyond controversy. By § 3515, Shannon's Code, it is provided that the 4th of July and certain other days therein mentioned "shall be holidays, on which all public offices of this state may be closed, and business of every character, at the option of the parties in interest or managing the same, may be suspended; and in order to remove any impediments in the way of the observance of any of said days named as holidays, all negotiable paper falling due on either of said days, shall be due and payable the first business day preceding the same."

There being no evidence to the contrary, we must assume that the Pennsylvania law is the same as our own in this regard.

In the fifth assignment of error, it is indicated that there is nothing in the case to show liability on the part of the railway company as a common carrier; on the contrary, that the liability, if any, is shown by the facts to have been that of a warehouseman merely, and that the court below should have charged the law regulating the liability of warehousemen, rather than that pertaining to common carriers.

The facts contained in the statement indicate that the goods arrived at 5 o'clock in the afternoon of July 3d, which was within proper time to show reasonable dispatch in transportation from the initial to the terminal point; but they also show that the goods were allowed to remain in the yards of the company from the time of the arrival until July 4th, at 11 P. M., before they were warehoused,—a period of 30 hours. Conceding that the company had fully discharged its duty up till 5 o'clock P. M. of July 3d, still it remained liable as a common carrier from that time until the goods were put in the warehouse, and notice given to the consignees. We have three cases bearing upon the subject. All of them recognize as the rule that the liability of the railway company as common carrier does not cease, and its liability as warehousemen does not begin, until the goods are deposited in the depot or warehouse. In neither of them is it denied that notice must be given, also, as a prerequisite. In Southern Exp. Co. v. Kaufman, 12 Heisk. 161, 165, it appeared (page 162, 12 Heisk.) that notice had been given. In Butler v. East Tennessee & V. R. Co. 8 Lea, 32, the duty to give notice was excused because the consignee had no fixed residence, and the company had no knowledge of his temporary stopping place. In East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kelly, 91 Tenn. 699, 17 L. R. A. 691, 30 Am. St. Rep. 902, 20 S. W. 312, no question of notice was raised, nor was the statute on that subject referred to.

The point made in the sixth assignment is that, in the charge of the circuit judge, the burden of proof was improperly cast upon defendant below to show that it was guilty of no negligence.

The charge contains two propositions. The first of these is that if the goods were delivered in good condition by the consignor to the initial carrier, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and were subsequently delivered to the consignees in bad condition by the connecting and terminal carrier, the burden rested upon the latter to show that the injury was not caused by its negligence. The second proposition is that, if the goods were delivered by the consignor to the initial carrier in good condition, and were delivered by the latter in like good condition to the connecting carrier, and the connecting carrier (being the terminal carrier) delivered them to the consignees in a damaged condition, the burden of proof would rest upon such terminal carrier to show that the injury was not caused by its negligence.

We think there was no error in either instruction. The most that can be required of a shipper is that he shall deliver his goods to the carrier in good condition, properly packed or prepared for shipment. From that time forward they are committed to the custody and management of the carriers,—the initial and connecting ones. In the nature of things, he can know nothing of their management of the business, while they—each of them as to its own relation to the matter—cannot, by means of their agents, fail to know all of the facts. It is nothing more than reasonable, therefore, that each, when sued for injury to the property, should be required to show that it has discharged its duty in respect thereto in the care of the property during transportation, and until delivery. When property has been delivered in good condition to a carrier, and it has been damaged while in possession of such carrier nothing else appearing, the necessary presumption is that there has been negligence on the part of the carrier; and the inevitable legal conclusion is that the burden is cast upon the carrier to remove this presumption.

The sixth assignment of error must, therefore, be overruled. Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. v. Bloch Bros. 86 Tenn. 392, 416, 6 Am. St. Rep. 847, 6 S. W. 881; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Holloway, 9 Baxt. 188; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wynn, 88 Tenn. 320, 14 S. W. 311.

The first request was properly refused by his honor, because there was no testimony in the record upon which to base the instruction asked. Not only was there no testimony to show that the goods, upon their arrival in Philadelphia, were promptly placed in the company's warehouse, as the request assumes, but, on the contrary, it is shown, beyond cavil or dispute, that they were allowed to remain in the company's yard, exposed to very hot weather, for thirty hours after their arrival. It is true that thereafter they were put in a cold-storage warehouse, where they remained from 11 o'clock P. M. of July 4th until 9 o'clock A. M. of July 5th, when they were delivered to the consignees; but the court below could not, upon the fact of the deposit of the goods in cold storage at the late hour mentioned, properly base an instruction as requested, to the effect that, from the time of the arrival of the goods until their delivery, the liability of the defendant below was that of a warehouseman, only, and not that of a common carrier. As we have already held, the liability of the defendant below during the thirty hours referred to was that of a common carrier, and not that of a warehouseman. An instruction requested must be strictly correct; otherwise the circuit judge cannot be put in error by his refusal to charge it.

The fifth and thirteenth requests have already been disposed of, in what we have said upon the question raised by the fourth assignment of error.

The sixth, seventh, and tenth requests raise the point that it was the duty of the consignees, as agents of the consignors, if they had reason to believe that the shipment was overdue, to make inquiry at the office of the railway company, and that any injury that might be caused by delay after they so had reason to believe that the consignment was overdue would be at their risk, and not at the risk of the railway company.

His honor, the circuit judge, declined these requests, and acted correctly in so doing. The railway company cannot in this manner shift its duties and responsibilities upon its patrons. Its duty is absolute to give to the consignee prompt notice of the arrival of goods, and the latter has the right, until such notice is given, to rest securely in the belief that they have not arrived. Common carriers are quasi public functionaries, and those who intrust the carriage of goods to them have the right to presume, until the contrary appears, that the duties devolved upon them by law have been properly discharged.

The eleventh, twelfth, and fourteenth requests raise the point that if the injury complained of, to the goods, was caused by the operation of certain causes which were excepted from the liability of the railway company in the bill of lading, there could be no recovery; likewise, that the goods, on arrival at destination, were at the risk of consignee, and for this reason there could be no recovery. His Honor, the circuit judge, declined to charge the jury as requested, on the ground that the bill of lading had never been read to the jury or to the court. The bill of exceptions shows that the bill of lading was, in form, offered in the court below by the plaintiff therein, and that thereupon it was formally admitted without objection, but not actually read to the court and jury, or either of them; the respective counsel agreeing among themselves, in the presence of the court, at the moment, to "consider it as read." It does not appear that any of its provisions were called to the attention of the circuit judge until after he had delivered his charge to the jury. His attention was then directed to certain portions of it by the requests above referred to, which he refused, as stated.

The bill of lading having been, even under the circumstances stated, put in evidence in the cause, there would have been error in the refusal of his honor to charge the jury upon the matters pointed out and indicated by counsel in the requests referred to, if these matters had been pertinent; but there was no hurtful error, because the matters embraced in the requests clearly had no bearing upon the real case before the court,—the liability of the railway company for negligence as a carrier during the thirty hours between 5 o'clock P. M. of July 3d and 11 o'clock P. M. of July 4th, as shown infra. The matters of exception from liability, under a proper construction, did not refer to or cover such a case; and the same is true as to the risk on arrival, above referred to, under the circumstances set out infra.

It now remains to consider whether there should be a reversal for the said errors committed in respect of the matter embraced in the fourth assignment, and in the eleventh, twelfth, and fourteenth requests.

The rule has been laid down by this court

(Oliver v. Nashville, 106 Tenn. 273, 274, 281, 61 S. W. 89; Jones v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 101 Tenn. 443, 47 S. W. 699) that there can be no reversal for error in the charge of the court below where we can clearly see that a correct result was reached by the jury, and that another trial, with a proper charge could not change that result. The same rule must obtain where evidence was improperly excluded in the court below, if it be perfectly apparent to this court that the result attained was the correct one, that the excluded evidence could not have changed that result, and that, upon a new trial being granted, the jury, on that and on other uncontrovertible propositions of fact appearing in the record, could not fail to reach the same conclusion. To reverse in such a case would be, considering the whole case together, to grant a reversal for an immaterial error, and so to violate that section of the Code which provides that "no judgment, decision, or decree of the inferior court shall be reversed in the supreme court, unless for errors which affect the merits of the judgment, decision, or decree complained of," Shannon's Code, § 6351.

Now, it is shown, beyond doubt, that the goods reached Philadelphia at 5 o'clock in the afternoon of July 3d, too late for notice to the consignee, and delivery on that day; that the next day (July 4th) was a holiday, on which there could be neither notice nor delivery; that from July 3d, at 5 o'clock P. M., till July 4th, at 11 o'clock P. M., a period of thirty hours, the goods were left exposed to the hot weather, in the company's yard, without any additional icing,—protected only by such ice as remained in the bunkers of the car, left over or remaining from the ice with which the car was furnished when it started on its trip; that the amount so left over in the car was insufficient to preserve the goods, in consequence of which they, being perishable goods, suffered injury and decay; and, finally, that the company had at hand, in its terminal for perishable freights, the Quaker City Cold Storage & Warehouse Company, the means of preventing the injury, if it had chosen to use these means. These facts show a clear case of negligence on the part of the railroad company. Having reached Philadelphia with the goods on the afternoon of July 3d, too late to give notice and make delivery on that day, and knowing, likewise, that it could not give notice and make delivery on the next day, because it was a holiday, and, indeed, that it could not make delivery until the morning of July 5th, and knowing that the weather was very hot, and that the goods were perishable, and would probably spoil unless put in cold storage, and having at hand the means of so putting them in cold storage and preserving them, it was the duty of the company to so care for and preserve them. The failure to do so resulting in injury to the goods, the carrier is liable therefor.

The judgment of the court below must, therefore, notwithstanding the errors mentioned, be affirmed, with costs.

CONTINENTAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The police power justifies legislation providing that insurance policies shall not be avoided for the falsity of representations or warranties, unless made with intent to deceive, or increasing the risk of loss; and it is immaterial that it is made to apply only to those issued by old-line companies, and not to those issued on the assessment plan.
2. Violation of a provision in a fire insurance policy that it shall be void unless an inventory and books of account are kept in a fire-proof safe is within the operation of a statute providing that false warranties shall not avoid the policy, unless made with intent to deceive, or unless they increase the risk.
3. Misrepresentation as to the state of title cannot be charged against the applicant for fire insurance where he states the title correctly, and it is erroneously written in the application without his knowledge by the agent of the insurer.
4. Misrepresentations as to encumbrances do not increase the risk, so as to avoid a policy of insurance on the property, where the statute provides that misrepresentations shall not avoid the policy, unless they increase the risk, or are made with intent to deceive.
5. A fire insurance policy is not avoided by misrepresentations as to encumbrances on the property where the applicant made no representations upon the subject, but the statement was inserted by the company's agent without knowledge of the applicant, and he signed the application without reading it.

6. Failure to furnish proofs of loss within the time required by a fire insurance policy does not prevent an enforcement of the policy where such failure is not, while other things are, made a ground of forfeiture by the policy, and proofs of loss are furnished before suit is brought.
7. A statute imposing a penalty upon a fire insurance company for refusal, in bad faith, to pay the amount due upon a policy, and also a like penalty upon an insured who institutes an action in bad faith, is not void as a special regulation of the business of insurance, which no differences between that and other kinds of business justify.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bedford County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas R. Myers for appellant.

Messrs. W. B. Bates and B. D. Kingree for appellees.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Whitaker & Dillard, the defendants in error, in the circuit court of Bedford county, against the Continental Fire Insurance Company, seeking to recover on a policy issued by that company to them on May 21, 1901, insuring a storehouse at the sum of $100, with fixtures therein at $100, and a stock of merchandise therein at $1,500; in all $1,700.

The property was destroyed by fire on September 9, 1903.

The case was tried at the August term, 1903, of Bedford circuit court, when the jury rendered a verdict of $1,700, the full amount of the policy, and for the additional sum of $250 attorneys' fees, under Acts 1901, p. 248, chap. 141.

The insurance company has appealed and assigned errors.

The first error assigned is that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict. Under this are comprehended the following points, viz.: That the defendants in error warranted that they owned the legal title to the property, whereas the testimony shows that they did not; that they warranted that the storehouse was unencumbered, when in fact it was heavily encumbered; that the policy contained what is known as the "iron-safe clause," and the testimony shows that this was not complied with; that the policy provided that the proofs of loss should be furnished within sixty days from the date 64 L. R. A.

of the fire, and that this provision was not complied with. It is insisted that all of these were warranties by the terms of the policy, and a failure to comply with either of them avoided the policy.

Another assignment raises the question of the constitutionality of § 22 of the Tennessee insurance act of 1895 (chapter 160, p. 332, of the Acts of that year). This section is reproduced as § 3306 of Shannon's Code of Tennessee.

Other assignments raise the question of the constitutionality of chapter 141, p. 248, Acts 1901.

We shall consider these objections in the following order:

1. As to the constitutionality of § 22, chap. 160, p. 332, Acts 1895 (Shannon's Code, § 3306).

This section reads as follows:

"No written or oral misrepresentation or warranty therein made in the negotiation of a contract or policy of insurance, or in the application therefor by the assured, or in his behalf, shall be deemed material or defeat or void the policy or prevent its attaching, unless such misrepresentation is made with actual intent to deceive, or unless the matter represented increase the risk of loss."

This section has been twice approved and applied in reported cases. Light v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 105 Tenn. 480, 58 S. W. 851, and Hartford L. Ins. Co. v. Stalling (Tenn.) 72 S. W. 960. In both of these cases the validity of the legislation was tacitly assumed, but in neither of them was the question of constitutionality directly raised. Some presumption of constitutionality, of course, arises from the above-mentioned decisions applying the law as a valid one; but this does not relieve us of the duty of considering and determining the question when directly made.

The section quoted is assailed on the ground that it is vicious class legislation. It is said that the classification is improper, in the first place, because the rule laid down limiting the power to make binding warranties capable of forfeiting the contract is confined to insurance companies alone; and, in the second place, that it does not apply to all kinds of insurance companies operating upon the assessment plan.

The title of the act of which § 22 is a part (Acts 1895, chap. 160, p. 332) indicates that it was passed for the purpose of laying down rules "to govern and regulate the business of insurance" "other than life and casualty insurance upon the assessment plan." The act applies to both foreign and domestic companies. The generality of the title, nothing else appearing, would justify the conclusion that it was intended to embrace all kinds of insurance except life insurance upon the assessment plan and casualty insurance upon that plan; thus apparently including within its scope fire insurance companies upon the assessment plan. An attentive examination, however, of the body of the act discloses the fact that its scope is not so broad. This clearly appears from the provisions of §§ 9 and 10, fixing the terms on which foreign fire insurance companies may do business, from which it appears that the act had in contemplation only companies possessing a capital stock. The same appears, in respect of domestic fire insurance companies, from § 13. Moreover, as to the latter the same result is reached by a comparison of the act with chapter 220, p. 443, Acts 1895, which makes provision for the business of mutual or assessment fire insurance companies organized or incorporated under the laws of this state. It does not appear that any provision is made in either of the acts for the business of foreign fire insurance companies of this character; that is, those operating on the mutual or assessment plan. The business of life and casualty companies operating upon this plan is provided for by Acts 1887, chap. 178, p. 303, and Acts 1893, chap. 6.

It seems, therefore, that the classification made by chapter 160, p. 332, Acts 1895, is of all insurance companies other than those operating on the mutual or assessment plan. We have, then, on the one hand, nonassessment companies; on the other, assessment companies. To the first class the provisions of § 22, above copied, apply; to the second class they do not apply. Is there a good reason underlying the classification? We think there is. It is obvious, without going into the particulars of the matter, that the two classes of companies operate on principles so radically different that different and distinct regulations are required for their management. Is there a good reason why the provisions of § 22 should be made to apply to the one class, and not to the other? A sufficient reason seems to be found in the diverse relations which the policy holders of the different classes bear to their respective companies. In the assessment companies each policy holder is an integral part of the whole. The members mutually insure each other. In them are vested the control and regulation of the affairs of the company. There is, therefore, in those companies not so great a tendency to oppression, and to the abuse of power, as in stock companies organized for the profit of their stockholders, who need not be policy holders. It may be well supposed that temptations to the abuse of power er, so likely to arise in companies of the latter class, either would not arise at all in those of the former, or, if arising, would be corrected by the organization itself, the interest of each being, in a sense, that of all.

But, aside from this, if, upon the second division of the subject, it be found that § 22 is justified under the police power of the state, it would be immaterial that the legislature had determined to impose it upon policies issued by nonassessment companies, and had not chosen to do the same thing in respect of policies issued by assessment companies. If an act falls under the police power, the legislature must judge of the objects upon which the statute shall operate. The court cannot declare it void on the ground that there are, in its opinion, other objects equally deserving of the attention of the legislature, which it has omitted to notice.

That legislation of this character is justifiable under the police power, there can now no longer be any doubt.

There was a similar statute passed in Pennsylvania on June 23, 1885 (P. L. 134), reading as follows: "Whenever the application for a policy of life insurance contains a warranty of the truth of the answers therein contained, no misrepresentation or untrue statement in such application, made in good faith by the applicant, shall effect a forfeiture or be a ground of defense in any suit brought upon any policy of insurance issued upon the faith of such application, unless such misrepresentation or untrue statement relate to some matter material to the risk." Speaking of this statute, in Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank & T. Co. 38 L. R. A. 33, 19 C. C. A. 286, 37 U. S. App. 692, 72 Fed. 413, pending in the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit, Taft, J., said: "That such statutes are remedial in their nature, and are quite within the police power of the legislature, is no longer a debatable question;" citing White v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 Dill. 177, Fed. Cas. No. 17,545; Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Clements, 140 U. S. 226, 35 L. ed. 497, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 822; Wall v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 32 Fed. 273; Eagle Ins. Co. v. Ohio, 153 U. S. 446, 38 L. ed. 778, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 868; Reilly v. Franklin Ins. Co. 43 Wis. 449, 28 Am. Rep. 552; Queen Ins. Co. v. Leslie, 47 Ohio St. 409, 9 L. R. A. 45, 24 N. E. 1072; 4 Thomp. Corp. §§ 5491, 5524. In commenting upon a similar statute in Missouri, Dillon, J., said: "The legislature of Missouri conceived, and, we think, wisely, that the promises held forth to the assured in the policies in general use were but too often a delusion and a snare, and, as the courts were powerless to correct the evil, it ought to be corrected by statute." White v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 Dill. 182, Fed. Cas. No. 17,545. In speaking of a similar statute existing in New Hampshire, the supreme court of that state, through Foster, Ch. J., said: "The policy and purpose of the law were to promote honest and open fair dealing, to do equal justice, to protect the confidence reposed by the insured in those with whom he may contract, and (especially disclaiming any reference to this defendant company), to spring the traps concealed in the mass of rubbish before the unwary traveler shall have put his foot in them, to prevent and prohibit, in short, the farce and fraud by which it has too often been found that the party apparently insured by the stipulations written upon one side of a piece of paper was uninsured by the conditions involved in the 'insurance typography' indorsed upon the other side of the same piece of paper." [Chamberlain v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 264]. See also Hermany v. Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. 151 Pa. 17, 24, 24 Atl. 1064; Albert v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 122 N. C. 92, 65 Am. Soc.* 163 Mass. 108, 27 L. R. A. 398, 39 N. E. 771; Hogan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 164 Mass. 448-450, 41 N. E. 663.

2. As to the iron-safe clause.

This clause in the policy reads as follows: "The following covenant and warranty is hereby made a part of this policy: (1st) The assured will take a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand at least once in each calendar year, and, unless such inventory has been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, one shall be taken in detail within thirty days of the issuance of this policy, or this policy shall be null and void from this date, and, upon demand of the assured, the unearned premium from such date shall be returned. (2d) The assured will keep a set of books, which shall clearly and plainly present a complete record of business transactions, including all purchases, sales, and shipments, both for cash and credit, from date of inventory as provided for in the 1st section of this clause, and during the continuance of this policy. (3d) The assured will keep such books and inventories, and also the last preceding inventory, if such has been taken, securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy is not actually open for business; or, failing in this, the assured will keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to fire which would destroy the aforesaid building.

"In the event of failure to produce such set of books and inventories for the inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a bar to any recovery thereon."

The same thing appears, in substance, in the application, and is therein also denominated a "warranty."

If the foregoing provisions of the policy were binding as a warranty, and that warranty should be strictly construed, it would necessarily follow that the complainant could not recover, inasmuch as the testimony fails to show that the provisions referred to were fully complied with. It becomes pertinent, therefore, to pass upon the validity of the said provisions.

We are of the opinion that the said provisions fall directly within the terms of § 22, chap. 160, p. 332, Acts 1895. It is not insisted that the representations contained therein were made with actual intent to deceive. It is also clear that the warranty, so called, purporting to be contained within the clauses above mentioned, could not increase the risk of loss. The provisions referred to could be useful only in preserving for the insurance company, and for the insured as well, accurate evidence of the amount of the goods on hand at the date of the fire. Such evidence is no doubt highly desirable in all cases, and so far the provisions of the iron-safe clause are commendable; and it cannot be doubted that in every case a failure to preserve books and papers, if not satisfactorily explained, would be a circumstance of great weight against the insured in estimating the amount of the loss. It cannot be said, therefore, that the requirements contained in the said iron-safe clause are wholly ineffectual or unimportant. It is true that under the terms of § 22 of the statute above referred to they cannot be treated as warranties, and as avoiding the policy for failure to comply therewith. The statute must be read into the policy, and so much of the latter as is in conflict with the law so laid down must be held as entirely nugatory as if never written. Still, after expunging so much of the language quoted as undertakes to create a warranty, making void the policy for failure to comply therewith, there yet remains a rational and valid agreement, failure to substantially comply with which imposes upon the insured the duty of making a satisfactory explanation; and a total failure to comply arouses such grounds of suspicion in the mind of the court as to require proof of a high degree of certainty to establish the amount of the loss. This was, in substance, the view taken by this court in the case of Valensky v. Conn. F. Ins. Co. (decided at Knoxville during the year 1901).

In the present case it appears there was a reasonable compliance with the terms contained in the iron-safe clause, and the testimony clearly shows that the loss was as great as the recovery allowed in the court below.

3. As to misrepresentations concerning the legal title.

The application states that the legal title was in the firm of Whitaker & Dillard, the assured. The testimony, however, shows that Mr. Whitaker stated the matter truly to the agent of the company,—that is, that he owned the property, and not the firm; but the agent who wrote the application put it down in the manner stated, and this application was never read over by either Whitaker or Dillard. On the contrary, trusting to the correctness of the agent, whom they knew well, they signed it without reading it. It has been held in this state that it is competent to introduce such testimony, notwithstanding the application, and that, upon such facts being proved, the insured is exonerated from the charge of misrepresentation. Planters' Ins. Co. v. Sorrels, 1 Baxt. 352, 25 Am. Rep. 780; Home Ins. Co. v. Stone River Nat. Bank, 88 Tenn. 369, 12 S. W. 915; McCarthy v. Catholic Knights, 102 Tenn. 345, 352, 52 S. W. 142, and authorities cited. See also Light v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 105 Tenn. 480, 58 S. W. 851, and Southern Ins. Co. v. Estes, 106 Tenn. 472, 52 L. R. A. 915, 82 Am. St. Rep. 892, 62 S. W. 149.

4. As to the encumbrance upon the storehouse.

The application states that there were no encumbrances, but the testimony shows that the storehouse and the lot on which it was situated were heavily encumbered.

The policy was not avoided by this conflict between the application and the facts as existing at the time, for the reason stated in the preceding division, namely, because it appears that the application was written by the company's agent, and was not read over by the applicants; and, further, that they did not in fact make any statement to the agent that the property was unencumbered. Moreover, it was held in the two cases last cited that a misrepresentation as to encumbrances would not avoid the policy, because such liens do not increase the risk, as the secured debt would remain after the destruction of the property. Light v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 105 Tenn. 480, 58 S. W. 851, and Southern Ins. Co. v. Estes, 106 Tenn. 472, 52 L. R. A. 915, 82 Am. St. Rep. 892, 62 S. W. 149.

5. As to the proofs of loss.

The policy contains the following: "The sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy shall be payable sixty days after notice, ascertainment, estimate, satisfactory proof of the loss having been received by this company in accordance with the terms of the policy. . . . If fire occur the insured shall, . . . within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing," make proofs of loss. "The loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required, have been received by this company," etc. "No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity, until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months after the fire."

No forfeiture is provided for in the policy for failure to furnish the proofs of loss within sixty days next after the fire, although there are many other acts referred to in the policy and omissions also referred to therein, for which forfeitures are provided.

In the present case the proofs of loss were furnished within sixty-nine days after the fire, but not within sixty days. The suit was not brought until the expiration of sixty days from the filing of the proofs of loss, and it was brought within twelve months after the fire.

The rule laid down in Joyce on Insurance applicable to this state of facts is as follows: "If a policy of insurance provides that notice and proofs of loss are to be furnished within a certain time after loss has occurred, but does not impose a forfeiture for failure to furnish them within the time prescribed, and does impose a forfeiture for a failure to comply with other provisions of the contract, the insured may, it is held, maintain an action, though he does not furnish proofs within the time designated, provided he does furnish them at some other time prior to commencing the action upon the policy. And this has been held to be true, even though the policy provide that no action can be maintained until after a full compliance with all the requirements thereof."

We regard this as a sound statement of the law, and adopt it. It is supported by numerous authorities. Steele v. German Ins. Co. 93 Mich. 81, 18 L. R. A. 85, 53 N. W. 514; Hull v. Concordia F. Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 403, 51 N. W. 524; Tubbs v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 84 Mich. 646, 48 N. W. 296; Rynalski v. Insurance Co. 96 Mich. 395, 55 N. W. 981; German Ins. Co. v. Brown, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 601, 29 S. W. 313; Vanginder-taelen v. Phenix Ins. Co. 82 Wis. 112, 33 Am. St. Rep. 29, 51 N. W. 1122; Flatley v. Phenix Ins. Co. 95 Wis. 618, 70 N. W. 828; Kahnweiler v. Phenix Ins. Co. 57 Fed. 562; Kenton Ins. Co. v. Downs, 90 Ky. 236, 13 S. W. 882; Coventry Mut. Live Stock Ins. Asso. v. Evans, 102 Pa. 281; Taber v. Royal Ins. Co. 124 Ala. 681, 26 So. 252; Rheims v. Standard F. Ins. Co. 39 W. Va. 672, 20 S. E. 670; Shell v. German Ins. Co. 60 Mo. App. 644; Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Mattingly, 77 Tex. 162, 13 S. W. 1016.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the case of defendants in error was not barred by their failure to furnish the proofs of loss.

6. As to the constitutionality of chapter 141, p. 248, Acts 1901.

This act, so far as necessary to be quoted, reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. The several insurance companies of this state, and foreign insurance companies, and other corporations, firms, or persons doing insurance business in this state, in all cases when a loss occurs and they refuse to pay the same within sixty days after a demand shall have been made by the holder of said policy on which said loss occurred, shall be liable to pay the holder of said policy, in addition to the loss and interest thereon, a sum not exceeding 25 per cent on the liability for said loss: Provided, that it shall be made to appear to the court or jury trying the case that the refusal to pay said loss was not in good faith, and that such failure to pay inflicted additional expense, loss, or injury upon the holder of said policy: and, Provided, further, that such additional liability within the limit prescribed shall, in the discretion of the court or jury trying the case, be measured by the additional expense, loss, and injury thus entailed.

"Sec. 2. In the event it shall be made to appear to the court or jury trying the cause that the action of said policy holder in bringing said suit was not in good faith, and recovery under said policy shall not be had, said policy holder shall be liable to such insurance companies, corporations, firms, or persons in a sum not exceeding 25 per cent of the amount of loss claimed under said policy: Provided, that such liability, within the limits prescribed, shall, in the discretion of the court or jury trying the cause, be measured by the additional expense, loss, or injury inflicted upon said insurance companies, corporations, firms, or persons by reason of said suit."

It is insisted that the foregoing act is unconstitutional, because no other business except that of insurance is operated in a similar manner. This objection assumes that there is no such difference between insurance business and other kinds as would justify a different regulation in respect of the former; and, furthermore, that there can be no burden placed by law upon one business which is not at the same time imposed upon all other kinds. Both assumptions are unsound, — understanding by the use of the term "burdens" in the latter assumption matters in the nature of regulations. We need not discuss the second division of the inquiry. It seems clear that there is a sufficient difference between insurance contracts and others to authorize the provisions of the statute. No one would carry insurance except for the indemnity that contracts of this character provide. The burden is a heavy one, and an enormous tax upon individual incomes and upon the whole country as well. This heavy sacrifice is endured through long series of years, with the just expectation that upon the maturity of the contract insurance companies will promptly and honestly comply with their agreement to pay the indemnity; and this payment is usually of very great importance to policy holders, not only in the respect of the amount involved, but also in the promptness of the payment. The maturity of these contracts most generally arrives when the beneficiaries of them are in dire need. A man's dwelling house has been destroyed, and he has no means of providing shelter for his family. His storehouse and goods have been consumed by fire, and his business is ruined unless he can promptly recover his insurance. The head of a family dies, and his widow and little ones are left without the means of support unless they can promptly obtain the relief which the husband and father provided for them through long years of toil and sacrifice in paying insurance premiums. When people, under such conditions, are met by heart-breaking delays induced by the attempt of the companies to enforce upon them through litigation the technical defenses crouched in the jungle of fine print with which these policies are overgrown, and they are compelled to employ counsel and undergo other expense to enable them to maintain their rights and secure a just settlement on a fair and reasonable basis, it is neither unconstitutional, nor improper from any point of view, that the legislature should pass a law one of the purposes of which is to protect the policy holder from the expenses so made necessary by the action of the insurance company when it shall be made to appear that the defense is not made in good faith. Even-handed justice is dispensed to the companies in the 2d section, which provides for a similar recovery of expenses in their favor against the policy holder if it shall appear that he has not brought suit in good faith.

Statutes even more stringent than our own, in that they do not contain the compensating provisions of the 2d section of our act, have been sustained as constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. These statutes are set out and discussed in the following cases: Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 922, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662; Iowa L. Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 187 U. S. 335, 47 L. ed. 204, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 126; Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Dobney, 189 U. S. 301, 47 L. ed. 821, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565.

We shall refer especially to only the latest of these cases. In that case the Supreme Court had before it a statute of Nebraska the 45th section of which was as follows: "The court, upon rendering judgment against an insurance company upon any such policy of insurance, shall allow the plaintiff a reasonable sum as an attorney's fee to be taxed as part of the costs." Comp. Stat. 1903, chap. 43.

Speaking to this section, the court, through Mr. Justice White, said: "All the grounds relied upon to demonstrate that the statute allowing a reasonable attorney's fee in case of the unsuccessful defense of a suit to enforce certain insurance policies is repugnant to the equality clause of the 14th Amendment are embraced in the following proposition: First, because it arbitrarily subjects insurance companies to a liability for attorneys' fees when other defendants in other classes of cases are not subjected to such burden; second, because, whilst the obligation to pay attorneys' fees is imposed on insurance companies in the cases embraced by the statute, no such burden rests on the plaintiff in favor of the insurance companies where the suit on a policy is successfully defended; and, third, because the statute arbitrarily distinguishes between insurance policies by allowing an attorney's fee in case of a suit on a policy covering real estate, where the property has been totally destroyed, and excluding the right to such fees in suits to enforce policies on other classes of property, or where there has not been a total destruction of the property covered by the insurance. Each and all of these propositions must rest on the assumption that contracts of insurance, generically considered, do not possess such distinctive attributes as to justify their classification separate from other contracts, and that contracts of insurance, as between themselves, may not be classified separately, depending upon the nature of the insurance, the character of the property covered, and the extent of the loss which may have supervened. But the unsoundness of these propositions is settled by the previous adjudications of this court. Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. ed. 552, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281; John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Warren, 181 U. S. 73, 45 L. ed. 955, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 535; Fidelity Mut. Life Asso. v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 922, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 662. In the Orient Case a statute of the state of Missouri, which subjected fire insurance contracts to an exceptional rule, was upheld, not only on the ground of the right of the state to prescribe the conditions upon which an insurance company should transact business within its borders, but also because the rule in question was the lawful exercise of the power to classify. In the Warren Case a like principle was applied to a statute of the state of Ohio establishing a particular regulation as to life insurance companies. In the Mettler Case a statute of the state of Texas was sustained, applicable alone to life-insurance-company policies, which authorized the enforcement, not only of a reasonable attorney's fee, but also of 12 per cent damages after demand, in case of the unsuccessful defense of a suit to enforce a life insurance policy. In all three of the cases referred to, therefore, it was necessarily held that insurance contracts were so distinct as to justify legislative classification apart from other contracts, or to authorize a classification of insurance contracts so as to subject one character of such contracts, when put in one class, to one rule, and other varieties of such contracts, when placed in another class, to a different rule. The only claimed distinction between the cases previously decided and the present one is that in this case the classification is made to depend, not alone upon the general character of the contract, but upon the kind of property insured and the extent of the loss. This, it is elaborately argued, takes this case out of the rule established by the previous cases, and causes the statute to be repugnant to the 14th Amendment. But, as the rule settled by the previous cases is that contracts of insurance from their very nature are susceptible of classification, not only apart from other contracts, but from each other, it must follow, as the lesser is included in the greater, that the character of the property insured and the extent of the loss afford reasons for subclassification."

We are of opinion, therefore, that the act referred to is a constitutional and valid law.

As previously stated, under this act the jury allowed $250 as attorneys' fees, and this verdict was approved by the court below, and judgment rendered thereon. There was no error in this action of the court.

None of the assignments of error being well taken, and no error being found in the action of the court below, the judgment must be affirmed, with costs.

M. O. BOX, Admr., etc., of Bettie W. Justice, Deceased.

1. The contingent interest in the proceeds of a life insurance policy, which are payable to the wife of the assured, should she survive him, otherwise to his "executors, administrators, or assigns," is vested in him, and not in his representatives, as a special class, for the benefit of his heirs, so that he can dispose of it by assignment prior to the death of his wife.
2. The assignment by a man to his wife of his contingent interest in a policy of insurance on his life, which is payable to her should she survive him, but to his personal representatives or assigns in case she dies before he does, divests him of all interest in the policy, so that, in case he survives her, he will acquire a right to the proceeds of the policy, if at all, by virtue of his right as surviving husband, and not under the terms of the policy.
3. A parol assignment, accompanied by delivery of the policy, is sufficient to transfer the right to the proceeds of a life insurance policy.
4. The common-law right of a man to succeed to the property of his wife, upon her death, does not operate in favor of one who murders his wife.
On Rehearing.
5. A finding that one committing murder was, at one time, desperate, does not require the inference that he was insane.
6. A holding that the common-law right of succession to property does not operate in favor of one who wilfully takes the life of his ancestor does not violate a constitutional provision that conviction of crime shall not work a forfeiture of estate.
7. All English statutes in force in Tennessee prior to the adoption of the Code of 1858 were repealed by that enactment.

8. The incapacity of a man's administrator to receive the proceeds of a policy on his life which had been assigned to his wife, because he wilfully took her life, does not cause their escheat to the state, but they will pass to her distributees, as though the husband had never been in existence.

ERROR to the Court of Chancery Appeals to review a decree reversing a decree of the Chancery Court for Humphreys County in favor of defendant in a suit to determine the title to the proceeds of a policy of insurance on the life of A. E. Justice, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. F. Shannon, Robert T. Shannon, John B. Bowman, and J. E. Tubb, for plaintiff in error:

Under the law the husband is, upon the wife's death, entitled to all her personalty, though the same be her separate estate.

The said court erred in holding that the devolution of property under the law was changed by the fact that the husband killed the wife, and, because of said fact, that neither the husband nor his estate could take or succeed to the wife's personal estate, under the law.

No stronger answer can be made to the contention that murder does not affect the rights of the murderer than that of the note to the case of Shellenberger v. Ramsom, 25 L. R. A. 564.

Beard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a contest between complainant, as administrator of Mrs. Bettie W. Justice, deceased, and the defendant, who is administrator of her late husband, A. E. Justice, over the proceeds of an insurance policy upon the life of the husband. These proceeds were paid over to the defendant administrator upon an agreement between him and the complainant that this was to be without prejudice to the rights of the latter, and that they were to be held by him to await the determination of this suit.

The facts out of which this controversy grows are that on the 8th of February, 1900,—about two years after the marriage of the two deceased parties,—the husband obtained an insurance policy on his life in the sum of $10,000, which was made "payable to the wife of the assured should she survive; otherwise to his executors, administrators, or assigns." Immediately after its issuance the husband delivered the policy to his wife, with the statement that it was her policy, and that she must pay the premiums accruing on it. This was done by her, so that out of her own estate all of the premiums were paid by her, and the policy, from the time it was so delivered to her until her death, was in her possession and under her exclusive control.

The court of chancery appeals finds that the assured took out this policy for the benefit of his wife in view of her means received and used by him and "with the intention that she should keep it alive, . . . and that it should belong to her." As confirmatory of the purpose of the husband, both with regard to the issuance and delivery of the policy to the wife, that court finds that the husband, on different occasions and to different parties, said that it belonged to his wife, and that these declarations, "coupled with the delivery to and the payment of all premiums by her at his request, clearly indicated an assignment by him of the policy to her; so as, under our authorities, to constitute it thereafter her separate estate."

Subsequently to these transactions, to wit, in May, 1902, so obnoxious had the husband, by reason of his conduct, become to his wife, she filed in the chancery court of Humphreys county, in this state, a bill for divorce, alleging as ground thereof cruel and inhuman treatment, drunkenness, and unfaithfulness to his marriage vows. It was also averred by her that he had squandered large sums of money belonging to her estate in immoral dissipation, and an injunction was prayed restraining him from disposing of certain property of which he had then possession, and also from coming to her home, or in any way interfering with her.

This bill was filed during the temporary absence of the husband from the town of Waverly, where the parties resided. On his return, and after the service of process, he made ineffectual efforts at a reconciliation with his wife. Disappointed in these efforts, on the 19th of May, 1902, having armed himself with a pistol, he entered a place of concealment near the home of his wife, where he remained until he saw her come out, when, rushing upon her, he shot her to death, and then turning the pistol upon himself, he inflicted a mortal wound, from the effect of which he died some four hours later.

Upon this state of facts the present controversy arises. The complainant, for the estate of Mrs. Justice, insists that the policy in question was a right existing in his intestate at the time of her death, and that while, under ordinary or normal conditions, it would have vested in her husband surviving, jure mariti, yet, inasmuch as this survivorship was brought about by his felonious act, his estate will not be permitted to make profit out of it, but the policy or its proceeds will be preserved to the representative of her estate, for the benefit of her children, who are her distributees.

On the other hand, it is contended by the defendant that the representative of the husband had, by the words of the policy, a fixed right in the same, defeasible only upon the wife surviving and, if this is not so, then the husband's right accrued to him jure mariti, and that this right should not be forfeited by the murder of his wife.

Before considering these respective contentions, it is proper to arrive at a true interpretation of the policy with the view of ascertaining the respective rights of these parties at the time of the commission of the felony in question. As has already been stated, the policy was upon the life of the husband, payable to the wife upon condition that she outlived him; in other words, the title to the proceeds of the policy, if kept alive by the payment of the premiums, would have been the property of the wife in the event she outlived her husband. This right was defeasible alone upon her dying first. It was only upon the happening of this contingency that either he or his assigns or representatives would be entitled to those proceeds. It is insisted, however, that no interest by the terms of the policy accrued to the husband, but that his administrators or executors, as a special class, were to take in the event the contingency happened, in the interest of his estate, but independent of him. This contention, we think, is unsound.

Mr. Biddle, in volume 1, § 287, of his work on Insurance, says: "Usually a policy taken by the insured, payable to the insured's heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, goes to the estate of the insured, and, of course, may be assigned by him in his lifetime." In support of this context the author cites the following cases which more or less go to sustain it: Rawson v.

Jones, 52 Ga. 458; Swift v. Railway Pass. & F. C. Mut. Aid & Ben. Asso. 96 Ill. 309; Pilcher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 322; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Flack, 3 Md. 341, 56 Am. Dec. 742; Winchester v. Stebbins, 16 Gray, 52; Wason v. Colburn, 99 Mass. 342; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Ryan, 8 Mo. App. 535; Edington v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 13 Hun, 543; Williams v. Corson, 2 Tenn. Ch. 269.

In Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, it seems that an endowment policy was issued upon the life of one Armstrong, in which it was agreed that the company should pay to the assured or his assigns, on the 8th of December, 1897, or, if he should die before that time, to his legal representatives, the amount of the policy. It was issued at the instance of one Hunter, who paid the premium upon it, and took an assignment thereof from the assured. Soon after its issuance, Armstrong was murdered. Suspicion falling upon the assignee, Hunter, as the perpetrator of the murder, he was indicted and convicted. Subsequently he was hung. The administratrix of Armstrong instituted suit upon the policy. Upon the trial of the case, upon the assumption that the insurance money was payable, in case that death occurred before the expiration of the endowment term, to the legal representatives of the assured, and that the policy was not assignable by him, certain evidence was rejected by the court, and its action in that respect was assigned as error in the Supreme Court of the United States. With regard to this that court said: "The ruling cannot be upheld. The position that the assignment did not take effect because the assured died before the expiration of the policy is untenable. The provision for payment in such case to his legal representatives was intended to meet the contingency of his dying without having disposed of his interest, and not to limit his power over the contract during his life, and pass the insurance to those who should represent him after his death."

We think, upon the authorities, there can be no doubt of the absolute control of the assured over this policy to the extent, at least, of the contingent interest which he had in it, and that an assignment made by him, or a disposition of it by his will, would convey to his assignee or to his legatee whatever interest might accrue to him from this policy; and we are further satisfied his assignment by parol of the policy to his wife divested him of all contingent interest in it, and vested this interest, in addition to that she already had by its terms, in his wife, and that upon her death, leaving him surviving, he would take, not under the terms of the policy, but by virtue of his right as surviving husband.

That a parol assignment accompanied by delivery of the policy to the wife was sufficient to vest her with the sole interest in this policy is settled by the authorities. In Chapman v. Mallorath, 77 Mo. 38, 46 Am. Rep. 1, it appears that the policy was made payable to the assured, his executors or his assigns. After his marriage he said to his wife that it was taken out for her benefit, and he delivered it to her, saying that it was his purpose to vest her with the title, to her sole and separate use. After this delivery it was kept by the wife in her possession until her husband's death. In a contest between the creditors of the husband and the widow it was held that this was a good assignment.

Mr. Phillips, in volume 1 of his work on Insurance, 4th ed., § 880, says: "Policies are usually assigned in writing; but a mere verbal assignment and delivery of the policy gives to the assignee an equitable right to the proceeds, where the policy itself contains no provision to the contrary." To the same effect is Bliss on Life Insurance, 546. Many cases may be found announcing the same doctrine, not only with regard to policies of insurance, but also as to other choses in action, among which are: Lein-kauf v. Calman, 110 N. Y. 50, 17 N. E. 389; Thompson v. Emery, 27 N. H. 269; Charleston Ins. & T. Co. v. Neve, 2 McMull. L. 237; Marcus v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 68 N. Y. 625; Jones v. Gibbons, 9 Ves. Jr. 407, 7 Revised Rep. 247.

So it is we are satisfied that after this parol assignment of the husband to his wife, supplementing, as it did, the provision of the policy which made the proceeds primarily payable to her in the event she outlived her husband, that it stood at the time of her murder exactly as if it had provided originally that it should be payable to her unconditionally upon her husband's death, and that whatever right or interest accrued thereafter to him was as surviving husband.

The right of the husband to the choses in action of the wife by reason of his survivorship rests upon a rule of the common law of this state, and not upon any statutory enactment. It is impossible to concede, however, that the common law ever contemplated that this rule was to be applied in favor of her husband who makes himself a survivor by the felonious homicide of his wife. If, instead of paying the policy, the insurance company had resisted, and the husband or his representatives were undertaking to enforce payment upon the ground that the contract did not provide for a forfeiture of his rights on account of his felonious act, there can be no doubt, upon reason and authority, that his or their contention could not be maintained.

In the recent case of Burt v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 187 U. S. 362, 47 L. ed. 216, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139, a question akin to the one just stated was considered and determined. The facts of the case were that a policy was issued to Wm. E. Burt upon his own life, payable to his wife if living at the time of his death, otherwise to his executors, administrators, or assigns. Subsequently the assured was, upon indictment, convicted of the murder of his wife, and was afterwards hung in pursuance of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction.

During the lifetime of the wife one half interest of this policy was assigned by her and her husband to the plaintiffs in the action, and after her death the assured conveyed to the same parties the remaining interest in the policy. These assigns were also the sole heirs of the assured, and as such were entitled to the full benefit of the policy, and, claiming as assigns as well as heirs, they instituted suit upon the policy. The court said the question was, "Did insurance policies insure against crime?" The court added: "The researches of counsel have found but one case directly in point (Amicable Soc. v. Bolland, decided by the House of Lords in 1830, Bligh, N. R. 194-211, 2 Dow & C. 1.) The Lord Chancellor, delivering the opinion, after stating the question, answered it in the following brief, but cogent, words: 'It appears to me that this resolves itself into a very plain and simple consideration. Suppose that in the policy itself this risk had been insured against,—that is, that the party insuring had agreed to pay a sum of money year by year upon condition that, in the event of his committing a capital felony, and being tried, convicted, and executed for that felony, his assigns shall receive a certain sum of money,—is it possible that such a contract could be sustained? Is it not void upon the plainest principles of public policy?'

Now, if a policy of that description, with such a form of condition inserted in it in express terms, cannot, on grounds of public policy, be sustained, how is it to be contended that in a policy expressed in such terms as the present, and after the events which have happened, that we can sustain such a claim? Can we, in considering this policy, give to it the effect of that insertion which, if expressed in terms, would have rendered the policy, so far as that condition went, at least, altogether void?"

The Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion embodying this quotation from the English case, and after a review of the authorities, held that the suit of the assigns was not maintainable.

It is true in the present case that the insurance company made no contest, but, conceding its liability, paid over the proceeds of the policy, and they await the determination of this suit. But can it be successfully contended that a claim resting upon a felonious act, which might have been resisted by the insurance company, has acquired more virtue when it is now asserted by the representative of the murderer to the proceeds of that policy? Can those who represent the husband, who, first, by the felonious destruction of the life of his wife, and then as a felo de se, has accelerated the maturity of the policy, take the fruits of his crime under the doctrine of jure mariti? It is true no case has been called to our attention where such a claim has been either asserted or repelled. The courts have been called on to consider cases where statutory rights have been insisted on, though they rested on the felony of the several parties setting them up, or by others claiming through them. Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L. R. A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, 22 N. E. 188, is one of the earliest of the cases in the United States in which this question was considered, and by a majority opinion of certainly great moral force it was held that the intention of the legislature in the general laws passed for the devolution of property by will or descent was that they should not operate in favor of one who murdered his ancestor or benefactor in order speedily to come into possession of his estate, either as devisee, legatee, or heir at law. As against this view, however, are the cases of Owens v. Owens, 100 N. C. 240, 6 S. E. 794; Deem v. Millikin, 6 Ohio C. C. 357, Affirmed in 53 Ohio St. 668, 44 N. E. 1134; Shellenberger v. Ransom, 41 Neb. 631, 25 L. R. A. 564, 59 N. W. 935; Carpenter's Estate, 170 Pa. 203, 29 L. R. A. 145, 50 Am. St. Rep. 765, 32 Atl. 637.

It will thus be seen that the weight of judicial authority is against the holding of the New York court, and it may be conceded that the better legal reasoning is to be found in the opinions dissenting from the views of that court. We do not think, however, that any of these cases meet or control the question with which we are now dealing, and we do not rely upon either one of them for support of conclusion in this case. For it may be true that it would be a stretch of judicial authority to hold that an unambiguous statute providing a line of devolution of property should be interpreted to mean that this line was to be broken upon the felonious homicide of the ancestor or testator by the one next in succession, but is this equally true as to one who rests his claim on this common-law rule?

It is universally conceded that the fundamental principles of the common law are unchangeable, yet the courts recognize the necessity of flexibility in the application of old rules to new cases, so as to enable them to adapt these rules "to the ever-varying conditions and emergencies of human society." Thus, in Woodman v. Pitman, 79 Me. 456, 1 Am. St. Rep. 342, 10 Atl. 321, it is said: "The inexhaustible and ever-changing complications in human affairs are constantly presenting new questions and new conditions which the law must provide for as they arise, and the law has expansive and adaptive force enough to respond to the demands thus made of it, not by subverting, but by forming new combinations, and making new applications out of its already established principles; the result produced being only 'the new corn that cometh out of old fields.'"

This court, in Jacob v. State, 3 Humph. 493, announces the same general doctrine in these words: "The common law of the country will therefore never be entirely stationary, but will be modified and extended by analogy, construction, and custom so as to embrace new relations springing up from time to time from an amelioration or change of society. The present common law of England is as dissimilar from that of Edward III. as is the present state of society. And we apprehend that no one could be found to contend that hundreds of principles which have, in more modern times, been examined, argued, and determined by the judges, are not principles of the common law because not found in the books of that period. They are held to be great and immutable principles, which have slumbered in their repositories because the occasion which called for their exposition had not arisen. The common law, then, is not like the statute law, fixed and immutable, but by positive enactment, except where a principle has been adjudged as the rule of action."

It has been well said that there are certain general and fundamental maxims of the common law which control laws as well as contracts. Among these are: "No one shall be permitted to profit by his own fraud, or to take advantage of his own wrong, or to found any claim upon his own iniquity, or to acquire property by his own crime. These maxims are adopted by public policy, and have their foundation in universal law administered in all civilized countries." These maxims embodied in the common law, and constituting an essential part of its warp and woof, are found announced both in text-books and in reported cases. Without their recognition and enforcement by the courts, their judgments would excite the indignation of all right-thinking people. The first of these maxims is applied in order to prevent one from taking the benefit of his own fraud. Why should not the last be enforced so as to forbid a party receiving the fruits of his own crime?

The last of these maxims cannot be reconciled with the rule insisted on by the administrator of A. E. Justice. This rule, he insists, gives to him, as a matter of law, the proceeds of this policy. Though steeped in crime, and without reference to whether the prior death of Mrs. Justice came naturally or was the result of the felonious assault of her husband, yet his contention is that the policy, with its proceeds passed jure mariti to this husband, and, upon his death, to himself as the legal representative. If this be true, it logically follows that, if he had killed the wife for the purpose of setting in motion this rule, and under it becoming the absolute owner of her choses in action, his common-law right would be enforced. Such a result, if essential, we think would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country, and should arouse the legislative conscience to speedy corrective legislation.

But we do not think that it is essential. The rule in question, though statutory in England, is a common-law rule of property with us, administered by reason of the relation of husband and wife and of the respective rights and obligations growing out of this relation. Carried to the length now insisted upon, it necessarily encounters, among others, the fundamental maxims already referred to, that no man shall found a claim upon his own iniquity, or acquire property by his own crime. The rule thus contended for, and these underlying principles of the common law, cannot stand together. They are utterly irreconcilable if the present contention is sound. But we do not think it sound. To the contrary, we are satisfied that the rule and these maxims find their consistency in the flexibility of the common law and its power of adapting itself to new conditions and new cases. The present is one calling for a limitation on the rule in question, to wit, that it shall not apply where it is called into being by the crime of the husband. Thus qualified, there is perfect reconciliation between the rule and these maxims. Nor do we regard this as an enunciation of a new principle just called into life, but rather, as is said in Jacob v. State, 3 Humph. 515, one of those "great and immutable principles which have slumbered in their repositories because the occasion which called for their exposition had not arisen" heretofore.

As was said by the court in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong: "It would be a reproach to the jurisprudence of the country if one could recover insurance money payable on the death of a party whose life he had feloniously taken. As well might he recover insurance money upon a building that he had wilfully fired." In Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. [1892] 1 Q. B. 147, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 128, 66 L. T. N. S. 220, 40 Week. Rep. 230, 56 J. P. 180, there was a controversy over a policy taken out by James Maybrick, a member of the association, upon his life, payable to Florence E. Maybrick, his wife, if living at the time of the death of the husband; otherwise to his legal representatives. The assured died in 1889, and after his death Florence E. Maybrick assigned by deed to Cleaver all of her interest in the policy. The controversy in the case was between the assignee, the insurance company, and the administrators of the deceased. The association undertook to resist recovery on this policy upon the fact established in the criminal prosecution against the surviving wife that the assured had died from poison feloniously administered by her. This defense, so far as the legal representatives of the deceased was concerned, was held not maintainable, but, in so far as the surviving wife and her assignee, the court held that her felonious act deprived her of all interest in the policy, as well as one claiming through her. Esher, M. R., said: "The rule of public policy in such a case prevents the person guilty of the death of the insured, or any person claiming through such person, from taking the money." Fry, L. J., in dealing with the same question in a separate opinion, used this language: "It appears to me that no system of jurisprudence can, with reason, include amongst the rights which it enforces rights directly resulting to the person asserting them from the crime of that person. If no action can arise from fraud, it seems impossible to suppose that it can arise from felony or misdemeanor. It may be that there is no authority directly asserting the existence of the principle; but the decision of the House of Lords in Amicable Soc. v. Bolland (Fauntleroy's Case), 4 Bligh N. R. 194, 2 Dow. & C. 1, appears to proceed on this principle, and to be a particular illustration of it. This principle of public policy, like all such principles, must be applied to all cases to which it can be applied, without reference to the particular character of the right asserted or the form of its assertion. In Fauntleroy's Case . . . it was held to prevent the assignees of a forger from claiming the benefit of a policy on his death at the hands of justice by reason of his forgery. It would equally apply, it appears to me, to the case of a cestui que trust asserting a right as such by reason of the murder of the prior tenant for life or of the assured in a policy; and it must be so far regarded in the construction of acts of Parliament that general words which might include cases obnoxious to this principle must be read and construed as subject to it."

We think, if it is a sound holding that one named as payee of a policy by the felonious homicide of the assured is, with his assignee, cut off from receiving the benefit of that policy, notwithstanding its expressed terms, that with much more force it can be insisted that one who claims under the common-law rule invoked in this case must be disappointed of a recovery.

This view of the case relieves us from considering the contention that to deprive the surviving husband of this chose in action by reason of his felony, is to enforce a forfeiture of estate against him in the face of §12 of article 1 of the state Constitution. The application of the principle, which we hold to be fundamental and controlling in this case, intervenes between him and the property, so that he never acquired an estate, and therefore forfeited nothing in it.

The result is that the decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the court handed down the following response:

In this case there has been presented to the court a petition for rehearing, in which we are urged to reverse the decree giving the proceeds of the insurance policy in question to the complainant. The counsel for the petitioner misapprehends the basis of the court's former opinion, in that he assumes the court treated the present suit as in the nature of a bill of interpleader, and put the defendant in the attitude of asking active interposition of the court, when, by an agreement between himself and the complainant, he was already in possession of the fund. This assumption would not have been made if counsel had had before him, at the time he prepared his petition, the opinion delivered by the court. In that opinion, in a mere historic way, it was stated that the insurance company had paid over the proceeds of the policy to the defendant administrator upon an agreement between him and the complainant that this was to be without prejudice to the rights of the latter. No point was made upon this, nor did the respective attitudes of the two parties to this suit, or the fact that the proceeds of this policy were in the possession of the administrator of A. E. Justice, enter into the consideration and determination of the questions that were involved. Where the funds were at the time of the institution was regarded and treated as an immaterial fact.

It is also said that there is nothing in the opinion of the court of chancery appeals that warranted the conclusion announced by this court that the husband's contingent right in the policy was given to her. There was nothing else that he could give. The policy was delivered to her after its issuance, and immediately upon its receipt by the husband, with the intention that she should keep it alive, and that it should belong to her. The finding of that court, in language that cannot be misunderstood, was that this policy was assigned by parol to Mrs. Justice, and upon this there was nothing left open for this court to determine except the question of law, and that is whether the parol assignment of this chose in action would carry the right of the assignor to the assignee. In the third place, it is insisted that the effect of the finding of the court of chancery appeals is that the husband was insane at the time he committed the homicide upon his wife. No pretense was made in pleading, nor, so far as we can ascertain from the opinion of the court of chancery appeals in the evidence, that Justice was irresponsible at the time he perpetrated this crime. That court does find that he was desperate, but, as we understand from the use of the word, the inference that the court intended to be drawn was that finding that his wife had determined to separate herself forever from him, and withdraw her person and her estate from his protection, that he was thrown into a furious condition of mind. Evidently it was not an inference drawn from the evidence in the case that he was insane at the time of this murder.

In the original opinion it was said that it was unnecessary to consider the constitutional question raised by the administrator of Justice, for the reason that, under our application of the common-law rule of jure mariti, the title to the policy never vested in the surviving husband, and therefore there was nothing for him to forfeit. It is said, however, that this conclusion could not have been reached by the court, except, by holding the constitutional provision in question of no effect, or as inapplicable. As above indicated, we did hold it as inapplicable, and we still maintain that view. But it is insisted that such a holding violates the spirit of § 12 of article 1 of the Constitution, inasmuch as its effect is to work a forfeiture of the right to take property by devolution under the law, because of the crime committed by the husband. We do not think that such is the effect of our holding, when we simply declined to give the surviving husband the benefit of this common-law rule where his own criminal offense has called it into being.

The provision in question is that "no conviction shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture of estate." This provision has no connection whatever with the devolution of property, but it is intended in its last clause to prevent a forfeiture of an estate of a criminal on account of his offense; but we held that, under the facts found in this record, the surviving husband never acquired an estate in this property, and therefore there was nothing upon which this constitutional provision could operate. The same answer may be made to that part of the petition which calls the attention of the court to §§ 9, 10, art. 1, of the Federal Constitution.

Again, it is said that the right of the surviving husband to take the chose in action of the predeceased wife rests, not upon the common law, but upon the statute of 29 Charles II., chap. 3, § 25, which, as we understand the petition, it is insisted is still in force in this state. This question, however, was put at rest in the case of State v. Miller, 11 Lea, 620. In that case it was said that all prior statutes, whether English or statutes passed in this state, or brought into it from North Carolina, were in effect repealed by the Code of 1858. It is conceded that the effect of § 41 of the Code was to repeal all statutes of this state and of North Carolina theretofore in operation in Tennessee, but it said that this repeal was confined alone to those statutes. It certainly would be an anomalous condition, if all domestic statutes were extinguished by the adoption of the Code of 1858 and antiquated foreign statutes were left in operation in this state. We do not think the revisers of the Code, or the legislature, in adopting it, intended that such a condition should exist; and, whether dictum or not, we are entirely satisfied with the conclusion announced by the court just referred to.

Nor do we think that the result of the opinion complained of, in incapacitating the surviving husband to take this chose in action because of the homicide, is to escheat the property to the state. Because, unquestionably, if the administrator of Justice is not permitted to take the title of the property, it became vested in the administrator of Mrs. Justice upon her death, and from him passes to the distributees of her estate. Nor is there inequity in this. She paid every premium on this policy from the time it was taken out up to her death. She was put in possession of it, with the statement made by her husband that it was taken out for her, and was her property, to be kept alive by her with her own money, and she died with it under her dominion. We think that every legal and equitable consideration tends to support the claim of her administrator, and that, as a matter of right, as well as of sound public policy, the proceeds should pass to those of her blood who stood in closest relationship with her at the time of her death,—to wit, her children,—rather than to the representatives of one whose claim rests alone upon his felonious act.

The petition is dismissed.

Wilkes, J., dissenting in part:

I cannot agree with the result reached by the majority of the court. I agree with their holding that a policy taken out by the insured, payable to his administrators and assigns, goes to the estate of the insured, and may be assigned by him in his lifetime. To that extent the insured has control over it. But if he does not assign it in his lifetime, it passes to his estate, not by descent, but by the terms of the policy.

I am also of the opinion that the policy of interest of the assured thereunder can be assigned by parol and delivery, and such assignment will be good against the beneficiary of the policy, if so intended. But I do not understand that the husband in this case assigned his remainder or contingent interest in the policy, or the interest of his estate, to his wife; nor do I understand the court of appeals to so find. On the contrary, he assigned and delivered the policy, as issued, to her, to be held by her, and to take effect according to its terms and provisions,—that is, she took an interest in it, contingent upon her surviving her husband, and not otherwise, and he held an interest contingent on his surviving her. Waiving the question whether he could, before her death, assign this merely contingent interest, it is sufficient to say he did not do so, nor attempt to do so, and the court of chancery appeals so finds. He intended when he delivered the policy to her that she should take according to its provisions, and not otherwise. There is no indication to the contrary, and the court of chancery appeals does not so find. If there was, it could not prevail against the terms of the policy.

Now, if she had died a natural death, and he had afterwards died without assigning the policy, there can be no doubt it would have gone to his administrator or executor, by the terms of the policy, to be disposed of as the statute provides in cases of distribution. In other words, he or his administrator would have taken under the policy, and not jure mariti.

The fundamental error in the opinion of the majority, as I see it, is in holding that Mr. Justice, when he delivered the policy to his wife, intended to vest in her his contingent interest under it in the event he should survive her. I do not find any warrant for this in the findings of the court of chancery appeals, nor could it have so found in the face of the provisions of the policy, and I think all the circumstances show that he did not so intend, but merely intended that she should take the policy, and hold under it according to its terms. If he had intended to vest in her an absolute interest in the proceeds, without limitation, condition, or contingency, he would have caused the policy to be so worded that in any event she would get the proceeds,—that is, he would have made it payable to her, or he would have made a written indorsement indicating his purpose to transfer his interest and invest in her the absolute and sole right to the proceeds, without condition, contingency, or limitation. He did neither of these things, but merely delivered the policy to her, and she received it according to its terms, and so held it, and could not hold it except according to its terms, and by those terms she had only the contingent interest which depended upon her surviving her husband. There is nothing to show that this contingent interest was cut off, or intended to be cut off, by the delivery of the policy to the wife. The logical inference is to the contrary, and so is the finding of the court of chancery appeals.

The naked question involved in this case is whether the fact that Mr. Justice killed his wife can change the terms of this policy and the statute which provides how the proceeds shall go; not whether he could recover from the insurance company. The company has already paid the money to his administrator, without contest or question.

Now, it is true that it shocks the sense of mankind that a person shall become a beneficiary or hasten a beneficial interest by means of the crime of murder. It may be that the legislature should provide against such a contingency, but I am of the opinion the courts cannot do so.

It is an old maxim that hard cases make bad law, and I fear that the truth of the maxim is illustrated in the result reached in this case, as was done in the case of Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L. R. A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, 22 N. E. 188, cited and relied on in the opinion of the majority, but which was afterwards modified in Ellerson v. Westcott, 148 N. Y. 149, 42 N. E. 540, and which had been disapproved and repudiated by the later and better-considered cases of Owens v. Owens, 100 N. C. 240, 6 S. E. 794; Deem v. Milliken, 53 Ohio St. 668, 44 N. E. 1134; Shelenderger v. Ransom, 41 Neb. 631, 25 L. R. A. 564, 59 N. W. 935; Carpenter's Case, 170 Pa. 203, 29 L. R. A. 145, 50 Am. St. Rep. 765, 32 Atl. 637.

I agree with the majority in its view that the rules of the common law are flexible, and adapt themselves to the new and changing conditions and emergencies of society; but they cannot and did not go to the extent of overriding, repealing, and nullifying the provisions of our statutes, or changing the laws of descent and distribution.

The devolution and distribution of personal property are a matter which is regulated by statute, and the statute cannot be set aside to meet hard cases, or to administer a higher and moral law in its stead.

But it is evident that no such great outrage upon our sense of natural justice can result from allowing the law to take its course in this case as is intimated in the opinion of the majority.

Mr. Justice, the murderer, is not suing in this case, and he can in no event be benefited personally by the proceeds of this policy. He has eliminated himself from the whole transaction by his own suicide. The proceeds of the policy do not go to him. They go to his administrator, to his next of kin, or, in default of next of kin, under the statute, to his creditors. Neither the next of kin nor the creditors were particeps criminis with him in the commission of his crime, and in thereby bringing the policy to maturity. There is no ground, in law or morals, why they should be punished for his criminal act. Their hands are not stained with the blood of Mrs. Justice. They should not be punished for her death. In this connection, it may be well to remark, also, that Mr. Justice did not kill his wife to obtain the insurance. No such thought was in his mind. He killed her in sheer reckless, it may be insane, desperation over her attempt to procure a divorce.

I do not think the cases of Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, and Burt v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 187 U. S. 362, 47 L. ed. 216, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139, cited by the majority, are controlling, or even in point, in the present case.

In those cases the contest and question were between the insurance companies and the beneficiaries under the policies, as to whether the companies could be made to pay the policies.

In this case the insurance company has made no contest, but has paid the proceeds into the hands of the administrator; and the question now is not whether the parties entitled shall be allowed to recover, but whether, having the fund in possession, it shall be confiscated and taken away from them.

In the Armstrong Case it appears that the policy upon Armstrong's life was assigned to Hunter, who was a creditor of Armstrong. Hunter also procured insurance upon Armstrong's life in other companies, and afterwards murdered him in order to obtain the insurance. The insurance company refused to pay the policy on account of the fraud perpetrated upon it in obtaining the insurance for the purpose of killing the insured and obtaining the money. It was held that Armstrong's administrator could not recover, because, in order to secure its immediate payment, the beneficiary murdered the insured. This was, as before stated, a contest between the administrator of the assured and the insurance company as to whether the company could be made to pay.

In the latter case of Burt v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 187 U. S. 362, 47 L. ed. 216, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 139, the contest was also between the assignee of the murderer and the insurance company as to whether the latter could be required to pay the policy by the beneficiary, who had accelerated the maturity of the policy, or his assignee; the assignment being made after the killing had been done.

The insured was legally executed for the killing of his wife, and the holding of the court was that the policy did not insure against his legal execution, and, if his death was the result of a legal execution, then the condition of natural death in the policy, upon which it was to become payable, had not accrued.

In the opinion of the majority it is asked if it can be successfully contended that a claim resting upon a felonious act, which might have been resisted by the insurance company, had acquired more vigor and more virtue when it is asserted by the murderer's representatives, to the proceeds of the policy. We answer that we think such a contention is not only entirely tenable, but wholly legal and logical. It is not the case of the murderer taking the fruits of his own crime. The administrator does not hold under the murderer, nor for his benefit. He holds under the terms of the policy, and for the benefit of the next of kin or creditors of the assured, who are not, or should not be, in any way affected by the crime of the assured. The right to the proceeds does not come to the administrators or next of kin of creditors through any assignment of the murderer, or any descent from him, but solely under the terms of the policy, and the statute applicable thereto. They do not take and do not hold under the murderer, but under the policy, and are innocent of all crime and all bad faith.

To hold with the majority is, in truth, to visit upon the children the iniquities of the father; which human law does not do, whatever may be the rule of the divine law.

In the present case the proceeds of the policy are in the hands of the administrators of the husband, where, under the law, they should be. All defenses of the insurance company have been eliminated from the controversy. The administrators do not seek or need the aid of the court to get possession of the fund. They have it already, and the only question now is, To whom should it be paid? The statute says to the next of kin, or, in default of next of kin, to the creditors. But the opinion of the majority says: "No; we will not allow it to go as the statute says and provides, but will give it to the representatives of the murdered woman, who never took any interest in it, because the condition on which she was to acquire an interest never happened." Not only is the property taken away from the husband's estate, but it is attempted to be given to the wife, who can in no event have an interest in it.

No interest ever vested in her, except the contingent one fixed by the policy, which was extinguished by her dying before her husband. None ever vested in her husband jure mariti, because his wife never had a vested interest. None vested in him after her death, because he did not assign or transfer the policy, or exercise any act of ownership of it, but left it to pass by its terms to his administrators, for the use of his next of kin or creditors.

But if the majority is correct in holding that the entire interest in the policy vested in Mrs. Justice when it was delivered to her, still I am of opinion the majority is incorrect in its conclusions.

If she died the absolute, unconditional owner of the policy, and it would have passed to her husband jure mariti in the event of her natural death, the fact that she was killed by her husband would not cut him off from such right if he were alive. Much less will it cut off his administrator, who already has the fund in his hands, and does not need the aid of the court in any way, but simply holds it to be paid out as the law provides,—to the next of kin, if any, and, if none, then to the creditors, under statute. The marital rights of the husband are protected by the statute, 29 Charles II., chap. 3, § 25, and this statute became a part of the law of this state. This marital right is recognized also by a number of our own statutes.—notably the act of 1875, chap. 89, 64 L. R. A.

and act of 1877, chap. 79 (Shannon's Code, §§ 4237, 4238).

Can the court change the rule of the common law in regard to inheritance in order to punish a criminal offense?

The question is directly considered in the case of Owens v. Owens, 100 N. C. 240, 6 S. E. 794. In that case it is said: "Is the right of the wife to share in the personal estate [of her husband] as a distributee lost or affected by the fact that he died at her hands or through her procurement? Does the child who slays a parent thereby lose his right to participate with his brothers and sisters in the distribution of the personal [estate] or to take his part of the descended real estate? Or, reversing the matter, does the husband who kills his wife impair his right under the statute of distribution to succeed to the ownership of her personal property left after payment of her debts; or, in general terms, does any one, as a consequence of an unlawful taking of human life, become thereby disabled to take a part of the estate left by the deceased, which the law gives him subject to no such conditions? . . . Forfeitures of property for crime are unknown to our law, nor does it intercept for such cause, the transmission of an intestate's property to heirs and distributees, nor can we recognize any such operating principle."

No well-considered case can be found holding a doctrine contrary to this.

The language of Mr. Justice Field in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, in which he holds that Hunter, the murderer, could take nothing under the policy, is a pure dictum, as neither Hunter, nor any one representing him, was before the court in that case; and it was not the question involved in the case.

It was this error in the opinion of Mr. Justice Field that misled the court in Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 5 L. R. A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, 22 N. E. 188. See Shellenberger v. Ransom, 4 Neb. 646, 25 L. R. A. 564, 59 N. W. 935.

In the latter case the question was fully considered, and the cases reviewed, and the former holding of the Nebraska court is reversed.

The case is too long to be copied, but there are so many pertinent points and suggestions in it that we refer to some of them.

In regard to Riggs v. Palmer, relied on by the majority, it says, in substance, that the reasoning in that case was founded very largely on that species of judicial legislation characterized as "rational construction," and was based upon the civil law and Code Napoleon, and not in common-law rules and maxims.

But, says the court, our laws of descent contain no such provisions as the Code Napoleon or the civil law, to wit, that one cannot take property by inheritance or will from an ancestor or benefactor whom he has killed.

It was further said that this resort to the Code Napoleon was made because the result could not be reached by the rules of the common law, and that the opinion was confessedly judicial legislation.

The opinion, reasoning, and conclusion of the court were strongly condemned, and it has not been followed, even in New York.

It was further said, in commenting on that case, that it seems to have been largely prompted by the horror and repulsion with which it may be justly supposed the framers of our statute would have viewed the crime and its consequences if they had had it in mind.

"But," says the Nebraska court, "this is no justification to this court for assuming to supply legislation, the necessity for which had been suggested by subsequent events, but which did not occur to the minds of those legislators by whom our statute of descent was framed. Neither the limitations of the civil law nor the prompting of humanity can be read into a statute from which, without question, they are absent, no matter how desirable the result to be attained may be. . . . The facts of the case at bar may impress upon some future legislature the necessity of an amendment of our law of descent. From that source alone can such an amendment come."

The cases of Riggs v. Palmer, of Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, of Owens v. Owens, and of Deem v. Milliken are all carefully analyzed and reviewed by the Nebraska court, and the conclusion is expressed in these words: "The well-considered cases warrant the pertinent conclusion that when the legislature, not transcending the limits of its power, speaks in clear language upon a question of policy, it becomes the judicial tribunals to remain silent. . . . The decision in Riggs v. Palmer is the manifest assertion of a wisdom believed to be superior to that of the legislature upon a question of policy."

The case of Carpenter's Estate. 170 Pa. 206, 29 L. R. A. 145, 50 Am. St. Rep. 765, 32 Atl. 637, is also directly in point. In that case it was sought to deny a son any share in his father's estate because he had murdered him in order to secure such estate. The court held that it could not be done, and the crime committed could not attain the blood or change the law of distribution. The court said, in substance: We are 64 L. R. A.

unwilling to exclude the son, because we have no power to do so. From what source is it possible to derive such a power? The law casts the estate on certain persons, and this is absolute and peremptory, and the estate cannot be diverted from these persons, and given to others, without violating the law. "It is the act of the law which casts the descent of estates, and that is not regulated or controlled by the acts, the follies, the frauds, or the crimes of any individual persons."

The authorities are all reviewed. Owens v. Owens, Deem v. Milliken, and Shellenberger v. Ransom are approved, while Riggs v. Palmer is repudiated, and Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong is shown to be not in point.

I can add nothing to the reasoning and sound law of these cases, and I have no power to disregard these principles and rules of law.

If Mrs. Justice died the beneficiary in this policy, and her husband was entitled to its proceeds jure mariti, and the fund is in the court, in the hands of the husband's administrator, to be paid to the party entitled, it cannot be withheld from the husband's next of kin or creditors unless the law is ignored, and the rules which govern the devolution of property are disregarded; and this upon the theory that this court can in this way punish the husband for his crime.

I most respectfully dissent from such conclusion.

But, if this could be done, it still does not reach the merits of this case.

The husband is not a party to this suit. His next of kin and creditors are the persons who are interested. Upon what principle can they be punished for the crime of Mr. Justice?

The law cast the title to the property upon him, whether by statute or common law. It vested in him, and can only be divested out of him by declaring it forfeited in the hands of his innocent representatives.

v.

MAXWELL HOUSE COMPANY.

(.....Tenn.....)

A watch is within the operation of a statute providing that, if the guest at a hotel neglects to deposit jewels in the safe or other place provided by the hotel keeper for their custody, they shall be at his own risk.

(January 23, 1904.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson Coun-

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that jewelry worn by a woman need not be dety in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of a watch and fob lost by plaintiff while a guest at defendant's hotel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. Ryan for appellant.

Mr. Charles C. Trabue, for appellee:

A gold watch is jewelry, and the term "jewelry" in the statute was intended to include a gold watch.

Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 258; Rosenplanter v. Roessle, 54 N. Y. 285; Stewart v. Parsons, 24 Wis. 242; Murchison v. Sergeant, 69 Ga. 206, 47 Am. Rep. 756; Meacham v. Galloway, 102 Tenn. 419, 46 L. R. A. 859, 73 Am. St. Rep. 886, 52 S. W. 859.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was commenced before a justice of the peace. It was tried before the circuit judge on appeal, on an agreed statement of facts, without the intervention of a jury.

The agreement is in the following words: "In this cause it is agreed and stipulated by and between counsel representing plaintiff and defendant that the following facts are true, and that the same are all the material facts involved in the litigation, and that the same may be treated in all respects on the trial of this case as competent and uncontradicted testimony.

"On July 13, 1902, A. B. Rains, the plaintiff in this case, accompanied by his wife and daughter, a young lady, left their home at Columbia, Tennessee, and stopped at Nashville, on their way to Bon Aqua Springs for a vacation. The party arrived at Nashville on July 13th, in the evening, and registered as guests at the Maxwell House. The Maxwell House Company, the defendant in this case, is a corporation, chartered under the laws of Tennessee, engaged in a general hotel business.

"The train for Bon Aqua Springs left Nashville at 7 o'clock in the morning, and the party left a call at the office of the defendant company for 5:30 A. M. the next morning.

"Mr. and Mrs. Rains occupied one room, and their daughter, Miss Rains, an adjoining room.

"On retiring, Mr. Rains placed his watch under his pillow, and, awakening at 4:30 o'clock on Monday morning, looked at it to ascertain the time. The bell boy in the employ of defendant company called Mr. Rains at 5:30 A. M., according to instructions. Whereupon Mr. Rains arose and dressed, and went down to the office and settled his bill.

"Before leaving his room he told his wife that he would have a boy sent up for the hand baggage, and that he would go to the dining room and order breakfast for three, which he did, and his wife and daughter shortly thereafter joined him at the table.

"After the party had been at the table not exceeding fifteen minutes, Mr. Rains discovered that he had left his watch in his room. He went to the rotunda railing and called to the office to send the porter up for the watch. Mr. Rains then went back to the dining room, waited a few minutes, looked at the clock, and saw that it was within a few minutes of the time for the departure of his train. He hurriedly returned to his room, and found the porter in the act of looking for his watch. The watch was not found, and has not since been recovered by him. He then went hurriedly down and joined his wife and daughter, and caught a car for the depot. The bell boy who gave Mr. Rains his grips, and who heard the porter talking about it, said: 'I could not have gotten the watch, as your wife was in the room when I got the grips.' This conversation occurred when they were getting on the car. Mrs. Rains and Miss Rains both state that they were not in the room at the time the boy got the grips, but were outside in the hotel passage. The room was unlocked when the porter reached it. Mrs. Rains and Miss Rains had kept the door locked while they were in the room, as all of their valuable jewelry was in their grips. The watch was never returned or found.

"It was a watch without jewels.

"The Maxwell House Company had posted within the room occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Rains, and also in the room occupied by Miss Rains, a conspicuous notice that it had provided a safe and vault, etc., in accordance with the act of 1879, p. 185, chap. 145, being § 3593 of Shannon's Compilation of the Laws of Tennessee, which statute is as follows:

" 'Whenever the proprietor of any hotel or inn shall provide a safe in the office in such hotel or inn, or other convenient place for the safe-keeping of any money, jewels, or ornaments, belonging to the guests of such hotel or inn, or for any samples of merchandise of any kind carried by drummers or commercial travelers, and shall notify the posited with the innkeeper in order to make him liable for its loss, see Fay v. Pacific Improv. Co. 16 L. R. A. 188.

guests thereof by posting a notice (stating the fact that such safe or other convenient place in which money, jewels, ornaments, or "samples" may be deposited) in the room or rooms occupied by such guests, in a conspicuous manner,—if such guests shall neglect to deposit such money, jewels, ornaments, or samples of merchandise in such safe or other convenient place, the proprietor shall not be liable for any loss of such money, jewels, ornaments, or samples of merchandise sustained by such guests by theft or otherwise.'

"It is further stipulated and agreed that the value of the watch lost or stolen from Mr. Rains was $100, which was its reasonable market value, and that the fob attached to said watch was reasonably worth $10, its market value, making a total of $110, for which he sues.

"It is agreed that all of the hotel officials and employees testified that they did not take the watch or fob in controversy, and knew nothing about it."

This is all the evidence in the case.

The common law, as well understood, is that an innkeeper is an absolute insurer of the property of his transient guests, and under that rule the hotel company would be liable in this case.

The sole question, therefore, is a proper construction of the act of 1879, p. 185, chap. 145, which, under the conditions named in the act, exempts the hotel keeper from liability for any money, jewels, ornaments, or samples of any kind carried by drummers or commercial travelers.

We think it very clear that none of the terms used in the statute embrace a watch, unless it be the term "jewels."

The statute, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed, but, at the same time, with reference to the evident object and purpose, and only such articles as are named can be considered as coming within its provisions.

In the case of Ramaley v. Leland, 43 N. Y. 539, 3 Am. Rep. 728, it is said: A watch and chain are not jewels within a statute relieving hotels from liability for loss of money, jewels, or ornaments of guests when they have provided a safe for the deposit of such.

The same was held in the case of Bernstein v. Sweeney, 1 Jones & S. 276, which quotes with approval Webster's definition of a jewel, as "an ornament of dress in which the precious stones form a principal part."

In the case of Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. 77, the court held: "The watch and pen and pencil case are certainly valuables, and perhaps might be called jewels; but I think should be considered a part of the traveler's personal clothing or apparel. The legislature certainly did not expect the traveler, after retiring, to send down his ordinary clothing or apparel to be deposited in the safe."

It was also held that a reasonable amount of money for traveling expenses and articles for personal use and convenience, though within the terms of the statute, are not within its spirit, and that a guest, by retaining such articles in his own possession, instead of depositing them with the innkeeper, does not absolve the innkeeper from his common-law liability. See also 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 543.

In the case of Maltby v. Chapman, 25 Md. 310, it was held that a guest was not bound to deposit with the innkeeper, for safe-keeping, a watch or a sum of money amounting to $80.

Under a Georgia statute which specifies "valuable articles," it was held that a guest cannot be required to deposit a watch of reasonable value worn by him, and a reasonable sum of money had by him for the purpose of paying his traveling expenses. Murchison v. Sergeant, 69 Ga. 207, 47 Am. Rep. 754. And the court in that case said: "Even if notice had been published to him, according to law, to deposit valuables in another place, it would not apply to traveling money and a watch of reasonable amount and value."

In the case of Ramaley v. Leland, 43 N. Y. 539, 3 Am. Rep. 728, the court, construing the words of the statute, which are the same as the words of our statute, said: "The words of the statute must be taken in their ordinary sense, in the absence of any indication that they were used either in a technical sense or a sense other than that in which they are properly used. A watch is neither a jewel nor ornament, as these words are used and understood either in common parlance or by lexicographers. It is not used or carried as a jewel or ornament, but as a timepiece or chronometer,—an article of ordinary wear by most travelers of every class, and of daily and hourly use by all. It is as useful and necessary to the guest in his room as out of it, in the night as the day time. It is carried for use and convenience, and not for ornament. But it is enough that it is neither a jewel nor ornament in any sense in which these words have ever been used."

In the case of Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. 77, the facts were that the plaintiff's watch, pencil, pencil case, and $25 in money were stolen. The court said, in construing the first section of the act: "We must look at the whole of it. Doing so, I think it plain that the exemption was intended to apply only to such amount of money and to such jewels, ornaments, or valuables as the landlord or hotel keeper himself, if a prudent person, and traveling, would put in a safe, if convenient, when retiring at night. Can anyone suppose that it was the intention of the act to exempt the hotel proprietor from his common-law liability unless the traveler emptied his pockets of every cent of money and deposited it, with his watch and pencil case, in the safe, both of which last-mentioned articles he might have occasion to use after retiring to his room? This would be not only exempting hotel keepers from their common-law extraordinary liability, but requiring extraordinary prudence of their guests. . . . In my opinion, at this day, the traveler putting up at a respectable hotel, who, on retiring at night, should think of taking from his pockets and depositing in a safe such a sum as $25 only, or his watch and gold pen and pencil case, would be considered not only extraordinarily, but ridiculously, prudent."

In the case of Maltby v. Chapman, 25 Md. 310, the plaintiff's watch, watch guard, pocketbook, and $90 in money were stolen during the night. The Maryland statute then in force provided that guests should deposit money, plate, and jewelry for safe-keeping. The plaintiff recovered judgment for all of the property. The court said: "The evidence here shows that the articles stolen from the room of the appellee, while a guest of the appellant, were a watch, watch guard, pocketbook, and $90 in money; and, looking to the purpose and terms of these provisions of the Code, it is manifest that a compliance with them could not relieve the appellant from liability for the loss thus shown. All of these articles, with the exception of the money, were of a class not within the statutory provisions referred to, and the appellant could not, even by complying with their requirements, exempt himself from liability for their loss."

These cases, by their reasoning, indicate that the innkeeper, even under the provisions of a statute such as our own, would still be held liable for the loss of a watch, although it was kept by the guest in his room and about his person. But the authority of these cases is very much shaken, if not entirely overthrown, by subsequent cases from the New York courts.

In the case of Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 258, there was a suit to recover certain money, two gold studs, and two gold pens. The lower court instructed the jury that, notwithstanding the statute, the guest would be entitled to retain such articles as were of ordinary use and convenience, and it was left to the jury to apply this rule. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff for $190. The loss occurred in New Jersey, the law of which state was identical with that of

New York, and covered "money, jewels, and ornaments." The appellate court reversed the case, and in its opinion said: "If the legislature of New Jersey intended to relieve innkeepers from responsibility for the loss of any money, or jewels, or ornaments, in what words was it possible more clearly to express that intention? . . .

It would have been mere tautology [to have added the words]—'for any money, without any exception.' . . . The presumption [that some money was to be exempt] is derived solely from the alleged inconvenience of requiring the guest to conform to the requirement. . . . And when it is asked, Could the legislature have intended that, on entering a hotel, the guest should strip himself of all money, jewels, and ornaments, or be without protection? it may be answered: The guest walks the streets, he visits places of public resort or amusement, or the places to which his business calls him, and he enters his own abode, and he takes with him to each, without any special guaranty of safety, so much money, and so many jewels and ornaments, as he sees fit, and the hardship is not great if his entrance or his stay at a hotel places him in no worse condition. . . . No rule of public policy, no necessity, no violation of right, no evidence of intent derivable from the terms of the statute or from its design, permits in this case a restriction of its plain and explicit language."

In the case of Rosenplanter v. Roessle, 54 N. Y. 265, the court, commenting upon the cases of Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. 77, and Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 258, said: "The law is thus settled in this state that if a guest, on retiring to bed at night, removes a watch or jewelry from his person, or leaves money in his pocket, and neglects to deposit the same in the safe provided for that purpose, he cannot hold the landlord liable for the loss of the same, provided the notice required by the statute has been posted in his room. However inconvenient or troublesome it may be to make the deposit, it must be made, or else the landlord has the protection of the statute. . . . The true rule undoubtedly is as above stated: That it is the duty of the guest to make the deposit whenever he has time and opportunity to do so. This rule may be inconvenient to guests; but the statute was not intended for their benefit. It was manifestly enacted for the protection of the hotel-keepers."

In Stewart v. Parsons, 24 Wis. 242, a gold watch and chain had been lost. The lower court followed the early New York cases, and held the innkeeper liable; but the supreme court reversed the lower court, saying: "The court below doubtless thought that the law was not intended to apply to and include a watch and chain worn by a guest upon his person. It seems to us, however, that there is no satisfactory reason for saying that the property lost does not come fully within the language and intent of this enactment. The statute provides, in substance, that 'no innkeeper in this state who shall constantly have in his inn an iron safe in good order, and suitable for the safe custody of money, jewelry, and articles of gold and silver manufacture and of the like, . . . shall be liable. . . . The object of this law is very manifest. It is intended to limit and restrict the liability of an innkeeper at common law or by custom for the loss of the goods of his guests, committed to his care.'

In this case the case of Gile v. Libby, 36 Barb. 77, is criticised, and the case of Hyatt v. Taylor, 42 N. Y. 258, is approved.

The case of Murchison v. Sergeant, 69 Ga. 207, 47 Am. Rep. 754, did not involve a construction of a statute at all, since it was expressly found that no notice had been given the guest as required by law. The court said, obiter: "Even if notice had been published to him, according to law, to deposit valuables in another place, it would not apply to traveling money and a watch of reasonable amount and value;" citing the Maryland and earlier New York cases, to which we have adverted.

In Meacham v. Galloway, 102 Tenn. 419, 46 L. R. A. 319, 73 Am. St. Rep. 886, 52 S. W. 859, this court said: "It was conceded on the trial that the watch and chain should have been deposited in the safe in compliance with notices to that effect posted in the room, and that no recovery could be had for the loss of the watch and chain."

The question at issue in this case, however, was not adjudged in that.

We think that the watch and fob must be considered as embraced in the terms "jewels and ornaments."

Mr. Webster defines the word "jewel" as an ornament of dress, usually made of a precious metal, having enamel or precious stones as a part of its design; but we are of the opinion that the sense in which it was used by the legislature is the common meaning attributed to it as an ornament, or useful article of value, and embraces a watch used for a timekeeper or chronometer, and in which precious stones may or may not form a part. The fob is evidently an article kept and worn both for use and ornament.

If a guest sees proper to keep his watch and his fob and money upon his person or in his room, he does so at his own risk, just as he keeps it about his own person and in his possession when not in the hotel or inn. If he desires, for his own safety or convenience, to place the responsibility for its safekeeping upon the hotel company during his stay in the hotel as a guest, then he must place it in the safe which the statute requires to be provided by the innkeeper for that purpose. We can put no other construction upon the statute without nullifying wholly, or to some extent, its provisions.

It may be inconvenient to deposit small sums of money and pieces of jewelry of little value in the safe of a hotel, and it may be inconvenient to do without their use in the room during the stay of the guest; but this is a condition, under the statute, upon which the hotel keeper can alone be made liable for their safety as an insurer.

If the guest desires to avoid these inconveniences, he may retain possession of his money and his jewelry, just as if he were not a guest of the hotel.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that there is no error in the judgment of the trial court, and it is affirmed, with costs.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District for the opinion of the Supreme Court of questions which arose upon appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Bosque County Court in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Answers returned favorable to appellant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Gillette, for appellant:

The making and filing in the county court of the complaint described in appellee's petition, he not having been arrested under a capias thereon, did not entitle him to a recovery against appellant in this cause.

Johnson v. King, 64 Tex. 226; Ward v. Sutor, 70 Tex. 343, 8 Am. St. Rep. 606, 8

S. W. 51; Cooper v. Armour, 8 L. R. A. 47, 42 Fed. 215.

The verdict of the jury, and the judgment of the court showing appellee's acquittal of the charge complained of, were not evidence against appellant of malice or want of probable cause, and should have been considered by the jury, but for one purpose, viz.: That said prosecution had terminated in appellee's favor.

Crim. Rep. 255, 42 S. W. 305; Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 603, 58 Am. Dec. 85; Heldt v. Webster, 60 Tex. 208. No brief was filed for appellee.

1. Acquittal and discharge.

a. Generally.

In actions for malicious prosecution the cases hold, with substantial unanimity, that an acquittal is not prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause. In some cases this was held on the ground that the presumption arising from the act of the magistrate in binding the accused over to appear at trial gave such a strong presumption of guilt, showing that the prosecutor had ample cause, that it could not be overcome by a verdict of acquittal.

In the following cases an acquittal on a trial of a criminal prosecution was held not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause for the prosecution. Adams v. Lisber, 3 Blackf. 445; Bitting v. Ten Eyck, 82 Ind. 421, 42 Am. Rep. 505; Scott v. Simpson, 1 Sandf. 601; McBean v. Ritchie, 18 Ill. 114.

And the acquittal of the defendant after a full investigation of the case, and an examination of all the testimony on both sides, was held not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause for the prosecution. Eastman v. Monastes, 32 Or. 291, 67 Am. St. Rep. 531, 51 Pac. 1095.

So, it was held that an acquittal by a jury on a trial of a prosecution by information, brought by the prosecuting attorney at defendant's instance, against the plaintiff, did not tend to establish want of probable cause in moving that prosecution. Boeger v. Langenberg, 97 Mo. 390, 10 Am. St. Rep. 322, 11 S. W. 223.

Referring to this case, the court, in Christian v. Hanna, 58 Mo. App. 37, says: "It is stated that an acquittal does not tend to establish want of probable cause. In support of this statement of the law, a reference is made to Williams v. Vanmeter, 8 Mo. 339, 41 Am. Dec. 644, but an examination of that case will show that the question there decided was whether the discharge of an examining magistrate was presumptive evidence of want of probable cause, and it was held that it was not such evidence. Judge Scott, who delivered the opinion, states the rule to be that 'an acquittal is evidence of want of probable cause to go to the jury, but, of itself, and unaccompanied with any circumstances, would not be sufficient. So in Townshend on Slander & Libel, § 426, referred to in Boeger v. Langenberg, 97 Mo. 397, 10 Am. St. Rep. 322, 11 S. W. 223, it is stated that an acquittal, alone, is not evidence of the want of probable cause. So that we must think that what was intended to be said in Boeger v. Langenberg was that an acquittal, without more, was insufficient to justify the inference of want of probable cause, or, in other words, that, while the production of the record of an acquittal is evidence of the want of probable cause, standing alone and without other circumstances being shown, it is not sufficient to authorize the inference of want of probable cause." The court concludes: The production, therefore, of a verdict of acquittal is not, per se, sufficient to originate the inference of want of probable cause. The conclusion of the criticizing opinion does not seem to differ from the expression criticized.

Williams v. Vanmeter, 8 Mo. 339, 41 Am. Dec. 644, supra, evidently was a case of an acquittal on the merits, rather than a discharge by an examining magistrate. This case was reported in 1844, and arose from a prosecution under the vagrant act, which was probably the same as Mo. R. C. 1845, p. 1070 (see White v. Walker, 22 Mo. 435), and Mo. Rev. Stat. 1870, p. 1355, authorizing an investigation before a justice of the peace and a trial before him by a jury, and a sale, under his warrant, of the vagrant for the term of six months. In this case an instruction was given for the plaintiff, "that the discharge of the plaintiff by the examining magistrate was presumptive evidence of want of probable cause," and for the defendant, "that the acquittal of the plaintiff by the justice of the peace is not sufficient in itself to show a want of probable cause." It was held that the instructions, taken as a whole, contained a correct exposition of the law, and were not contradictory. The court said: "It was contended by the defendant that the second instruction, given at the instance of the plaintiff, was erroneous, inasmuch as it conveyed the idea that the bare acquittal of the plaintiff by the justice was evidence from which the jury might infer a want of probable cause. It cannot be maintained that, in an action for a malicious prosecution, proof that the defendant instigated it, and a production of the record of acquittal, will entitle the plaintiff to a verdict. However, but a slight evidence of the want of probable cause is exacted of the plaintiff, as it involves a negative; but we are not aware that the bare production of the judgment of acquittal has ever been held sufficient for Gaines, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to us upon the following certificate:

"The above styled and numbered cause is now duly pending before us on appeal from the county court of Bosque county, upon facts and pleadings as hereinafter substantially stated; to wit: The action is for damages for an alleged malicious prosecution. Appellee, who was the plaintiff below, pleaded that appellant voluntarily appeared before a justice of the peace and instituted a criminal prosecution against him by falsely and maliciously charging him with theft, and with cutting and hauling timber from the land of another, etc. That a capias was duly issued by the said magistrate upon said charge, and the appellee arrested and placed in the county jail of Bosque county; that he had violated no law of Texas, as appellant well knew, and that appellant prosecuted him wilfully, maliciously, and without probable cause; that appellee was duly tried in the county court of Bosque county upon said charge and acquitted, and he prayed judgment against appellant for his damages. Appellant in defense pleaded the general denial. Judgment for appellee. The evidence establishes the institution and result of the criminal prosecution as alleged, and there was also evidence tending to prove that appellant acted maliciously and without probable cause. The preponderance of the evidence, however, tends to show that such prosecution was neither malicious nor that purpose. The acquittal, together with the circumstances under which it was effected, may be sufficient, as in the case put, where, upon the calling of the cause, the prosecutor, who was in court, absented himself. It was left to the jury to infer the motives of his withdrawal, and they were charged that they might infer the want of probable cause for such conduct. An acquittal is evidence of the want of probable cause to go to the jury, but of itself, and unaccompanied with any circumstances, would not be sufficient."

In Inclendon v. Berry, 1 Campb. 203, note, which was an action for malicious prosecution in indicting the plaintiff for perjury, the plaintiff produced the record of acquittal, and proved that the defendant had abandoned the prosecution, and also gave in evidence some expressions of the defendant indicative of malice, and there closed his case. Le Blanc, J., required him to go farther, and negative the existence of probable cause.

And the defendant's acquittal by the verdict of a jury was held not to raise the presumption of want of probable cause. Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 603, 58 Am. Dec. 85. In this case Wheeler, J., quoting from Greenleaf, Starkie, and Phillips on Evidence, said: "The discharge of the plaintiff by the examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, sufficient to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving the contrary. But in ordinary cases it will not be sufficient to show that the plaintiff was acquitted of an indictment by reason of the nonappearance of the defendant, who was the prosecutor; nor that the defendant, after instituting a prosecution, did not proceed with it; nor that the grand jury returned the bill 'not found.'" In this case the man had been arrested and brought before a justice on the charge of stealing a negro, and of having been an accessory to the stealing of a horse. Afterwards the defendant abandoned the charge of horse stealing, and caused the plaintiff to be indicted and prosecuted on the charge of stealing a negro, and by the verdict of the jury the plaintiff was acquitted. In this case the trial court instructed that "a verdict of not guilty and a discharge of the defendant from the prosecution raise the presumption that there was no probable cause." This was held to be erroneous.

In Chubb v. Griffin, 13 Tex. 392, where evidence of acquittal (offered to prove that the prosecution was at an end) had been excluded on a trial of malicious prosecution, Wheeler, J., said: "All this, with other evidence, proposed by the plaintiff for the purpose of proving the groundlessness of the prosecution, and the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in conducting his defense therein, being objected to by the defendant, was excluded by the court." It was held that the rejection of this evidence was error.

This was a different case from Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 603, 58 Am. Dec. 85, supra, which was not referred to in the opinion. The exclusion of the judgment of acquittal may have been held erroneous on the sole ground that it was offered to prove that the prosecution was ended,—otherwise the cases would conflict.

In Sutor v. Wood, 76 Tex. 403, 13 S. W. 321, an action for malicious prosecution, an instruction that the verdict of acquittal was no evidence to be considered in this case was held to have been properly refused on the ground that the plaintiff was bound to prove that the prosecution was at an end. The court said that in the case of Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 603, 58 Am. Dec. 85, "it was held that a verdict of not guilty did not raise a conclusive presumption that there was no probable cause for the prosecution; and the rule was followed in the subsequent case of Heldt v. Webster, 60 Tex. 207. But in the latter case the court says: 'Whether there was a want of probable cause for the jury to determine under the facts in evidence, and they might consider, in making up their verdict, the fact that the appellee had been discharged by the examining court.' So, also, a verdict of not guilty is to be considered under the same circumstances."

In some cases the rule is stated in a general way, in effect, that, in an action for malicious prosecution, the record of acquittal is no evidence of the want of probable cause. This was held in BEKKELAND v. LYONS. Such a rule would exclude consideration of the acquittal as prima facie evidence.

In the following cases it was held that an acquittal is not evidence of the want of probable cause:

A discharge of the defendant in a criminal prosecution for embezzlement was held not to be evidence of the want of probable cause. Thompson v. Beacon Valley Rubber Co. 56 Conn. 493, 16 Atl. 554. The court said: "Three things are essential to the maintenance of actions of this character: (1) The discharge of without probable cause. The appellant upon the trial prepared and requested the court to submit to the jury the following special charge, which the court refused, and to which ruling he has assigned as error: 'You are instructed by the court, at the request of defendant, that the fact of plaintiff's acquittal upon the charge complained of cannot be considered by you for the purpose of showing malice or want of probable cause, but you can consider said fact for the purpose of showing that the prosecution in said cause had ended in plaintiff's favor.' In view of the apparent conflict among the decisions and text writers, and of the fact that the members of this court are not wholly agreed upon the subject, we deem it advisable to certify to your honors for answer the following question, viz.: Upon the facts above stated, was the action of the court in refusing the requested instruction of appellant erroneous? Among the authorities apparently bearing upon the question we cite: Cook v. Carroll Land & Cattle Co. 6 Tex. Civ. App. 326, 25 S. W. 1034; Jackson v. Mumford, 74 Tex. 104, 11 S. W. 1061; Kitchen v. State, 26 Tex. App. 165, 9 S. W. 461; Estill v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 255, 42 S. W. 305; Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 603, 58 Am. Dec. 85; Thompson v. Beacon Valley Rubber Co. 56 Conn. 493, 16 Atl. 557; Bell v. Percy, 33 N. C. (11 Ired. L.) 233; Bigelow, Torts, ed. 1891, 63; Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116; Sutor v. Wood, 76 Tex. 407, 13 S. W. 321; Heldt v. Webster, 60 Tex. 207; Raleigh v.

the plaintiff; (2) that the prosecution was without probable cause; (3) that it was malicious. The acquittal of the plaintiff proves the first, but it has no tendency to prove the second or third. The want of probable cause must be shown by facts and circumstances existing, and information which came to the defendant, at the time the prosecution was instituted. Facts subsequently transpiring, and information subsequently received, could not, from the nature of the case, influence his action at that time."

In Skidmore v. Bricker, 77 Ill. 164, where it was held that the trial court erred in permitting the record of acquittal in the county court on a charge of riot to be read in evidence by the plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, it was said: "The question in this case is not whether the accused was guilty or innocent, but whether the prosecuting witness had probable ground for believing the accused guilty. If the record of acquittal was permitted to be read in evidence on the trial of this class of cases, a recovery could be had in almost every case of acquittal."

In Winn v. Peckham, 42 Wis. 493, the court said: "The cases cited by the learned counsel for the defendant against the admissibility in evidence of the judgment of acquittal, with a single exception, fail to sustain his position. The exceptional case is that of Skidmore v. Bricker, 77 Ill. 164, in which such testimony was held inadmissible. The decision in that case is based upon the decision of the same court in Corbley v. Wilson, 71 Ill. 209, 22 Am. Rep. 98. The latter case was an action for slander. The alleged slander consisted in charging that the plaintiff had committed a certain crime. The defendant pleaded the truth of the words spoken. It was held that the record of the trial and acquittal of the plaintiff for the alleged crime was not competent evidence. Undoubtedly Corbley v. Wilson was correctly decided; but what the doctrine of that case has to do with an action for malicious prosecution, to maintain which the facts of a prosecution and its termination must be proved, is beyond our comprehension. As at present advised, we cannot concur in the doctrine of Skidmore v. Bricker."

In Comisky v. Breen, 7 Ill. App. 369, where an attempt was made to explain the Skidmore case, the court said: "Considering the opinion in Skidmore v. Bricker, under the light of all the authorities and the uniform practice heretofore existing in this state, of counsel offering, and the court admitting, in evidence the record of the prosecution and acquittal of the plaintiff for the purpose, only, of showing a legal termination of the prosecution, we are all of the opinion that the case then before the court was one where the record was allowed to go to the jury as evidence of the innocence of the plaintiff and proof of the want of probable cause." It was further said: That "an acquittal or discharge of the plaintiff is no proof of the want of probable cause is fully sustained by the former decisions of the same court."

In Winn v. Peckham, 42 Wis. 493, the court said: "Whether a judgment of acquittal is any evidence of want of probable cause for the prosecution is a question we are not required to determine on this appeal. If it is not, and the defendant feared that the jury might give it that effect, he should have prayed a proper instruction in that behalf. No such instruction was asked. However, the learned circuit judge instructed the jury that want of probable cause for the prosecution 'cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the plaintiff was acquitted in the perjury case.'"

In some cases the expressions are used that an acquittal does not "show," or does not "prove," and is not "evidence" of, want of probable cause. These expressions are often used in a general way, without much regard to clearly defined distinctions. Probably the court intended in all of the cases simply to assert that the plaintiff in the malicious prosecution case could not offer the record of acquittal and rest there, on the ground that the record of acquittal was not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, and that such evidence, without other proof, would not shift the burden on the defendant.

In Britton v. Granger, 13 Ohio C. C. 281, which was an action for malicious prosecution in causing an arrest for disorderly conduct, of which offense the defendant had been acquitted, it was held that evidence was improperly excluded. In discussing the necessity of proving the negative, the court said: "The acquittal is not sufficient to show want of probable cause, because the guilt or innocence of the accused is not equivalent of the want of probable cause."

And in Godfrey v. Soniat, 33 La. Ann. 915, it was held that the acquittal of the accused, whose conviction must rest upon evidence proving his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, did Cook, 60 Tex. 438; Jones v. Finch, 84 Va. 204, 4 S. E. 342; Womack v. Circle, 32 Gratt. 347; Whitfield v. Westbrook, 40 Miss. 317; Wright v. Fansler, 90 Ind. 494; Williams v. Norwood, 2 Yerg. 336; Smith v. Ege, 52 Pa. 421, 2 Greenl. Ev. 455."

In Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 603, 58 Am. Dec. 85, the trial court instructed the jury that "a verdict of not guilty and discharge of the defendant from prosecution raises the presumption that there was no probable cause." This court held that the charge was erroneous, and in deciding the question the court says: "The defendant's acquittal did not raise the presumption of the want of probable cause." In Heldt v. Webster, 60 Tex. 207, a similar charge was held erroneous, and in course of the argument the court says: "Whether there was want of probable cause was for the jury to determine under the facts in evidence, and they might consider, in making up their verdict, the fact that the appellee had been discharged by the examining court; but the charge of the court was incorrect as matter of law, and gave to that fact a prominence to which it was not entitled." It seems to us, however, that the question whether, save for the purpose of showing that the prosecution had ended, the fact of acquittal or discharge has any probative force whatever, was not involved in that case. The same may be said as to the remarks in the course of the opinions in subsequent cases. Raleigh v. Cook, 60 Tex. 438; Sutor v. Wood, 76 Tex. 403, 13 S. W. 321. In each of the cases re-not prove malice or want of probable cause in the prosecutor. The court said: "If the acquittal of all persons accused of crimes or misdemeanors should subject the complainants to actions in damages for malicious prosecution, it is easy to perceive that litigation of that character would absorb and monopolize the attention of courts of justice to the exclusion of all other business." In this case the accused had been tried on a charge of trespass in cutting down timber, and had been acquitted. It was held that there was ample probable cause for the prosecution.

Following this case, it was held, in Staub v. Van Benthuyssen, 36 La. Ann. 467, that a discharge of the defendant by a city recorder in a criminal prosecution for libel, on the ground that the publication was not malicious, was no proof of want of probable cause. In this case the defendant established a counterclaim for damages arising out of the libel for which the criminal prosecution had failed, and a judgment was granted in the action for malicious prosecution in favor of defendant against plaintiff. This discharge must have been an acquittal on the trial, the jurisdiction of the recorder not being stated. This view is supported by the fact that the case followed and cited was based on an "acquittal," and by the further fact that in Bornholdt v. Soullard, 36 La. Ann. 103 (infra, II.), the "discharge" by an examining magistrate was held prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause.

A charge that the bare fact that the plaintiff was arrested and liberated in the police court gave her a cause of action was held to be erroneous, on the ground that the court determined that the fact mentioned established conclusively the want of probable cause. Rogers v. Mahoney, 62 Cal. 611. The case does not disclose whether there was a trial on the merits, or on a hearing; but it simply states that she was "arrested and liberated" in the police court. The court said: "The rule as laid down by the court would certainly simplify the trial of this class of actions. If correct, the law might be thus formulated: First, where the plaintiff has been arrested, charged with an offense, and convicted, his action for malicious prosecution will not lie; second, where he has been arrested, charged, and discharged, and these facts are proved to the satisfaction of the court, the case of plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution is made out, because malice may be inferred 64 L. R. A.

from want of probable cause. It needs but to state the second position to show that it cannot be successfully maintained."

And, a judgment of nonsuit for violating a city ordinance was held not to conclude the defendants, or to prove that, in so far as it related to one of the defendants (Prados), he acted without probable cause. Gerber v. Vlosca, 8 Rob. (La.) 150. In this case Prados was the market policeman, who, at the instance of the agent of the farmer of the butchers' market, arrested an occupant of a stall for committing a disturbance. The principal and the policeman were sued in the action for malicious prosecution. The court said: "The ordinance of the 20th of July, 1840, provides, that, if any person shall, in the daytime, commit any noise or disturbance at any public place, he shall be fined not more than $20, nor less than $3 for each offense. The plaintiff, it appears, was prosecuted before one of the city judges under the ordinance, in the name of the municipality, and judgment of nonsuit entered, and a record of the proceedings was read in evidence. That judgment clearly does not conclude the defendants, much less does it prove that, as it relates to Prados, he acted without probable cause."

And in Hurd v. Shaw, 20 Ill. 354, it was said: "But even if a verdict of acquittal on the merits be pronounced, it is not sufficient evidence of a want of probable cause, which is defined to be a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense with which he is charged."

The production in evidence of a verdict of acquittal was held not to establish the plaintiff's prima facie case in an action for malicious prosecution. Christian v. Hanna, 58 Mo. App. 37. The court said: "Nor was this supplemented by such facts and circumstances as showed the prosecution was commenced and carried on without probable cause. If the evidence failed affirmatively to show, as we think was the case, want of probable cause, the plaintiff's action must fail, no difference what the motive prompting the prosecution was."

In Cooper v. Utterbach, 37 Md. 282, which was an action for malicious prosecution, the court, in reviewing and sustaining the instructions given in the trial court, said: "These imposed upon the appellee the burden of proving that the prosecution (the ground of the presferred to, the question was as to the propriety of a charge which made either the discharge by a magistrate, or the acquittal by a jury of the party charged, presumptive evidence of the want of probable cause. It seems to us, therefore, that neither of these cases can be considered as having decided the question. We think, however, that the principle which should govern its decision was involved in the case of March v. Walker, 48 Tex. 372. That was a suit by the children of a deceased person to recover damages against the slayers of their father. During the course of the trial the defendants offered evidence to show that the defendants had been acquitted upon a trial for murder growing out of the same homicide. For the reason, evidently, that the evidence was without probative force, it was held that it was properly excluded. In case of a suit for malicious prosecution, it is proper to introduce in evidence the fact of the acquittal in order to show that the prosecution is at an end. But if the fact of acquittal was without probative force in the case last cited, for a stronger reason it would have no tendency to prove anything in a case like the present, except that the prosecution was at an end. In the criminal case against March, and in the civil suit, one issue was the same (that is to say, Was the homicide justifiable?), it being necessary in the former for the state to prove the negative beyond a reasonable doubt, whereas in the latter it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show justification ent action) was instituted or prosecuted without probable cause and with malice, by the appellant, before he could claim a verdict. They declared that the acquittal of the appellee by the criminal court of Baltimore was only 'prima facie' evidence of his innocence of the charge, notwithstanding which he might be found guilty of the offense charged in this case, and submitted to the jury the inquiry, whether the appellee had obtained of the appellant money or stock by false pretenses. The whole ground in controversy was covered by these instructions."

This conclusion of the court as to the "prima facie" effect of an acquittal is not sustained by the instructions set out in the report of the case. An instruction to this effect may have been given, but, if so, it was not discussed by either party on appeal, and no question seems to have been made in regard to the same.

In Sherwood v. Reed, 35 Conn. 450, 95 Am. Dec. 284, the plaintiff was acquitted before a justice, and then brought suit for malicious prosecution, and requested a charge to the jury "that the trial and acquittal of the plaintiff before the justice was prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause." The court charged that, "in determining whether the defendant had acted without probable cause, they should take into consideration the facts of the trial and acquittal of the plaintiff before the justice, in connection with the other testimony offered upon that point." This was approved, as it appeared that the defendant offered evidence to prove that the acquittal was owing to the rejection of legal evidence. The court said: "If this was true, we think the fact of acquittal by the justice was not entitled to that consideration upon the question of a want of probable cause that it otherwise should have had, for the judgment of the court acquitting the accused was final."

In some few cases set out below, where the court held, as in the preceding cases, that an acquittal was not evidence of the want of probable cause, the rule was confirmed by the fact that the accused had been bound to appear, by an examining magistrate, or had been indicted, or that the petit jury had hesitated. These reasons are not deemed necessary, according to the rule established by the preceding cases, where no attention was paid to these matters.

So, an acquittal by the venue was held not evidence of malice in the prosecutor, or of the want of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution. Garrard v. Willet, 4 J. J. 64 L. R. A.

Marsh, 628. This was on the ground that, an indictment having been found, the presumption was prima facie that the prosecutor had reasonable ground for the prosecution; and therefore the final acquittal did not, per se, prove a want of probable cause.

And a verdict of not guilty was held not to show a want of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution. Grant v. Deuel, 3 Rob. (La.) 17, 38 Am. Dec. 228. In this case the court said: "It appears, the grand jury not only found a true bill, but that the petit jury deliberated for ten or fifteen minutes as to their verdict. These are strong circumstances of probable cause for the prosecution, in the absence of any proof of fraud or perjury to produce such results."

In Hale v. Boylen, 22 W. Va. 234, where the plaintiff had been discharged by habeas corpus after having been committed by an examining magistrate, and the discharge was treated as an acquittal, and it was held that the action of the justice gave a weak presumption of probable cause, the court said: "But, slight as the evidence is, that is necessary to prove, in the first place, a want of probable cause; yet there are many cases which hold that the acquittal of the plaintiff by a jury will not even amount to prima facie evidence of such want of probable cause, though some have said such acquittal would amount to prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause, and thus throw the burden of showing that there was probable cause on the defendant. It is obvious, therefore, from the decisions, that, if the acquittal of the plaintiff is any evidence at all on the question of whether there was or was not probable cause, it is entitled to very little weight. See Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 42. The final conviction of the plaintiff is, however, obviously conclusive of probable cause, and therefore precludes, necessarily, an action for malicious prosecution."

And, where the accused was recognized by the magistrate to answer to the charge of hog stealing, and on the trial was acquitted by the county court, the jury were instructed, in the malicious prosecution case, that the warrant and recognizance furnished sufficient evidence of probable cause to induce the prosecution on which this action was founded. This was held to be proper, and that it did not exclude from the jury other evidence which might have been offered to disprove probable cause inferable from the proceedings before the magistrate. Maddox

by a preponderance of evidence. Upon a trial for a criminal offense the question is, Does the evidence show beyond a reasonable doubt that the offense has been committed? but upon the trial of a suit for malicious prosecution of such offense the issue is, Was there probable cause to believe that an offense had been committed? The fact that a verdict of not guilty is returned in the former case neither shows, nor does it reasonably tend to show, that there was no probable cause for the prosecution. Besides, we fail to see how, in a suit to recover damages for the malicious prosecution of a criminal charge, the verdict or judgment upon the trial of the charge should in any manner affect the prosecutor when he is not a party to the suit.

We recognize, as does the court of civil appeals, the conflict of authority upon the question, but we are of the opinion that the weight of authority and the better reason are in favor of the proposition that in such a case the acquittal of the plaintiff of the criminal charge is not evidence tending to show the want of probable cause. We cite some of the recent cases: Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116; Allen v. Codman, 139 Mass. 139, 29 N. E. 537; Willard v. Holmes, 142 N. Y. 492, 37 N. E. 480; Eastman v. Monastes, 32 Or. 291, 67 Am. St. Rep. 531, 51 Pac. 1095. See also note to Ross v. Hixon, 26 Am. St. Rep. 155.

We answer the question in the affirmative.

v. Jackson, 4 Munf. 462. In this case it was admitted on the trial of the malicious prosecution case that the accused had been acquitted. Neither court nor counsel discusses the effect of the acquittal on the evidence, but evidently assumes that such acquittal showed want of probable cause, and the discussion was only upon the effect of the preliminary proceeding which established a prima facie case of probable cause.

In Womack v. Circle, 32 Gratt. 352, in an exhaustive discussion of the Maddox Case, Staples, J., dissenting, says: "According to this decision the judgment of the judges was merely prima facie liable to be rebutted by other testimony."

In Hinson v. Powell, 109 N. C. 534, 14 S. E. 301, where there had been two prosecutions and acquittals in each case on a charge of disposing of mortgaged property, it was held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that, if the evidence in the second prosecution was the same as that produced in the first, it showed that there was a want of probable cause.

In Watts v. Clegg, 48 Ala. 561, it was held that the judgment of acquittal in a prosecution for perjury was competent evidence to establish the fact of the acquittal.

In Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116, which was an action for malicious prosecution for wrongfully instituting bankruptcy proceedings, the court said: "In every case of an action for malicious prosecution, or suit, it must be averred and proved that the proceeding instituted against the plaintiff has failed; but its failure has never been held to be evidence of either malice or want of probable cause for its institution; much less that it is conclusive of those things. Cloon v. Gerry, 13 Gray, 201." This expression in the Federal case has been construed in BEKKELAND v. LYONS, and in some text books, as holding that an acquittal of a "criminal charge is not evidence tending to show the want of probable cause." This proposition is correct; but the statement of the Federal court, that the failure of the proceeding "has never been held to be evidence of want of probable cause," should not be regarded as applicable to a discharge by an examining magistrate. The Cloon Case, 13 Gray, 201, held that a conviction by a magistrate having jurisdiction to try the case would entitle the defendant in an action for malicious prosecution to a nonsuit, although the accused was acquitted on appeal, and 64 L. R. A.

the express ruling was that the conviction was proof of probable cause.

b. On appeal.

In most of the cases of malicious prosecution where the acquittal was on appeal there is not much discussion about the effect of such acquittal in evidence. In some cases the prior conviction is regarded as so conclusive of probable cause as to overcome the effect of the acquittal. Cases which discuss only the conviction are authorities on the question of the effect of the conviction as evidence, rather than on the question of the effect of the acquittal.

An instruction "that the acquittal and discharge of the appellant was prima facie evidence that the prosecution was begun without probable cause" was held to have been properly refused where the accused had been convicted and sentenced to state's prison, although the conviction had been reversed and the defendant finally acquitted. Bitting v. Ten Eyck, 82 Ind. 421, 42 Am. Rep. 505. The court said: "It has been held sufficient evidence of probable cause to show that the plaintiff was convicted of the offense before a justice of the peace who had jurisdiction, although he was afterwards acquitted on an appeal."

In Womack v. Circle, 32 Gratt. 324, the accused had been bound over by a justice to keep the peace and on appeal was acquitted, and the recognizance quashed by reason of the prosecution being abandoned by the commonwealth's attorney, who afterwards acted as attorney for the plaintiff in the malicious-prosecution suit. It was held that the judgment in the criminal case, so abandoned, not upon evidence, but upon abandonment of the prosecution by the commonwealth's attorney, could not establish the innocence of the plaintiff in this suit, and lay the foundation for this action.

In Hale v. Boylen, 22 W. Va. 234, the court said: "I desire here to call attention to a misuse of language sometimes fallen into by judges. They sometimes speak of the judgment of the justice committing the accused for trial as prima facie evidence of probable cause, subject to be rebutted by other testimony. This, for instance, is the language used by Judge Staples in Womack v. Circle, 32 Gratt. 352. He should have said that such judgment of a justice was sufficient evidence of probable cause, and strengthened the weak presumption, which always exists in the absence of all evidence,—that every public prosecution is founded on probable cause (see Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 41); but that this prima facie presumption, strengthened as it is by such a judgment of a justice, can, nevertheless, be rebutted by other testimony." Staples, J., was a dissenting judge, and the language criticized was his view of Maddox v. Jackson, 4 Munf. 462, by which he was trying to demonstrate to his associates that, if a holding over by a magistrate was prima facie evidence of probable cause, although the opinion of the justice was unreversed, it ought not to be held conclusive evidence where the judgment of the justice was reversed.

In Griffis v. Sellars, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 497, 31 Am. Dec. 422, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 176, where the accused was convicted in the county court, and, upon appeal, had been acquitted in the superior court, and brought an action for malicious prosecution, it was held that probable cause was judicially established by the conviction, and that no evidence was competent to disprove it. In this case the plaintiff attempted to show that the conviction was obtained by false testimony, but to this the court replied that, if such evidence was admissible, the defendant could offset this by showing that the evidence offered by the plaintiff in the present case was false and perjured, and the result would be an interminable prosecution of the same litigation. In the former hearing the court said: "A verdict and judgment of acquittal certainly do not imply a want of probable cause; because such a verdict may be given, notwithstanding strong suspicion, because there is not full proof of guilt." The refusal in this case to allow the plaintiff to show that the conviction had been obtained by false testimony seems to be unsupported by other cases.

And where it was alleged that plaintiff was convicted of a criminal charge before the trial justice, but upon appeal to the superior court was there acquitted, it was held that this did not show want of probable cause, but, on the contrary, was conclusive evidence of probable cause, and would defeat the action. Dennehey v. Woodsam, 100 Mass. 195.

In Witham v. Gowen, 14 Me. 362, the plaintiff read in evidence a copy of a record showing a conviction of an offense before a justice of the peace, but that on appeal to the court of common pleas the accused was acquitted. To an offer of further evidence to support the action, it was ruled that the conviction was conclusive proof of probable cause, unless the plaintiff could prove that it was obtained exclusively, or mainly, by false testimony.

A conviction was had before a justice of the peace for illegally selling liquor. On appeal to the court of common pleas an acquittal was had. In an action for malicious prosecution it was held that such conviction constituted sufficient proof that the prosecution was with probable cause, and would defeat an action for malicious prosecution, although such judgment had been reversed on appeal. Cloon v. Gerry, 13 Gray, 201.

And where a party was convicted, but was acquitted upon appeal, and brought suit for malicious prosecution, it was held that "if, upon a full and fair trial, the evidence against the plaintiff was sufficient to satisfy the court of his guilt, that circumstance will afford strong presumptive evidence of probable cause, existing at that time, although upon a subsequent trial, and perhaps upon other and further testimony, a jury might be of opinion that it was not sufficient to justify a conviction." Goodrich v. Warner, 21 Conn. 433.

The hesitancy of the trial jury has been held to favor the presumption of probable cause.

A justice of the peace found the accused guilty of cutting wood without the consent of the owner, and on appeal to the court of common pleas the accused was acquitted. In an action for malicious prosecution it was held that, as the jury on the final trial in the criminal case were out some fifteen or more minutes before they agreed on a verdict of acquittal, the evidence of probable cause for the prosecution of plaintiff seems to have been sufficient, and a nonsuit was affirmed. It was said that the convictions in the lower court have been adjudged to be conclusive evidence of probable cause. Payson v. Caswell, 22 Me. 212. See Flickinger v. Wagner, 46 Md. 581, infra, II.

II. Discharge by an examining magistrate.

The weight of authority and of reason is that a discharge by an examining magistrate is prima facie evidence that there is a want of probable cause for the prosecution. There is a clear distinction between such a discharge and an acquittal by a jury. It would be the duty of the jury to acquit the defendant, if on all the evidence there was a reasonable doubt of his guilt, even though they might believe he was probably guilty of the crime. But the magistrate would violate his duty if he discharged the accused, when the evidence produced the belief that he was probably guilty of the crime. He acts directly on the question whether there is a probable cause for the prosecution; and, if he discharges him, it must be because, in his judgment, there is no probable cause for the prosecution.

But in some cases the discharge by an examining magistrate, when offered in evidence as showing want of probable cause, was held to depend on the nature of the evidence at the hearing before the magistrate, i. e.: If the hearing was ex parte, and the discharge was on the evidence of the prosecutor alone, then it would be prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause. In other cases it was held that it was not prima facie evidence, if the discharge was on conflicting evidence. In one case it is held that weight should be given to the oath of the prosecuting witness, made before the magistrate.

And in quite a number of cases the courts squarely refuse to adopt the rule that a discharge by an examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause.

a. As prima facie evidence of want of probable cause.

In the following cases it was held that a discharge by an examining magistrate was prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause in actions for malicious prosecution. Eggett v. Allen (Wis.) 96 N. W. 803; Bigelow v. Sickles, 80 Wis. 98, 27 Am. St. Rep. 25, 49 N. W. 106; Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 1; Orr v. Seiler, 1 Pennyp. 445; Barhight v. Tammany, 158 Pa. 545, 38 Am. St. Rep. 853, 28 Atl. 135; Madison v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 147 Pa. 509, 30 Am. St. Rep. 756, 23 Atl. 764; Straus v. Young, 36 Md. 246; Bornholdt v. Souillard, 36 La. Ann. 103;

Brown v. Vittur, 47 La. Ann. 607, 17 So. 193; Plassan v. Louisiana Lottery Co. 34 La. Ann. 246.

In the latter case it was also held that the presumption was rebutted, and the plaintiff failed to make out a cause of malicious prosecution.

And the burden of proving that there was probable cause was held to be on the defendant, in an action for malicious prosecution, where there had been a dismissal of a state's warrant by the magistrate. This was held to be prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. Williams v. Norwood, 2 Yerg. 336.

And the same was held where the discharge was on a charge of larceny. Bernar v. Dunlap, 94 Pa. 329. In this case the court said: "In an action against the prosecutor, if the plaintiff proves he was discharged by the examining magistrate, the burden of proof that there was probable cause, as a general rule, is cast on the defendant. If, however, the plaintiff's own testimony shows the existence of probable cause, it lifts that burden from the defendant. Such was the case here."

A party had been arrested for murder, and discharged by the examining magistrate. In a suit for malicious prosecution it was held that, after the discharge by the magistrate, the burden of showing affirmatively that there was probable cause rested upon the defendant. Smith v. Ege, 52 Pa. 419. In this case the record showed that probable cause for the prosecution had been shown.

So a discharge was held to be prima facie evidence of want of probable cause, sufficient to throw upon defendant the burden of proving the contrary, in an action for false imprisonment, where the plaintiff had been arrested on the charge of using threatening behavior, and locked up in the station house over night, but was discharged by the police justice. Rosenkranz v. Hass, 1 Misc. 220, 20 N. Y. Supp. 880.

In Whaling v. Wells, 50 La. Ann. 562, 23 So. 447, where it was held that the commitment by the magistrate was but prima facie evidence of the existence of probable cause, it was said: "It has frequently been held that the discharge of an accused person by a committing magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, and shifts the burden of proof on the defendant sued for malicious prosecution."

And a discharge on a hearing before a justice, together with the evidence that neither of the defendants had taken counsel, was held to cast upon them the burden of showing want of probable cause, in an action for malicious prosecution. Mann v. Cowen, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 30.

The declaration in the damage suit should state that the plaintiff was discharged from the prosecution. This must be proved. The proof of this was held in Johnston v. Martin, 7 N. C. (3 Murph.) 248, to make a prima facie case, and to cast upon the prosecutor the burden of proving that there was probable cause.

And this was also held in Bostick v. Rutherford, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 83. In this case the court said: "I am not disposed to disturb the case of Johnston v. Martin, in 7 N. C. (3 Murph.) 248. In the incipient stage of a prosecution before an examining magistrate much less grounds of suspicion will induce him to bind over the accused for further trial than will warrant either the grand jury to find a true bill, or the petit jury to convict; and, when the accused is discharged because a sufficient ground of suspicion has not been established against him, I can see no reason why such discharge should not furnish prima facie ground for an action against the prosecutor. If there was probable cause for the prosecution, and, owing to any unforeseen accident, it had not been made to appear before the magistrate, he may show it in his defense. I therefore think a new trial should not be granted on account of the first exception taken to the judge's charge."

These two decisions supra seem to be the foundation for the text in 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 455, stating "that the discharge by the examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause;" which proposition is so vigorously attacked and denied in Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575, infra.

In Johnson v. Chambers, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 287, infra, a later case, this rule was stated and adopted as the law; but it was held that the prosecutor was entitled to the benefit of his oath used before the justice.

In Griffin v. Sellars, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 494, 31 Am. Dec. 422, it was said: "It is settled in this state that a discharge by the examining magistrate imports that the accusation was groundless. Bostick v. Rutherford, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 83."

In Costello v. Knight, 4 Mackey, 65, James, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, speaking for himself, said: "I might add a single remark in regard to a matter that was outside of the record, but was discussed. It was claimed that the discharge ordered by the police judge was not prima facie evidence of want of probable cause. There has been some conflict of authority on that point, but there is very good authority for saying that it is prima facie evidence, the principle being very well laid down by Hall, J., in the case of Bostick v. Rutherford, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 83."

Proof that the plaintiff was discharged by an examining magistrate for want of probable cause to believe him guilty of passing counterfeit money was held to make a prima facie case for the plaintiff, in an action for malicious prosecution, upon the question of want of probable cause. Frost v. Holland, 75 Me. 108. The court said: "In an action for malicious prosecution the want of probable cause will not be inferred from the mere failure of the prosecution, nor from a mere acquittal upon trial; but the weight of authority seems to be in accordance with the ruling that proof that the plaintiff was discharged by the examining magistrate, for want of probable cause to believe him guilty, makes a prima facie case for the plaintiff in this respect, so that the defendant is called upon to offer proof to the contrary."

In Cooney v. Chase, 81 Mich. 203, 45 N. W. 833, there was an attempt to convict for larceny, and, by mistake of the recorder, the complaint made the wrong charge, and was dismissed, and the respondent was rearrested for the same offense on the charge of embezzlement, and was discharged on examination. It was held, sustaining an instruction, that, if the discharge of the defendant from the first complaint was because the recorder concluded there was no probable cause to suspect the plaintiff had been guilty of any offense, this fact, with other facts in the case, would be considered in determining whether there was or was not probable cause for the prosecution; but, if the discharge upon the first complaint was because of the opinion of the recorder or prosecuting attorney that the complaint did not set forth the offense with legal accuracy, then the discharge did not tend to prove that there was or was not probable cause. The court said: "This certainly was putting the defendant's case to the jury in as favorable light as he was entitled to."

In Cooper v. Hart, 147 Pa. 594, 23 Atl. 833, which held that there was a complete defense to the charge that there was not probable cause, it was said: "In an action against the prosecutor if the plaintiff proves he was discharged by the examining magistrate the burden of proving that there was probable cause, as a general rule, is cast on the defendant."

And in Jones v. Finch, 84 Va. 204, 4 S. E. 342, which held that the complaint stated a good cause of action, it was said: "That the judgment of the justice dismissing the complaint is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause for the prosecution has never been doubted."

There are some cases, however, that do not unqualifiedly adopt the rule of the preceding cases.

b. Qualification of rule.

In Chapman v. Dodd, 10 Minn. 350, Gil. 277, there were two prosecutions before two examining magistrates. In the case before magistrate Reppy the defendant in the malicious prosecution case was not present, and it was held, in regard to that prosecution, that the discharge of the plaintiff could not have been evidence of want of probable cause, or of any other fact than the institution and termination of the prosecution. The court said: "On an examination before a magistrate who has power only to commit or discharge, if it appears that there is probable cause to believe that an offense had been committed, and that the party charged therewith is guilty, it is the duty of the magistrate to hold the party to trial, or commit; otherwise he must discharge. In case of a discharge, therefore, the inference is that there is not probable cause to believe, either the commission of the offense, or the guilt of the party charged. In the case of an acquittal on a trial by jury it is altogether different; there the guilt of the defendant must be established beyond all reasonable doubt. All the authorities agree that an acquittal by a jury is not evidence of want of probable cause, and the same rule obtains where a defendant is discharged by a magistrate for want of prosecution, as in the case before Reppy." In regard to the prosecution before the other justice, it appears that the defendant had personally witnessed the commission of the crime charged against plaintiff, and the circumstances were stated as of his personal knowledge, and testified to positively. He was examined before the magistrate, and was the only witness for the prosecution. It was held that, under such circumstances, the discharge of the defendant by the magistrate was prima facie evidence of want of probable cause. The court said: "But the authorities differ as to whether a discharge by a magistrate after examination is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause. There are certainly respectable authorities which hold that a discharge under such circumstances is prima facie evidence of that fact. . . . Without going to the extent that in all cases a discharge by a magistrate is to have this effect, we are of opinion that where, as in this case, all the facts in regard to the commission of the crime charged are stated as within the personal knowledge of the defendant, and he is examined before the magistrate by whom the party charged with the crime is discharged, such discharge is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause."

But where the witnesses for the defense in a criminal prosecution, including the defendant himself, were examined on the hearing, and the facts upon which the prosecution was based were not peculiarly within the knowledge of the prosecutor, it was held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that the discharge of the plaintiff by the examining magistrate was not, per se, prima facie evidence of want of probable cause. Cole v. Curtis, 16 Minn. 182, Gil. 161. In this case the conclusion was reached that where, on examination before the magistrate, the evidence on the side of the prosecution alone was examined, and the proceeding was ex parte, it might be presumed that the facts upon which the prosecution relied as probable cause were communicated to the magistrate upon the hearing, and that upon such facts he determined; there was not probable cause to believe the defendant's guilt. But where the facts were not within the personal knowledge of the prosecutor, and the facts established by him have been explained by the defendant's witnesses, or the defendant himself, the discharge by the justice was not prima facie evidence of want of probable cause for the prosecution.

In Johnson v. Chambers, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 287, it is said: "The dismissal of the state's warrant raised a presumption of the want of probable cause, but it did not also raise a presumption of malice." The plaintiff had been arrested on a warrant for stealing, and was "discharged by the examining magistrate at the costs of the prosecutor." In this case it was held that there was probable cause, and that the trial court should have given this defendant the benefit of his oath before the justice, the court saying: "The good sense of the rule cannot be doubted; for in many cases the facts which make out probable cause are known to the prosecutor only, and to exclude his oath in relation to them would be to hand him over to the mercy of the person charged, whenever there happened not to be a conviction; and all who escaped the whipping post would turn around and bring an action for malicious prosecution."

In Flickinger v. Wagner, 46 Md. 581, the court instructed the jury that, if the justice of the peace, in examining a charge of perjury, discharged the plaintiff, and such acquittal and discharge were the result of deliberation and hesitation; and that, if the evidence at hand was so conflicting and doubtful that such justice was not able to decide, and gave the prisoner the benefit of the doubt, —then the magistrate's judgment was not sufficient evidence to prove that the defendant had not probable cause for instituting the prosecution. The court said: "The fact that the defendant had dismissed the charge of perjury against the plaintiff was not, of course, in itself sufficient evidence to prove that the defendant had not probable cause for instituting the prosecution before the magistrate." See Payson v. Caswell, 22 Me. 212, supra, I. b.

c. Discharge held "persuasive evidence" of want of probable cause.

In Missouri it is held that the discharge by an examining magistrate is persuasive evidence that the prosecution is groundless. This seems to have originated in a dictum in Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728, which was an action for malicious civil arrest, the court holding an instruction erroneous because it confounded an action for malicious arrest with an action for malicious prosecution, saying: "The verdict of a jury, upon the trial of a civil action, is essentially different from the discharge of a supposed criminal by the examining magistrate, or upon a bill of indictment ignored by a grand jury. Even in a criminal proceeding the final acquittal of the accused can have but little weight as evidence of probable cause, compared with an acquittal or discharge before the magistrate or grand jury. The magistrate and the grand jury have the very question of probable cause to try; the evidence on the side of the prosecution is alone examined, and the proceeding is entirely ex parte. Under such circumstances, the refusal of the examining tribunal to hold the accused over to trial must necessarily be very persuasive evidence that the prosecution is groundless. But this would not be the case with a verdict of acquittal, after a full investigation of the case, and an examination of the testimony on both sides; much less would it be so in a civil proceeding."

In Sappington v. Watson, 50 Mo. 83, it was held that the discharge of the plaintiff by the committing magistrate on a charge of misdemeanor was evidence going to show the want of probable cause. But the instruction given in that case, which was approved, is not as broad as the language in the opinion, for the jury were instructed that, if the defendant wilfully, maliciously, and without probable cause charged the plaintiff with having committed a misdemeanor, and without probable cause had procured and caused the arrest of the plaintiff upon the warrant, and the plaintiff appeared and was discharged, the jury should find for the plaintiff.

In a prosecution on an affidavit in a court of criminal correction the defendant was discharged, and subsequently an indictment was found in the criminal court for the same offense. In an action for malicious prosecution, based on the prosecution and discharge, it was held that the refusal of the committing magistrate to bind the defendant over was very persuasive evidence that the prosecution was without probable cause. Sharpe v. Johnston, 59 Mo. 557, 76 Mo. 660. In the former hearing the court said: "If the plaintiff were discharged by the court of criminal correction, exercising the powers, only, of a committing magistrate, not on account of any technical informality, but on an examination of the merits of the charge, under the authority of Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 730, such discharge would necessarily be considered very persuasive evidence that the prosecution was without probable cause. It is true that the grand jury, as well as the committing magistrate, have the very question of probable cause to try, and the fact that a true bill may have been found by the one, on the same state of facts which was held by the other to warrant a discharge, would appear to present a case of some difficulty, the prosecutor being sued for both prosecutions; but it is not necessary to discuss this point, as there are no instructions raising the question."

In Christian v. Hanna, 58 Mo. App. 37, it was said: "A discharge by a committing magistrate is very persuasive evidence that a prosecution was without probable cause;" citing Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728; Sharpe v. Johnston, 59 Mo. 557.

And in Thomas v. Smith, 51 Mo. App. 605, it was said: "It is true that the plaintiff, having been discharged upon preliminary examination, by the committing magistrate, could not, under the rule stated, arguendo, in Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728, and approved in Casperson v. Sproule, 39 Mo. 39, be nonsuited; but that discharge raised no question of fact. Its effect as evidence was a mere question of law; and whether certain other facts, if shown, had the legal effect to overcome plaintiff's prima facie case, made out by his discharge on preliminary examination, was a pure question of law."

d. Soundness of rule questioned.

In McRae v. Oneal, 13 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 160, on an appeal by plaintiff, the court said: "It has been decided in this court, in Johnston v. Martin, 7 N. C. (3 Murph.) 248, that the discharge of the plaintiff from the prosecution, by competent authority, after full examination, is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause; and the burden of proving the probable cause is then thrown upon the defendant. This decision has been confirmed by this court in the case of Bostick v. Rutherford, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 83. The correctness of this position is questionable; the innocence of the plaintiff does not prove the absence of probable cause, and the decision conflicts with English authorities, as appears from Purcell v. Macnamara, 9 East, 381, 1 Campb. 199, 9 Revised Rep. 578. But the expediency of interfering at this time with the subject, and thus unsettling that which has long been considered settled, is very doubtful. The inquiry is not necessary in this case; the defendant does not complain of the verdict, and he alone could have been injured by the application of the principle."

e. Cases refusing to adopt rule.

But quite a number of cases refuse to adopt the rule that a discharge is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. In Illinois the courts are inclined to protect the prosecutor, and the cases in that state seem generally to reject the inference of want of probable cause, some of the cases being very emphatic.

In Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 81, where the plaintiff had been discharged on a prosecution for theft before a justice of the peace, the trial court held that the discharge was prima facie evidence of want of probable cause. On appeal the court said: "The want of probable cause is the essential ground of this action. Other things may be inferred from this. But this cannot be inferred from anything else. It must be established by positive and express proof. It is not enough to show that the plaintiff was acquitted of the charge preferred against him, or that the defendant abandoned the prosecution. But the onus probandi is upon the plaintiff to prove affirmatively, by circumstances or otherwise, as he may be able, that the defendant had no ground for commencing the prosecution." The court further said: "The plaintiff here properly introduced a copy of the complaint made by the defendant, and of the trial and acquittal of himself. No objection is made to their admissibility, but the defendant's counsel supposed that the court overestimated its importance. The judge held that they were prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause. One respectable authority to this effect was produced on the trial, and adopted without an opportunity to examine its soundness. But it does not seem to be supported by other authorities, nor to accord with the principles which govern the action. We therefore entertain doubts whether it can be sustained. But we do not think it necessary to decide the question." This case does not show, positively, whether the discharge was after an examination, or was an acquittal. The defendant's brief insisted "that the discharge of the plaintiff after trial was not prima facie evidence of want of probable cause, for the magistrate to whom a complaint is made would not bind over unless there were proof sufficient to convict." This would seem to indicate that it was an examining trial. Mass. Rev. Stat. p. 723, gave jurisdiction to a justice of the peace to try cases of larceny where the value of the goods does not exceed $15, and referred to the previous section which included a book of accounts. In this case the value does not appear, and the accused had been charged with stealing an account book.

And where the examining magistrate, on a complaint charging hog stealing, discharged the defendant, it was held that the want of probable cause was not shown by the acquittal of the accused. Anderson v. Friend, 85 Ill. 135. The court said: "If the defendant acted in good faith, on evidence, whether true or false, which is sufficient to create a reasonable belief that the accused was guilty of the offense, he is protected."

And the discharge of plaintiff by an examining justice was held not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, but that to establish that fact something more must be proved. Thorp v. Baillett, 25 Ill. 339.

So, in Israel v. Brooks, 23 Ill. 575, it was held that an instruction: "That the discharge of the plaintiff by the examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, and sufficient to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving the contrary,"—did not state the law, and announced a principle of the most dangerous character. The court said: "As stated on the argument, this instruction is copied verbatim from 2 Greenleaf's Evidence, § 455. He cites Secor v. Babcock, 2 Johns. 203. That case decides no such principle. It is a per curiam opinion, and is as follows: 'The justice had power, on examination of a charge of suspicion of felony, or of having stolen goods, to dismiss the plaintiff below, if he was satisfied there was no ground for the suspicion. The acquittal was lawful, and there was a sufficient ground for a suit for a malicious prosecution. The judgment below must be affirmed.' The court does not presume to say that, by the discharge of the accused by the examining magistrate a sufficient ground for a malicious prosecution was established as showing a want of probable cause. The court does not say that, by reason of the discharge, a want of probable cause is to be inferred, nor anything like it. Greenleaf also refers to Johnston v. Martin, 7 N. C. (3 Murph.) 249, and Boatwick v. Rutherford, 11 N. C. (4 Hawks) 83, where the doctrine is there distinctly stated. L. R. A.

ed, in the language of this instruction. No authority or good reasoning is adduced to support it, and these cases stand alone, justifying such a principle."

And an instruction "that the plaintiff's discharge by the examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause for the charge, and the burden is upon the defendant to prove to the satisfaction of the jury the existence of probable cause," was held to be erroneous. Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 144. In this case the court said: "If the court was of the opinion that the discharge of the plaintiff, under the undisputed circumstances appearing, established the want of probable cause, the jury should have been so instructed. If, however, there were other and disputed facts, the ascertainment of the truth of which by the jury in one way or in the other would affect the question of probable cause, the disputed facts should have been called to their attention, and the legal effect of those disputed facts, when found either way as bearing upon the question of probable cause, should have been explained to them."

In Vanderbilt v. Mathis, 5 Duer, 304, where an examining magistrate discharged the accused, who was charged with perjury, and an action of malicious prosecution was brought, the trial court instructed the jury that the discharge before the magistrate "shows prima facie that there was no probable cause for the arrest, and shifts the burden of proof from the plaintiff to the defendant." On appeal it was held that "in such an action it is necessary to give some evidence of the want of probable cause. It is insufficient to prove a mere acquittal; that alone is not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. Gorton v. De Angelis, 6 Wend. 418." This statement—that an acquittal was not prima facie evidence—was not necessary, as the plaintiff had not been tried, and the case cited to support it was a civil case. The chief ground of reversal, however, was upon the instruction relating to malice.

And an instruction "that the discharge of the appellee [accused] by the magistrate was prima facie evidence of his innocence of the charge against him, but that it was not evidence that the person who made it did it without probable cause," was held to be as favorable to the plaintiff as he had any right to ask. Wright v. Fansier, 90 Ind. 494. The court said: "The only question in our minds is whether it was not more favorable than he had a right to have given the jury." In this case the terms "trial" and "acquittal" are used without regard to their true meaning, and as synonymous with an examination before a justice. The plaintiff was discharged on an examination for larceny, of which offense evidently a justice of the peace had only jurisdiction to examine, and not to try, and the acquittal referred to in the statement of the case and opinion was only a discharge on the hearing, which distinction is not disclosed in the case.

And in Heldt v. Webster, 80 Tex. 208, an instruction that, if the plaintiff was discharged by the examining magistrate, then the presumption of law was that there was no probable cause, was held to be erroneous. The court said: "This question was decided in the case of Griffin v. Chubb, 7 Tex. 614, 58 Am. Dec. 85; and it was there, in accordance with authority, held that a verdict of 'not guilty,' and the discharge of the defendant in a criminal prosecution instituted by the defendant in the suit, who had testified in the criminal prosecution, did not raise a presumption of the want of probable cause." This decision in Heidt v. Webster fails to distinguish between a discharge by an examining magistrate and an acquittal. In BEKKELAND v. LYONS referring to this, the court says: "It seems to us, however, that the question whether, save for the purpose of showing that the prosecution had ended, the fact of acquittal or discharge has any probative force whatever, was not involved in that case."

1. Conclusiveness of presumption.

A discharge of the defendant before an examining justice, in a prosecution for robbery, was held not, of itself, to constitute conclusive evidence of want of probable cause. Perry v. Suller, 92 Mich. 72, 52 N. W. 801. The court said: "Otherwise every person arrested, charged with crime, and discharged upon the examination, would in every such instance have an action for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution;" citing Hamilton v. Smith, 39 Mich. 226.

And where a corporation was sued for malicious prosecution it was held that the discharge by an examining magistrate ordinarily cast upon the defendant in a civil action the burden of showing probable cause; but where the prosecuting witness was not authorized to make the complaint in the interest of the corporation, it was held that this rule would not apply. Pownall v. Lancaster & W. Turnp. Co. 16 Lanc. L. Rev. 411.

In Brelet v. Mullen, 44 La. Ann. 194, 10 So. 865, which held that a dismissal on a charge for breaking and entering a building did not amount to an acquittal, the court said: "It is not always that malice and want of probable cause can be inferred from the dismissal of a charge against an accused before a committing magistrate, and that, if the discharge be prima facie evidence, the presumption may be rebutted."

III. Where there was a want of jurisdiction.

A magistrate, having no jurisdiction to try an offense of selling liquor, acquitted the accused. It was held that the record of the prosecution and acquittal were of no legal force or validity, and afforded no basis to sustain an action for malicious prosecution. Bixby v. Brundige, 2 Gray, 129, 61 Am. Dec. 443. In this case the record of acquittal was offered in evidence, and in ruling thereon the court held that there was no cause of action.

And where a discharge from arrest on a charge of obtaining money under false pretenses was made by a magistrate, for the reason that he believed he had no jurisdiction, and a nolle prosequi in another county was entered on the ground of want of jurisdiction as to venue, it was held that neither discharge was a fact from which either want of probable cause or malice could be inferred. McClafferty v. Philip, 151 Pa. 86, 24 Atl. 1042.

IV. Failure to prosecute.

In cases where the failure of the prosecution was on account of matters over which the complainant had no control, which distinction, 64 L. R. A.

however, is not made in all the cases, it seems that the discharge of the accused was held not to be prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. There is some conflict of authority as to the presumption of the want of probable cause on the abandonment of the prosecution by the complaining witness and the discharge of the accused, but the weight of authority seems to hold that the presumption does not arise. In one of the cases this was controlled by the fact that the accused had been recognized by the magistrate to appear at the court, and this gave rise to the presumption of guilt, which was not overcome by the subsequent abandonment.

A discharge from prosecution by a nolle prosequi was held not prima facie evidence of malice or want of probable cause. Yocum v. Polly, 1 B. Mon. 358, 36 Am. Dec. 583. In this case the court said: "The evidence strongly conduces to prove that any agency which the defendant may have had in the prosecution, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, was wholly in subordination to the commonwealth's prosecuting attorney for the district; . . . and that the plaintiff, etc., would not have been prosecuted had not the commonwealth's attorney, upon information not derived from the defendant, directed the constable who was acting in the business to procure a warrant against the plaintiff and others."

And in Lipford v. McCollum, 1 Hill, L. 82, the solicitor entered a nol. pros. on the ground that the oath was extra-judicial, for which a warrant for perjury had been issued, and thereupon the accused was discharged. It was held that this did not show want of probable cause, and a motion for nonsuit was granted.

And in Boeger v. Langenberg, 97 Mo. 390, 10 Am. St. Rep. 322, 11 S. W. 223, where the warrant of arrest had been improperly incorporated in a search warrant, and the examining justice, at the request of the prosecuting attorney, discharged the accused, it was held that such discharge was not of itself evidence of want of probable cause. In this case the prosecuting witness assisted the magistrate in writing out the warrant, and the subsequent action was for false imprisonment.

In Hurd v. Shaw, 20 Ill. 354, where no verdict had been rendered, and the state's attorney entered a nolle prosequi, it was held that there had been no trial on the merits. The court said: "We are inclined to the opinion that an action for a malicious prosecution, unless actual malice be proved, should not prevail in any case where the merits have not been tried, and a verdict pronounced." See supra, I. a.

In Langford v. Boston & A. R. Co. 144 Mass. 431, 11 N. E. 697, and some other cases cited, it was held that there was no cause of action where the discharge of the plaintiff was on account of a nolle entered by the district attorney of his own motion. On this subject the cases are not all agreed. Inasmuch as the matter of evidence is not discussed, these cases are not included in this note, although the rulings on demurrer to the complaint, or that there is no cause of action, would indicate that such a discharge would be of no avail as evidence of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution.

In Appar v. Woolston, 48 N. J. L. 57, it was held that a discharge under N. J. Rev. p. 279, Crim. Proc. § 65, providing for a discharge if trial is not had at a certain term, did not authorize an action for malicious prosecution. It was also held that the failure of the proceeding against plaintiff was not evidence, either of the defendant's malice, or of the want of probable cause.

And in Frowman v. Smith, Litt. Sel. Cas. 7, 12 Am. Dec. 265, where the accused was discharged from the indictment "for reasons which appeared to the court, and not acquitted of the charge by a trial on the merits," it was held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that it was not incumbent upon the defendants to show probable cause, but that it was essential to support the action that express malice in the defendants should have been proved.

But in Messman v. Ihlenfeldt, 89 Wis. 585, 62 N. W. 522, which was an action for malicious prosecution and for false imprisonment for poisoning cattle, which prosecution was dismissed by the district attorney because one of his witnesses failed to testify as he had on a previous occasion, the court said: "The burden of proof, upon the whole case, to show that there was no probable cause, is upon the plaintiff. Newell, Malicious Prosecution, 282, § 17. The weight of authority seems to be that the abandonment of the criminal prosecution is prima facie evidence of the absence of probable cause. Id. 290, and cases cited; Bigelow v. Sickles, 80 Wis. 98, 27 Am. St. Rep. 25, 49 N. W. 106. There are many cases to the contrary. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 64, and cases cited in note 4. It may be assumed that the abandonment of the prosecution put upon the defendant the onus of overcoming with proof this prima facie presumption. This was done if, by the preponderance of the whole testimony, the jury was legitimately satisfied of the defendant's entire good faith and reasonable belief."

In the following cases a discharge for want of prosecution was held not to be prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause:

This was held in Frederick v. Halberstadt, 14 Rich. L. 41. In this case the prosecuting witness did not have time to go to the country for his witnesses and reach court, and the trial court said: "There was scarcely time for him to have returned to the mayor's court on Monday morning." On appeal it was insisted that the failure to prosecute entitled a verdict for the plaintiff in a malicious prosecution case. This was denied.

In Purcell v. Macnamara, 1 Campb. 202, 9 East. 361, 9 Revised Rep. 578, which was an action for malicious prosecution on a charge of perjury, the plaintiff showed that the prosecutor did not appear on the trial of the cause, and that he was acquitted. It was held that this was insufficient, the court saying: "If they were to hold that the mere circumstance of the defendant's nonappearance at the trial was sufficient, it must follow that every person who institutes a prosecution, and sees reason to drop it, is prima facie a malicious prosecutor,—a supposition extremely dangerous to the criminal justice of the country, as well as perfectly unfounded, since the prosecution might have been both commenced and abandoned from the purest and most laudable motives."

In Pharis v. Lambert, 1 Sneed, 228, where the magistrate bound the defendant to appear in court, and the prosecutor failed to appear, and the defendant was discharged, it was held that such acquittal did not raise the presumption of want of probable cause, in an action for malicious prosecution. This was on the ground that, as the magistrate had bound the accused to keep the peace, the presumption, if any, would be that there was probable cause, and this was not overcome by the failure to follow up that prosecution. The court said that this discharge "cannot be regarded as an acquittal so as to have the force of raising the presumption of want of probable cause."

In Campbell v. O'Bryan, 9 Rich. L. 204, a peace warrant had been executed, after which the complaining party told the magistrate that he was willing the accused should be released as he had satisfied the complainant he need not dread him; but the accused declined to be released, and remained in jail several hours. The magistrate doubted the propriety of releasing the accused, and required him to execute a recognizance to keep the peace. In an action for malicious prosecution it was held that a nonsuit was properly granted, and that some proof was necessary, other than the facts in this case, to show that legal process had been abused without probable cause.

Plaintiff was recognized on a charge of felony, but the warrant was void, and the prosecution was abandoned at the first term of court, and no indictment was found. It was held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe that the plaintiff had committed the felony, and it was also held that the abandonment of the prosecution did not raise an implication of want of probable cause. Braveboy v. Cockfield, 2 McMull. L. 270, 39 Am. Dec. 123. The court said: "The only cases where that is implied are when the grand jury find no bill, or the defendant is acquitted by the petit jury, and the presiding judge orders a copy of the indictment. From the statement in the report, it would seem that the plaintiff relied on 'the letting fall the prosecution' as evidence of want of probable cause. This was not enough. But we would not now nonsuit the plaintiff on this ground, if, in the progress, there was a semblance of want of probable cause shown. But it was plain there was not."

And where there was a voluntary discontinuance of the prosecution it was held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that an instruction, "the burden of proof was on the defendant to show probable cause," was properly refused. Joiner v. Ocean S. S. Co. 86 Ga. 238, 12 S. E. 361. In this case the court said: "An abandonment of the prosecution, or an acquittal for want of evidence, is, as we have seen, no proof of malice, or of the prosecution being unfounded and unjust."

The following cases seem to hold that a voluntary discontinuance of the prosecution is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause; but a close examination of these cases indicates that the question was evaded in some cases, in others assumed, and in others stated as a dictum. It may be said that not many cases hold that such a discontinuance is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause.

An information was filed, and an indictment found, for maliciously entering upon and destroying property. The prosecutor was allowed to enter a nolle on payment of costs. In an action against him for malicious prosecution, holding that a nolle was such an ending as would entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action, it was said that such abandonment was "prima facie evidence of the acknowledgment of the fact that he had no sufficient cause for prosecution." Murphy v. Moore (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 92, 11 Atl. 665.

In Eagleton v. Kabrich, 66 Mo. App. 231, an instruction to the effect that the dismissal before an examining magistrate of a prosecution for a felony by the prosecuting witness, and the discharge of the defendant, is evidence "tending to show" that there was no probable cause, was approved. It was also held that evidence that a criminal prosecution was commenced for the purpose of enforcing a property claim was proof of the want of probable cause, and that this was conclusively proved in this case. The court said: "It has been repeatedly decided in this state that the discharge of the plaintiff by the committing magistrate, or the refusal of the grand jury to find an indictment, was evidence of a want of a probable cause. Casperson v. Sproule, 39 Mo. 39; Callahan v. Caffarata, 39 Mo. 136; Sappington v. Watson, 50 Mo. 83. Whether the same effect should be given to the voluntary dismissal of a prosecution is not quite clear, and the case of Smith v. Burrus, 106 Mo. 94, 13 L. R. A. 59, 27 Am. St. Rep. 329, 16 S. W. 881, leaves the question in doubt. Where, as in this case, the affidavit upon which the arrest is made is fatally defective, and the discharge of the prisoner would be the necessary result of a hearing; and where, moreover, the dismissal is not followed by a new prosecution,—it is difficult to see why the voluntary dismissal should not be some evidence of the unauthorized institution of a suit."

See Inclendon v. Berry, 1 Campb. 203, note, supra, I. a; Womack v. Circle, 32 Gratt. 324, supra, I. b; Chapman v. Dodd, 10 Minn. 350, 611. 277, supra, II.

V. Failure to indict.

The weight of authority seems to be that the failure of the grand jury to indict is not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. Some cases, where the accused was recognized by an examining magistrate to appear before the court having the grand jury, regard the act of the magistrate as prima facie evidence of probable cause, and hold that this is not overcome by ignoring the bill of indictment. The conflicting cases do not seem to be so well considered.

In Ganea v. Southern P. R. Co. 51 Cal. 140, where the plaintiff had been held to answer, by the examining magistrate, and the grand jury dismissed the charge, it was conceded that holding to answer, by the magistrate, established prima facie the existence of probable cause, and it was held that this was not overcome by the grand jury ignoring the charge. The court said: "Under the system of criminal law prevailing in this state, the deliberations of the grand jury are not, as formerly, a mere examination of the case of the prosecution. The proceeding before the grand jury is in fact a preliminary trial, and one in which the accused may appear by his witnesses and make his defense, and may himself be sworn and testify in his own behalf. The favorable result of such a trial certainly affords no evidence of want of probable cause."

In Ambs v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 114 Fed. 317, the jury were instructed that the holding over and the finding by a magistrate that there was probable cause to believe the plaintiff guilty were prima facie evidence of that fact; but that the ignoring of the bill by the grand jury, when taken by itself, established prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. The court further instructed, however, that the conclusion reached by the magistrate was entitled to greater consideration than the discharge by the grand jury.

In Byne v. Moore, 5 Taunt. 187, 1 Marsh. 12, it was contended that the rejection of an indictment by the grand jury was prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution. The only evidence given by plaintiff was that the bill was returned "not found." The plaintiff was thereupon nonsuited.

And the fact that the grand jury returned "no bill" against the plaintiff was held not prima facie sufficient evidence of the want of probable cause to prevent a nonsuit, in an action for malicious prosecution. Fulmer v. Harmon, 3 Strobb. L. 576.

In Wallis v. Alpine, 1 Campb. 204, note, where the plaintiff had been arrested at the sessions on a charge of assault, and no indictment was preferred, and he was discharged, it was held that the mere nonprosecution of the charge made on oath against another was not sufficient to maintain the action for malicious prosecution.

But in Enders v. Boisseau, 52 La. Ann. 1020, 27 So. 546, on preliminary examination before the district judge, the accused was held to answer to the grand jury, which failed to indict. The complaining witness was not a witness before the grand jury. It was held that the defendant had probable cause and reasonable ground for making the charge. In the instructions given, the rule was laid down that "a discharge or acquittal in a criminal case is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause;" citing Whaling v. Wells, 50 La. Ann. 562, 23 So. 447. In the latter case this was a dictum, stated as applicable to a discharge by an examining magistrate.

In Casperson v. Sproule, 39 Mo. 39, where the accused was recognized to appear before the criminal court, and the prosecuting witness endeavored to have the grand jury indict the accused for embezzlement, but the bill was ignored, the court adopted and followed the rule of law laid down in Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728, to the effect that the refusal of the examining tribunal to hold the accused over till trial must necessarily be very persuasive evidence that the prosecution is groundless. The court said: "In the case of Brant v. Higgins, 10 Mo. 728, Judge Napton, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'The verdict of a jury upon the trial of a civil action is essentially different from the discharge of a supposed criminal by the examining magistrate, or upon a bill of indictment ignored by a grand jury. Even in a criminal proceeding, the final acquittal of the accused can have but little weight as evidence of probable cause compared with an acquittal or discharge before the magistrate or grand jury. The magistrate and grand jury have the very question of probable cause to try; and the evidence on the side of the prosecution is alone examined, and the proceeding is entirely ex parte. Under such circumstances, the refusal of the examining tribunal to hold the accused over till trial must necessarily be very persuasive evidence that the prosecution is groundless."

The court in the Casperson Case, in adopting the rule applicable to discharge by an examining magistrate, fails to discuss the fact that the plaintiff had not been discharged by an examining justice, but had been recognized by him to appear at the court.

The case of Brant v. Higgins was an action for false arrest where the defendant had been released on bail, and the rule laid down in that case, as to the question of probable cause and the discharge in the criminal case before the magistrate, was only a dictum. The difference between the rule as stated in the Brant Case and that applied in the Casperson Case is that in the former case it is stated as applying to a discharge before the examining magistrate or the grand jury. But the Brant Case does not say what the effect would be in case the magistrate found there was sufficient cause to hold the accused over, even though the grand jury did not indict, which was the fact in the Casperson Case; nor does the latter case say what effect this action of the magistrate would have; nor does it discuss it, as is done in the case of Pharis v. Lambert, 1 Sneed, 228, where the accused had been held over by the magistrate, and, on failure to prosecute, the accused was discharged, and the court refused to lay down the rule that the final discharge was prima facie evidence, saying: "But here the action of the magistrate was in favor of the prosecution, and, if any presumption would arise, it would be in favor of the existence of probable cause, instead of against it."

In Plummer v. Gheen, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 66, which was an action for slander and malicious prosecution, where the indictment for perjury had been rejected by the grand jury and indorsed "no bill," the court, in discussing the liability, said that, in order to repel the prima facie evidence of a want of probable cause, arising from the indictment not being found a true bill, defendant introduced several witnesses to prove that plaintiff swore falsely in the case where perjury was charged.

The rejection of a complaint by a grand jury, and the discharge of the accused, who had been bound over by an examining justice, were held to constitute prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. Potter v. Casterline, 41 N. J. L. 22.

But, referring to this case, the court, in Appar v. Woolston, 48 N. J. L. 57, says: In that case "it was said that the rejection of the complaint by the grand jury is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. This observation was not necessary to the decision of the case,—evidence of facts having been given at the trial from which it might be inferred that the prosecution was without probable cause."

VI. Finding in criminal proceeding that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause.

In some states a provision is made under the statutes for a judgment in the criminal case against the prosecutor for costs, and for a finding that the prosecution was malicious and without probable cause. Such a finding is not competent evidence, in an action for malicious prosecution, to establish want of probable cause, under the rule res inter alios acta. It 64 L. R. A.

appears that such a judgment was allowed in evidence in a Wisconsin case; but a subsequent case says that this decision was on general principles, and that the finding was not a controlling element.

A finding of an examining justice of the peace that the complaint of the prosecuting witness was malicious and without probable cause was held to be inadmissible in support of the claim of the lack of probable cause. Farwell v. Laird, 58 Kan. 402, 49 Pac. 518. The court said "that judgments are admissible against strangers to prove only their rendition and their legal effects, and not the facts upon which they rest."

So, in Sweeney v. Perney, 40 Kan. 102, 19 Pac. 328, the record of the trial court in a criminal case showing an acquittal and finding that the complaint was malicious and without probable cause, and stating the name of the prosecuting witness, was held to have been properly excluded. The court said: "We have found no case that goes to a greater extent than holding that the judgment of acquittal is prima facie proof of a want of probable cause; and it appears that the cases that hold the contrary are the most logical. It must appear that the prosecution is at an end. The record of a criminal suit is admitted in a civil action to prove that fact solely, because criminal actions are public matters, and are only disposed of in this form; and the necessities of justice require such a record to be admitted in a suit between private parties to establish the fact that the prosecution is terminated. The plaintiff in error seeks to use such a record for other purposes in this action, and it would seem to be in violation of all fundamental principles."

And an entry on a docket of a justice on a trial for assault and battery "that the complaint was malicious and without probable cause, and that Erick Sevaton pay the costs of this action," was held to be incompetent evidence in an action for malicious prosecution. Casey v. Sevaton, 30 Minn. 516, 16 N. W. 407. This entry was made under, Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 65, § 158 (157), providing that, on the acquittal of the accused, he should be discharged; and, if the justice certifies in his docket that the complaint was wilful and malicious and without probable cause, he should enter a judgment against the complainant for the costs that have accrued to the court. The entry on the docket was held to be res inter alios.

And a judgment of acquittal, together with the finding of a jury that the prosecuting witness had acted maliciously, and a judgment against him in costs, was held to be incompetent, and improperly allowed in evidence, in a malicious prosecution case. Wilmerton v. Sample, 39 Ill. App. 60. The court said that it "could not fail to have a most damaging effect on him, before the jury, and no instruction of the court that such judgment was introduced for the simple purpose of showing that such suit was ended could prevent the jury from knowing that the prosecuting witness and appellant here had been deliberately adjudged guilty of malicious prosecution in another suit. The exhibition of the contents of that record was wholly unnecessary to prove that suit was ended."

In an action for malicious prosecution for perjury, where the plaintiff had been acquitted, on the trial, it was held that there was probable cause. It was also held that, where an accusation of perjury was found upon the trial to be groundless, "this finding did not negative the existence of probable cause for making the accusation." Kidder v. Parkhurst, 3 Allen. 393. The court said: "That was to be judged of, not upon the actual state of the case, but upon the honest and reasonable belief of the party prosecuting." The expression that the "finding," etc., must refer simply to the acquittal, as the statement of the case shows only an acquittal, and does not show a special finding that the prosecution was groundless. In this case there had been complaints made before two grand juries. The second one indicted the plaintiff, and on trial the plaintiff was acquitted.

In Grohmann v. Kirschman, 168 Pa. 189, 32 Atl. 32, where it was said: "A verdict of acquittal is evidence, though it may be slight, of the want of probable cause."—It was held that the admission of testimony of what the judge said at the trial in the quarter sessions, directing the verdict of acquittal and instructing the jury to hold the prosecutor liable for costs, was erroneous, and should not have been admitted, as this was based upon a state of facts different from those which led to the arrest, and relating to the grounds for a conviction or an acquittal. The court said: "The inquiry as to the probable cause goes back to the commencement of the prosecution, and it relates to the facts then known and as they then appeared. It is not confined to the truth of matters which led to the prosecution, but extends to their appearance as indicating the guilt or innocence of the accused. The jury in the criminal court deals with the question of actual guilt as it appears at the trial, not with the indications of guilt as they appeared at the time of the arrest."

In Katterman v. Stitzer, 7 Watts, 189, under a Pennsylvania act of assembly making it the duty of the jury to decide whether the costs of the prosecution should be paid by the county, the prosecutor, or the defendant, and to name the prosecutor if they found that he ought to pay, it was held that it was conclusive evidence showing that the defendant in an action for malicious prosecution was the prosecutor in the criminal case, and it was also evidence to show that the plaintiff had been acquitted of the charge.

An instruction, "The judgment of the justice discharging the plaintiff on the examination is prima facie evidence of want of probable cause, but it is not conclusive on the subject; and you are to determine the question, considering that fact and all the other evidence bearing on the question,"—was held to be proper. Bigelow v. Sickles, 80 Wis. 98, 27 Am. St. Rep. 25; 49 N. W. 106. In this case the court said: "The defendant in this suit was the sole complainant who set the prosecution on foot against the plaintiff, and who had the right to produce the witnesses; and the issue was 'probable cause for charging the prisoner with the offense;' and the judgment of discharge is based upon a 'want of probable cause;' and, if 'the complaint was wilful and malicious and without probable cause,' the justice may 'enter judgment against the complainant for all the costs of the proceeding, including witness fees.' Rev. Stat. § 4791. The defendant could scarcely be treated as a stranger to that proceeding and judgment. The justice may adjudicate the same issues that are involved in this case,—wilful and malicious prosecution without probable cause,—and enter a money judgment against the defendant."

Referring to this case, the court, in Eggett v. Allen (Wis.) 96 N. W. 803, said: "It is said, however, by appellant, that the Bigelow Case was a case where the justice made the certificate of the presence or malice and want of probable cause, and hence that it is not applicable to the present case. It is true that the Bigelow Case might have been decided upon the narrow ground that the certificate aforesaid was made, but the difficulty is that the court did not so treat it, but, on the contrary, after reviewing the authorities on the effect of a simple discharge upon a preliminary examination, and recognizing that there was a conflict, deliberately adopted the broad doctrine that such a discharge was prima facie evidence of want of probable cause in all cases whether the certificate aforesaid was made or not. Whatever might be our opinion upon the question as an original proposition, we do not feel called upon to overrule that decision now. It was not shaken by the decision in Cullen v. Hanisch, 114 Wis. 24, 89 N. W. 900. It has doubtless been acted upon by trial courts many times since it was made, and we do not feel that there are any considerations so weighty in character as would compel us to disregard the doctrine of stare decisis."

VII. Summary.

In actions for malicious prosecution the burden of proof is on the plaintiff. The judgment of acquittal is admissible to show that the prosecution has terminated, but it is not prima facie evidence that the prosecution was without probable cause, so as to shift the burden of proof upon the defendant in the malicious-prosecution case. In some few cases the ground of this rule is stated to be that the accused had been recognized by an examining magistrate, which gave such a presumption of guilt that it was not to be overcome by an acquittal when used in an action for damages. But this distinction is not made in a large proportion of the cases. The record of acquittal should not be held admissible, for the reason that in the malicious-prosecution case the question whether the accused was guilty or innocent is not on trial, but the gist of the action is whether or not the prosecutor had reasonable cause, at the time of instigating the prosecution to believe the defendant guilty. Acquittals on appeal are held not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. The weight of authority is that a discharge by an examining magistrate is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. In Missouri it seems that it is "very persuasive evidence" that the prosecution was without probable cause. In Illinois it seems that the courts refuse to accept the doctrine that it is prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, and this view is supported by some other cases. Where there is a want of jurisdiction it seems that the discharge is of no legal force as evidence of probable cause. A discharge on failure of the prosecution for matters over which the complainant had no control is held not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause, and the weight of authority is that the same rule applies on the abandonment of the prosecution. The weight of authority is that the failure of the grand jury to indict is not prima facie evidence of the want of probable cause. What appears to be an inconsistency and contradiction in some cases as to the rule of evidence applicable to discharge and acquittal may be attributed to the fact that in quite a large number of the cases the court failed to distinguish between an action for malicious prosecution, based upon a criminal proceeding, and a civil action. Added to this is the fact that many courts use the expressions "discharge," "trial," and "acquittal" as synonymous, without making a distinction between a discharge by an examining magistrate and a trial of the criminal actions on the merits. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Piff. in Err.,

1. An agent who has made a contract for the sale of his principal's property, for which he is to receive a commission, has sufficient interest in a telegram which he sends to the principal for the purpose of having the sale confirmed, to be entitled to maintain an action for failure of the telegraph company to perform its contract.
2. The principal's directions as to delivery of a telegram, and not those given by the agent, will control in case an agent who has negotiated a sale of property sends a telegram for the purpose of securing confirmation of the sale; so that, if the delivery is authorized by the principal, but is contrary to the directions given by the agent, the agent cannot hold the company liable for losses sustained by him because the message never reaches the principal.
3. Delivery of a telegram to one authorized to receive it, who changes the address and returns it to the company to be forwarded, is a sufficient delivery to absolve the company from liability in case the message never reaches the addressee because the new address is incomplete.
4. That a telegram sent by agent to principal is not delivered to the one in whose care it was directed by the agent according to the principal's instructions, in consequence of which it never reaches the principal, will not render the company liable for nondelivery at the suit of the agent, if it was delivered to another person whom the principal had authorized to receive messages for him.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Cooke County in plaintiffs favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to transmit and deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George H. Fearons, with Messrs. Wilkins, Vinson, & Moore, for plaintiff in error:

As Fant was absent from San Antonio when the message was received there, but had authorized the Mahncke hotel, or its clerks, or both, to receive his telegrams in his absence and forward them to him at Monclova, Mexico, a delivery of said message to said hotel clerk, or to said hotel, was a good delivery, and constituted a full discharge of appellant's duty in that regard.

St. Rep. 906, 44 S. W. 274; Joyce, Electric Law, p. 781.

Mr. N. L. Lindsley also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Potter & Potter, for defendant in error:

The selection of D. Sullivan & Co. in this case as the persons to be trusted with the duty of conveying the message to Fant in the event of his absence was a necessary exclusion of the hotel.

It is wholly immaterial what reasons prompted Barefoot to select D. Sullivan & Co. in preference to, and to the exclusion of, all other persons in the city of San Antonio to receive this particular message in the absence of Fant. Whether he did so at Fant's suggestion, or because he considered them the best and the safest persons to be intrusted with this duty, is of no consequence.

The hotel clerk had no authority to interfere with this message, or to give any directions in reference to it.

may maintain an action for delay in delivering telegram? does not depend upon payment of the fee, nor upon whether the sender had been constituted an agent for that purpose, but upon the question who was in fact to be served, and who is damaged, see Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 6 L. R. A. 844.

The transmission of the message to Monclova was simply an effort to deliver Barefoot's message to Fant, and one step in the performance of its duty to use reasonable diligence in delivering the message to Fant, and, if it failed, it was as much the duty of the company to make another effort as if it had gone to Fant's office and failed to find him, and did not deliver.

One effort to deliver a message is not sufficient.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of civil appeals filed the following conclusions of fact:

"Appellee, Barefoot, alleged and proved that on January 13, 1901, he was at Chickasha, Indian territory, and there delivered to the appellant company for transmission the following telegram:

"Chickasha, I. T., Jan. 13, 1901.

"D. R. Fant,

Care D. Sullivan & Co.,
San Antonio, Texas.

"Meet me at Fort Worth Monday, will close deal for steers. Answer.

"L. G. Barefoot."

"This telegram was duly transmitted and received by appellant in San Antonio at 11:18 A. M. of the day it was sent. Soon thereafter appellant's messenger took the message to the banking house of D. Sullivan & Co., the members of which firm were well-known residents of San Antonio, but found the bank closed, and thereupon took the message to the Mahneke hotel, which was the regular boarding place of D. R. Fant; but, D. R. Fant being absent in Mexico, the clerk, who had been authorized to receive and forward to Monclova, Mexico, messages and letters addressed to D. R. Fant, received the telegram in question for the purpose specified, wrote the forwarding address on the back of the envelope, and returned the whole to the messenger, who thereupon returned it to the receiving office, and appellant forwarded the message over its telegraph line to D. R. Fant at the address given by said clerk. By reason, however, of an omission on the part of the clerk in giving the address, D. R. Fant failed to receive appellee's telegram, of which latter fact appellant was informed the next day by service message from Monclova, 64 L. R. A.

Mexico. Appellant made no further effort to deliver the message, nor was the sending office notified of such nondelivery, as was provided in such cases by one of appellant's rules.

"Fant had instructed appellee to sell for him cattle owned by Fant and situated in the Indian territory, agreeing to give appellee as compensation therefor 50 cents per head for all cattle sold at the price named. Pursuant thereto appellee had contracted with J. M. Russell, a responsible buyer, for the sale of 2,500 of said cattle at the specified price; of all which appellant's agent at Chickasha was informed by appellee at the time said telegram was delivered. Had the telegram in question been received by Fant at any time within two weeks of said January 13, 1901, said sale would have been consummated and appellee paid said commissions. Had said telegram been delivered to either of the members of the firm of D. Sullivan & Co. on January 13th or at the banking house on any of the following days within reasonable time (Sundays and legal holidays excluded), said telegram would have been duly forwarded to, and probably received by, D. R. Fant. Fant learned nothing of the telegram, however, until he returned to San Antonio some two weeks after January 13, 1901, when it was too late; Russell in the meantime having made other arrangements. It further appears that on the morning of January 14, 1901, appellee went to Ft. Worth, and there remained until the night of January 15, 1901, when, not having heard from Fant, he returned to Chickasha, and on the morning of January 16th he went to the telegraph office, and informed the sending agent that he had not heard anything from Fant, and asked such agent if the message in question had been delivered. The agent replied: 'I know it has been delivered, because, if it had not been, the San Antonio office would have notified me.' Appellee thereafter made no further effort in the matter, nor did he, while at Ft. Worth, make effort to communicate with Fant."

Counsel for Barefoot claim that he had an interest in the message sent to Fant, and that he made a special contract with the telegraph company that the message should be delivered to D. Sullivan & Co. to be forwarded to Fant in case he should be absent from San Antonio. It is claimed that under the special contract the message could not be delivered to any other person, although authorized by Fant to receive it. The facts found by the court of civil appeals, and as shown by the undisputed evidence in the case, establish that the defendant in error had a pecuniary interest in the message, of which interest the telegraph company was notified at the time the message was delivered; but the terms of the message do not constitute a special contract to deliver to D. Sullivan & Co. Barefoot testified as follows: "At the time I delivered the message I told the agent, Daniels, that I had sold Fant's cattle, and that there was $1,250 in it for me. I told him to send the message in care of D. Sullivan & Company, as Fant had told me that he was out of San Antonio so much to always send his messages in care of D. Sullivan & Company, as they always knew where he was, and would forward the message to him." This testimony shows that Barefoot was acting as the agent of Fant in selling the cattle and in sending the telegram to him at San Antonio. The subject of the telegram was the sale of Fant's cattle, which was to be confirmed by him, and the interest of Barefoot was incidental and subordinate to that of Fant. The object in sending the message in care of D. Sullivan & Co. was to secure its delivery to Fant, and the evidence quoted proves that D. Sullivan & Co. had been selected by Fant, not by Barefoot, as the party to whom the message should be sent. The testimony of Barefoot, which is all that the record contains upon the subject, does not establish that any contract was made with the telegraph company whereby the delivery of the message was restricted to D. Sullivan & Co. in the absence of Fant himself, and we must determine the question of the proper delivery of it to another agent of Fant by the rules of law applicable to the message as it was written. This case is unlike Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hendricks, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 413, 68 S. W. 720, in these important facts. In that case the contract was to deliver to a certain man, or to send to the person addressed 6 miles in the country, and the delivery was made to one not authorized to receive it by either party to the message.

It is also claimed on the part of defendant in error that the facts do not show a delivery of the message to the clerk of the Mahncke hotel. The clerk of the hotel received the message for the purpose of executing the commission left with him by Fant, indorsed upon it Fant's address in Mexico, and verbally directed the messenger boy to forward the message to Fant to the address written thereon. This proves a delivery on the part of the telegraph company to the clerk, and, if he was authorized by law to receive it, there was a performance of the contract made with Barefoot. The telegraph company might have delivered the message to D. Sullivan & Co. without making inquiry for Fant. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Young, 77 Tex. 245, 19 Am. St. Rep. 751, 13 S. W. 985. But, having found the bank closed, it was the duty of the telegraph company to seek Fant at his place of abode, and, if absent from the city, to deliver the message to any person who might be found there authorized to receive it. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jackson, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 273, 46 S. W. 279. It is not denied that a delivery to Fant in person would have discharged the contract of the telegraph company, but it is contended by the defendant in error that in Fant's absence the message should have been delivered to D. Sullivan & Co. The latter had no interest in the message, and could not have exercised any control over it except to receive and forward it. It was sent in their care merely as a medium through which to reach Fant. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pearce, 95 Tex. 578, 68 S. W. 771; Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 10 Tex. Civ. App. 120, 30 S. W. 250. By directing the clerk of the Mahncke hotel to forward all messages that might be brought to the hotel for him, Fant made the clerk of that hotel his agent to receive such messages as might be presented to him, upon which fact arises the question, Did Fant have the power to authorize another person to receive this message, which he had previously directed to be sent in the care of D. Sullivan & Co? There is no reason why Fant should not have two agents in San Antonio to forward messages to him, nor is there any reason why a delivery to either agent would not bind Fant. If, when the messenger went to the hotel, he had refused to deliver the message to the clerk, could there be a doubt that the company would be liable to Fant for any damage he might have sustained by the failure to deliver the message to his duly authorized agent? In this case the paramount object in sending the telegram was to serve the interest of Fant, to notify him of the making of a contract subject to his approval; and it cannot be that the authority of the principal to control such a contract would be subordinate to that of his agent, who sent it according to the direction of and in the interest of his principal.

Counsel for Barefoot rely much upon the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Turner, 94 Tex. 304, 60 S. W. 432. In that case a cotton buyer delivered to the telegraph company a message accepting the terms of a proposed contract for the sale of cotton, and directed that his message should be delivered to a certain telephone company, which extended from a station on the line of the telegraph company to the place where the person addressed lived. The telegraph company delivered the message to the agent of another telephone company that reached the same place, which failed to deliver it in time, whereby the sender lost his bargain.

It will be seen that the facts are very different from this case. In the Turner Case neither the sender nor the addressee had authorized the delivery of the message to the telephone company which made the failure. The two cases are so dissimilar that the Turner Case cannot be considered as authority in this case.

We are of the opinion that the delivery to the clerk of the Mahneke hotel at San Antonio was a full and complete performance of the contract made between Barefoot and the telegraph company, and that Barefoot is not entitled to recover anything on account of the failure of that clerk to give the proper direction for the transmission of the telegram to Fant at Monclova, Mexico. It is therefore ordered that the judgments of the District Court and of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that this cause be remanded.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Travis County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Baker, Botta, Baker, & Lovett, with Mr. S. R. Fisher, for plaintiffs in error:

It was defendants' right, in the interest of justice and with the view of ascertaining the real facts, to have plaintiff submit himself to a physical examination by competent physicians to be appointed by the court, without suggestion by the defendants or their counsel.

If the court has the power, under any circumstances, to compel plaintiff to submit to such an examination, defendants' demand for such an examination is not a matter of right, but it rests within the sound discretion of the trial court to order or refuse to order the examination, which discretion will not be interfered with on appeal unless shown to be manifestly abused.

It being plaintiff's legal right to refuse to be examined by a board of physicians to be appointed by the court, it was his legal right to have such fact withheld from the consideration of the jury.

Miami & M. Turnp. Co. v. Baily, 37 Ohio St. 107.

If, under any circumstances, such a refusal can be a matter proper to be considered by the jury, then it can be proper only where plaintiff's refusal is an unreasonable one.

It is not error to refuse to order an examination of the person in the absence of any showing that plaintiff had previously refused such examination, or that it had been requested of him.

Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Finlayson, 16 Neb. 578, 49 Am. Rep. 724, 20 N. W. 860.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the opinion of the honorable court of civil appeals we copy the following statement of the facts as found by that court:

"This is a suit for damages caused by the plaintiff's falling into a well dug, operated, and controlled by the Austin & Northwestern Railroad Company. There was a jury trial, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $2,000, and the defendants have appealed.

"The testimony shows that the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, since the accident occurred, has succeeded to all the rights and liabilities of the Austin & Northwestern Railroad Company, and, if one company is liable, both are. The accident occurred at night, and the verdict of the jury involves a finding that the Austin & Northwestern Railroad Company was guilty of negligence in failing to keep the well properly covered, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, as charged in the answer of the defendants, and that, as a direct result of the defendants' negligence, the plaintiff was injured to the extent of $2,000. The record contains evidence sufficient to support all of these findings, and therefore the objections to the verdict are overruled.

"The plaintiff charged in his petition that, as a result of his falling in the well, he was permanently injured in his back, sides, kidneys, hips, hip joints, spine, bladder, stomach, and bowels. Within proper time the defendants made a motion, stating that the plaintiff had been examined by two physicians of his own selection, who would testify in his behalf; that he had not been examined by physicians selected by the defendants, or by any other physicians; and requested the trial court to appoint a committee of two or more competent physicians, and compel the plaintiff to submit to an examination by the physicians so appointed, in order that the defendants might have the benefit of the testimony of such physicians. In support of the motion it was shown that the plaintiff had refused to consent to the appointment of such committee and to the examination requested. The court overruled the motion, and that ruling is assigned as error."

The plaintiff in error asserts that it had the right at the trial to have the court appoint a committee of physicians to make a physical examination of the defendant in error to qualify them to testify before the jury as to the injuries received by Cluck, and their effect. The right to have such examination is supported by the greater number of decisions of the courts of the states of this Union and by the text writers. The following cases support the right asserted: Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Childress, 82 Ga. 719, 3 L. R. A. 808, 14 Am. St. Rep. 189, 9 S. E. 602; Shepard v. Missouri P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 629, 55 Am. Rep. 390; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hill, 90 Ala. 71, 9 L. R. A. 442, 24 Am. St. Rep. 764, 8 So. 90; White v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 61 Wis. 536, 50 Am. Rep. 154, 21 N. W. 524; Atchison, T. & S. F. Baily, 37 Ohio St. 104; Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co. 21 Wash. 119, 46 L. R. A. 153, 75 Am. St. Rep. 821, 57 Pac. 367; Wanck v. Winona, 78 Minn. 98, 46 L. R. A. 448, 79 Am. St. Rep. 354, 80 N. W. 851; Graves v. Battle Creek, 95 Mich. 266, 19 L. R. A. 641, 35 Am. St. Rep. 561, 54 N. W. 757; South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 54 L. R. A. 396, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 60 N. E. 271; Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (N. D.) 95 N. W. 153. The supreme court of Missouri first held that the courts had no power to compel a party to a civil case to submit to a physical examination. Loyd v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 53 Mo. 515. After vacillating and qualifying their decisions in 64 L. R. A.

various particulars, that court, in Shepard v. Missouri P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 629, 55 Am. Rep. 390, announced the doctrine contended for by the railroad company in this case. The decisions of the supreme court of the state of Indiana cover all phases of this question from an absolute denial to the assertion of the right in a qualified sense as announced in the case of South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 54 L. R. A. 396, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 60 N. E. 271. That case has been since greatly qualified, and their decisions are in such conflict on the question that they are of little value as authority. The case of Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Childress, 82 Ga. 719, 3 L. R. A. 808, 14 Am. St. Rep. 189, 9 S. E. 602, rests upon the following statutory provision: "Every court has power . . . to control, in furtherance of justice, the conduct of its officers and all other persons connected with a judicial proceeding before it, in every matter appertaining thereto." This statute authorized the examination in the state of Georgia; hence that case is not authority upon the question of power under the common law. The authorities above stated, as well as many cases which we have not cited fully sustain the conclusion of the supreme court of Indiana in the case of South Bend v. Turner, which is embodied in the following propositions: "(1) That trial courts have the power to order the medical examination by experts of the injured parts of a plaintiff who is seeking to recover damages therefor; (2) that a defendant has no absolute right to demand the enforcement of such an order, but the motion therefor is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court; (3) that the exercise of such discretion is reviewable on appeal, and correctible in cases of abuse; (4) that the examination should be applied for and made before entering upon the trial, and should be ordered and conducted under the direction of the court, whenever it fairly appears that the ends of justice require a more certain ascertainment of important facts, which can only be disclosed or fully elucidated by such an examination, and such an examination may be made without danger to the plaintiffs life or health or the infliction of serious pain; (5) that the refusal of the motion, when the circumstances appearing in the record present a reasonably clear case for the examination under the rules stated, is such an abuse of discretion in the trial court as will operate to reverse a judgment for the plaintiff; (6) that such an order may be enforced, not by punishment as for a contempt, but by delaying or dismissing the proceeding."

Counsel for the defendant in error deny the authority of the court to require the plaintiff in this case to submit to a physical examination by a committee to be appointed by the court, in which they are supported by these authorities: Parker v. Enslow, 102 Ill. 279, 40 Am. Rep. 588; McQuigan v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 50, 14 L. R. A. 466, 26 Am. St. Rep. 507, 29 N. E. 235; Stack v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 177 Mass. 155, 52 L. R. A. 328, 83 Am. St. Rep. 269, 58 N. E. 686; Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Rice, 144 Ill. 232, 33 N. E. 951; Roberts v. Ogdensburgh & L. C. R. Co. 29 Hun, 154; Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 35 L. ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000. The question has been before this court in these cases: International & G. N. R. Co. v. Underwood, 64 Tex. 463; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Johnson, 72 Tex. 95, 10 S. W. 325; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Norfleet, 78 Tex. 321, 14 S. W. 703; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Butcher, 83 Tex. 309, 18 S. W. 583. In each case this court declined to decide the question now before us; therefore it is practically a new one, which we must determine by the weight of authority, or upon the sounder reasoning, as derived from the provisions of our Constitution, the statutes, and the common law.

After citing a number of cases to support their decision in the case of South Bend v. Turner, the supreme court of Indiana said: "These cases assert the doctrine that courts are instituted by the state to administer impartial justice to contending parties. In such contests it is the duty of the court to bestow upon the litigants equal and exact justice. This cannot be done without the court first obtaining the exact and full truth concerning the matters in controversy. Hence from this duty of the court to dispense exact justice is essentially implied all power necessary to its performance, which includes the power to make subservient to its order all persons and things that will afford the most reliable evidence." That honorable court gives no source from which it is claimed the courts derive the power to compel a party to submit to examination, but asserts that the duty to administer justice implies "all power necessary to its performance, which includes the power to make subservient to its order all persons and things that will afford the most reliable evidence." If this proposition be well founded, then, indeed, the power of a court over the persons of parties who apply to it for adjustment of their rights is unlimited. This statement of judicial power is too broad to be accepted as correct, but that line of decisions cannot be sustained by less comprehensive authority. The point we wish to call attention to is that the court does not claim to derive its authority from either the common law, the Constitution of that state, or from the statutes of Indiana. Comment upon South Bend v. Turner, 64 L. R. A.

Bend v. Turner is equivalent to a comment upon the other cases, because it is, perhaps, the best reasoned of all, and fairly represents them.

Article 5, § 8, of the Constitution of this state defines the jurisdiction and powers of the district courts in the following language: "The district court shall have original jurisdiction . . . of all suits, complaints, or pleas whatever, without regard to any distinction between law and equity, when the matter in controversy shall be valued at or amount to $500 exclusive of interest;" and the legislature has defined the jurisdiction of the district courts in the same language. The common law was adopted by the Congress of the Republic by enactment embraced in the following article 3258 of the Revised Statutes of 1895: "The common law of England (so far as it is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of this state) shall, together with such Constitution and laws, be the rule of decision, and shall continue in force until altered or repealed by the legislature." Whatever may be the powers of courts of other states, there can be no doubt that the courts of Texas must look to the Constitution of this state, the enactments of the legislature, and the common law for their authority to proceed as requested in this case; and, if the authority did not exist at common law, and has not been conferred by the Constitution nor by the statutes of this state, then no court in Texas has the power to force any citizen to submit to a physical examination under such circumstances. In the case of Messner v. Giddings, 65 Tex. 309, a judgment of the district court, which had assumed to exercise authority over the estate of minors, was under review. It was claimed that the authority was given by the Constitution, wherein it conferred on the district court all the powers of courts of equity. Speaking by Judge Stayton, the supreme court said: "If it is claimed that in the court, as a court of equity, under that clause [of the Constitution], the power existed, it must be replied that the district court, whether as a court of law or a court of equity, had only such power as the Constitution gave it. There is no such thing as the inherent power of a court, if by that be meant a power which a court may exercise without a law authorizing it. That clause of the Constitution empowered district courts to exercise all the power given, whether the procedure necessary to accomplish that purpose be such as pertains to a court of law or a court of equity; but it in no manner conferred upon such courts the power to exercise any and every power which at any time may have been exercised by courts of chancery in England or elsewhere." In Union P. R. Co.

v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 35 L. ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000, Judge Gray said: "No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person free from all restraint or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law. . . . So far as the books within our reach show, no order to inspect the body of a party in a personal action appears to have been made, or even moved for, in any of the English courts of common law, at any period of their history." Not one of the cases which declare the existence of the right cites a case from the English courts. To this Justice Brewer, in the dissenting opinion filed on behalf of himself and Justice Brown of that court, replied: "The silence of common-law authorities upon the question in cases of this kind proves little or nothing. The number of actions to recover damages in early days was, compared with later times, limited; and very few of those difficult questions as to the nature and extent of the injuries, which now form an important part of such litigations, were then presented to the courts. If an examination was asked, doubtless it was conceded without objection, as one of those matters the right to which was beyond dispute." The reply of Justice Brewer does not answer the argument of Justice Gray. The better rule was laid down in Russell v. Devon County, 2 T. R. 673, where it was sought to maintain the action by argument from necessity and by reason of the analogy to other actions which were authorized by statute; but Justice Ashurst said in that case: "It is a strong presumption that that which never has been done cannot by law be done at all. And it is admitted that no such action as the present has ever been brought, though the occasion must have frequently happened. But it has been said that there is a principle of law on which this action might be maintained, namely, that, where an individual sustains an injury by the neglect or default of another, the law gives him a remedy. But there is another general principle of law which is more applicable to this case,—that it is better that an individual should sustain an injury than that the public should suffer an inconvenience." We are of the opinion that the fact that no such examination was ever authorized by a court at common law in England is conclusive that those courts had no authority under the common law to make such order. Judge Brewer's suggestion that all persons who were ordered by the common-law courts to be examined must have submitted without contention is contrary to the record of those courts, which show a stubborn resistance by the English people to every encroachment upon their personal liberty. It is more consistent with the facts to presume that lawyers and courts recognize that no such power existed; therefore there was no attempt to secure the examination. In his dissenting opinion Judge Brewer said: "Certainly the power of the courts and of the common-law courts to compel a personal examination was in many cases often exercised and unchallenged. Indeed, wherever the interests of justice seemed to require such an examination, it was ordered. The instances of this are familiar, and in those instances the proceedings were, as a rule, adverse to the party whose examination was ordered." The learned judge does not cite a case to support his statement of the frequency of similar proceedings in the common-law courts of England, but we presume he refers to three exceptional cases mentioned by Judge Gray: First. In divorce proceedings upon the ground of impotency the court might order the examination of either party, but the exercise of this power "rests upon the interest which the public, as well as the parties, have in the question of upholding or dissolving the marriage state, and upon the necessity of such evidence to enable the court to exercise its jurisdiction, and is derived from the civil and canon law as administered in spiritual and ecclesiastical courts not proceeding in any respect according to the course of the common law." Second. In case a woman was convicted of a capital crime, the court might order an examination of her to determine whether she was quick with child, to prevent taking the life of the unborn infant. Third. If a widow claimed to be with child, the heir to the estate might cause her to be examined to ascertain whether she was or not with child, to protect the heirs against the fraud of having a false heir presented to inherit the estate. "But the learning and research of the counsel for the plaintiff in error have failed to produce an instance of its ever having been considered in any part of the United States, as suited to the habits and conditions of the people." Comments in quotation marks are from the main opinion in Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, and furnish complete answers to the arguments based upon the exceptional cases. The exceptions are the sole reliance of all cases which uphold the authority of the court to order such an examination for a precedent showing that the right existed and was exercised by common-law courts. They do not establish the fact, and the answers made by Judge Gray in the main opinion are so conclusive as to leave no doubt that in truth and in fact no such practice ever prevailed in the common-law courts of England.

Since the common law furnishes no precedent for such proceeding, we must look to our Constitution and statutes for authority in our courts to order the examination. The provisions of our Constitution and of our statutes with regard to the practice and jurisdiction of courts are antagonistic to the spirit and purpose of such proceedings. To make sure of the immunity of the person of citizens from improper interference by any authority, the convention which framed our Constitution adopted, as a part of the Bill of Rights, this § 9 of article 1: "The people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions from all unreasonable seizures or searches, and no warrant to search any place or to seize any person or thing shall issue without describing them as near as may be, nor without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation." Whether, under this guaranty of immunity from interference with the person, the legislature might authorize the physical examination of a party to a suit, is not before us for determination; but we are of the opinion that our Constitution secures every citizen of this state against any seizure or search of his person which is not plainly authorized by some law of this state. In organizing the district courts the legislature has with great particularity prescribed what its powers shall be, and the writs and processes which may be issued. Among other things which may be done to secure testimony for the trial is the propounding of interrogatories by one party to the other for the purpose of getting a full and complete statement of his cause of action or ground of defense. By this method a person or corporation sued for damages for personal injury may secure a complete statement of all the symptoms and a description of all the external injuries for which compensation is sought. It has been held by this court that the right to examine the opposite party by interrogatories is a substitute for a bill of discovery, which does not exist in our practice. Cronin v. Gay, 20 Tex. 460; Cargill v. Kountze Bros. 86 Tex. 386, 24 L. R. A. 183, 40 Am. St. Rep. 853, 22 S. W. 1015, 25 S. W. 13. The argument that the examination may be ordered as upon a bill of discovery is fully met by the fact that we have no such proceeding.

The common-law proceeding most analogous to physical examination is the right of view, by which a party sought to have his witnesses examine the premises to qualify them to testify. "There are but two such cases reported in the English Reports. Newman v. Tate, 1 Arnold, 244, and Turquand v. Strand Union, 8 Dowl. 201." The request was refused in both cases. Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford. It is significant that the legislature of this state, after adopting the common law of England, within a short time after those cases were decided, repealed the right of view by this article 1451, Rev. Stat. 1895: "All vouchers, views, essoins, and also trials by wager of battle and wager of law, shall stand repealed." Thus we see that the legislature has not only failed to provide for a physical examination of parties, but has actually repealed from the common law in this state the only proceeding that bore the slightest resemblance to it.

The claim that the duty rests upon each court to administer exact justice between parties is not supported by any authority, nor is it consistent with the general law of this state nor with the common law upon these questions. It is the province of a court to try issues formed by the pleadings of parties according to the rules of procedure, to furnish all process authorized by law to secure evidence, and to administer justice according to the evidence adduced on the trial. The common law and our statutes provide all of the means which courts are authorized to use in the administration of justice between parties, and no court has authority to originate and introduce a new process to enable parties to secure evidence in support of their cases. A court with power "to make subservient to its order all persons and things that will afford the most reliable evidence" would be an anomaly in constitutional republican government. It is better for the common good that courts should be restrained within prescribed limits than that judges be invested with unlimited and irresponsible power over the persons and property of the citizen. In this state, by our Constitution and the common law, the person of a citizen is so sacred that an officer may not disregard the right of personal freedom even to satisfy an execution by levying upon property which is on the person of the defendant. To show the fallacy of the claim, made by those that uphold the right of physical examination, we will suppose A has instituted a proceeding against B for damages on account of personal injuries inflicted by B upon the plaintiff; and the defendant asks that a committee be appointed to examine the plaintiff as to his injuries that witnesses may be furnished to testify of his condition. The court, in order "to administer exact justice," orders the examination, takes forcible control of the person of plaintiff, and makes an examination, produces evidence, and at the trial a judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for damages. When execution issues, the officer calls upon the defendant for satisfaction; but, with a valuable diamond in his shirt front and $10,000 in his pocket, the defendant defies the officer to make a levy. The court would have made the person of the plaintiff "subservient to its order" to enable defendant to have an examination of plaintiff's person, and to use the private parts of it as evidence, but would, if called upon, enjoin the invasion of the person of defendant to satisfy its judgment. This would be the practical working of the doctrine contended for. Many illustrations might be given of court proceedings which would show the fallacy of the claim that courts in Texas have power to order a person to submit his or her person to examination in civil suits; but we feel it is unnecessary. It is sufficient to say for the courts of Texas that the authority to order such an examination and force a party to submit to it is found neither in common law nor in the statute laws of this state, and therefore does not exist and cannot be exercised by the courts of Texas.

The plaintiff in error contends that new conditions have arisen in connection with this class of litigation, which make it necessary for the courts to adopt this method so as to enable the defendants to secure necessary evidence. In support of this contention counsel for the plaintiff in error has injected into his argument matter which is wholly irrelevant in this court, and might be more appropriately addressed to the legislature. We cannot better express our views upon this matter than to quote from the opinion of Chief Justice Holmes of the supreme court of Massachusetts in the case of Stack v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 177 Mass. 158, 52 L. R. A. 328, 83 Am. St. Rep. 269, 58 N. E. 687: "We appreciate the ease with which, if we were careless or ignorant of precedent, we might deem it enlightened to assume that power. We do not forget the continuous process of developing the law that goes on through the courts in the form of deduction, or deny that in a clear case it might be possible even to break away from a line of decisions in favor of some rule generally admitted to be based upon a deeper insight into the present wants of society. But the improvements made by the courts are made almost invariably by very slow degrees and by very short steps. Their general duty is not to change, but to work out, the principles already sanctioned by the practice of the past. No one supposes that a judge is at liberty to decide with sole reference even to his strongest convictions of policy and right. His duty in general is to develop the principles which he finds with such consistency as he may be able to attain." It may be true that evil practices by plaintiffs in these cases have grown up, but it is equally true that to establish such a rule of practice would place in the power of defendants in damage cases the means of annoying plaintiffs, and of intimidating the most worthy of the complainants in such suits.

At the trial of the cause, after the testimony of physicians who had treated Cluck for his injuries had been introduced, and Cluck had himself testified as to his injuries and the circumstances under which he received them, the attorney for the railroad company propounded to him this question: "Are you willing, in the presence of some reputable person, or by yourself, and subsequently to be supported by your affidavit that it is urine voided by you into a vessel which is absolutely free from any foreign matter, to furnish a specimen of your urine, voided under the circumstance stated, to a committee of competent physicians to be appointed by the court, so that an analysis of that urine may be made?" To which counsel for plaintiff objected on the ground that same was irrelevant and immaterial, and a useless consumption of time, which objection was by the court sustained. The same objections apply to this procedure as to that which sought a physical examination of the plaintiff. The court could not enforce such an order without taking possession of the person of plaintiff and exercising coercive power to compel him to perform the act. For the reasons before given, we hold that the objection was properly sustained.

The plaintiff, Cluck, being on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, and having testified of his injuries and their effect, the railroad company propounded to him the following question: "I will ask you whether or not a proposition has been made to you to have the court, without the suggestion of counsel for defendants, appoint a committee or board of skilled physicians to examine you physically with a view of ascertaining the nature and extent of the ailments of which you complain and their cause?" To this question counsel for plaintiff objected on the ground "that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that the purpose of it was to prejudice the plaintiff's case before the jury; that the matter had already been ruled upon by the court, and could not again be inquired into; and that the right to decline to submit himself to a physical examination by physicians to be appointed by the court was a legal right." The objections were sustained by the court. In this ruling the court erred. The reason for refusing a physical examination of the plaintiff is not that the defendants are not entitled to have the benefit of the evidence, but because the court has no power to force the plaintiff to submit to such an examination. He has a right to submit or refuse, but, in case he should refuse, the defendants are entitled to have that fact go to the jury to be considered by them in determining upon the credibility and sufficiency of the testimony upon which he seeks to recover. Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 255, 35 L. ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000. If the jury should believe that the refusal showed a purpose to conceal the truth, they might take the fact into account in weighing the evidence. If a satisfactory reason should be given for the refusal, and other evidence were sufficient, the refusal would not defeat a recovery. The suggestion that the court might enforce its order by refusing to submit the case to a jury is not sound, for in this state a party is entitled to a trial by jury whenever he produces evidence which shows prima facie a right to recover. In case of unreasonable refusal to allow examination, the court could and should set aside

It is claimed by the defendant in error that these matters occurred in the presence of the jury, who were fully informed as to the plaintiff's refusal. That is true, but the action of the court had the effect to take it from the jury, which would neutralize any effect that the occurrence, in the presence of the jury, might have had upon their minds. It was equivalent to telling the jury that it was not to be considered by them. The defendant in error would get no benefit from the fact that the question was asked and objected to in their presence by the plaintiff's counsel.

For the error indicated, the judgments of the District Court and of the Court of Civil Appeals are reversed, and the cause is remanded.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

C. F. WALL
v.

NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(52 W. Va. 485.)

- *1. Under § 8 of article 11 of the state Constitution, rolling stock and all other movable property of a railroad company or corporation are subject to process of attachment, where the attachment is applicable, as well as to ordinary execution.
2. The right under attachment of the garnisher as to the garnishee does not, by garnishment, rise higher than the right of the principal defendant as to the garnishee. When the right of such defendant is subject to a right of the garnishee under a contract between them, the right of the garnisher is likewise subject to the right of the garnishee.

3. One railroad company has an agreement with another by which loaded cars of the one are to be received at connecting points by the other, and hauled over its line to the destination of load of the car, and then be reloaded with other freight by the receiving company on its line, and carried over its line, and returned loaded to the railroad of the owner of the cars; the receiving company compensating the owning company for such use of the cars. Such cars cannot be seized under an attachment against the company owning the cars, so as to defeat the rights under such arrangement or contract of the company receiving and entitled to so use the cars, and a garnishment of the receiving company cannot affect its rights under such arrangements by reason of its possession of such cars.

4. A railroad car sent loaded with

NOTE.—Attachment or garnishment of foreign railroad cars.

This specific question has arisen in but three other cases besides WALL v. NORFOLK & W. R. Co. and CONNERT v. QUINCY, O. & K. C. R. Co., and in one only of the three is the question treated from the standpoint in which it is viewed in the cases above reported.

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Chicago & M. L. S. R. Co. (1878) 1 Ill. App. 899, it was held that public policy forbade the garnishment of a railroad company for freight cars in its possession belonging to a foreign railroad company when the circumstances of the possession were that the railroads of the two companies had connecting lines, and, at the time of the service of the writ, running arrangements existed between said companies, such as are usually adopted by connecting lines of railroad throughout the country, by which, instead of unloading and transferring their freight from the cars of the one to the cars of the other at the point of connection, each received from the other the cars loaded with freight, and hauled them to the place of destination on its own line of road, and, after discharging the freight, returned the cars as soon as possible in the due course of business. In support of its opinion that, although the language of the attachment act was sufficiently broad to permit the attachment or garnishment of foreign railroad cars, considerations of public policy would have the effect to limit the application of the act to a much more restricted extent than the language employed would seem to import, the court says as follows: "If the statute [attachment act] should be allowed the operation sought to be given it in the present case, it would, beyond doubt, very seriously interfere with the transportation of freights by railroad according to the method which experience seems to have developed as the speediest, most economical, and best. Our railroads extend into all parts of the country, and traverse all of the various states of the Union, forming one freight from another state into this state, and to be returned loaded to the former state in the transaction of interstate commerce, cannot be levied upon under an attachment in this state; nor will another railroad company having such cars in its possession in the process of carrying on interstate commerce be liable to garnishment by reason of its possession received from another company, against which an attachment was issued. This is because of the commerce clause of the national Constitution and the Interstate Commerce Act of Congress.

great and complicated system of internal communication, so that, for most of the practical purposes of transportation, each railroad, instead of constituting a separate line, is only a part or member of this general system. Cars may be loaded at any point upon one line and transported without unloading to the point of destination on any other railroad, however distant. It can not be doubted that this method of conducting the carrying business of the country greatly subserves the public convenience, and should not be interfered with for the mere prosecution of individual and private ends, except for very strong and controlling reasons. If a car, as soon as it passes from the line of the road of its owner onto the line of another company becomes subject to process of garnishment, no railroad company owing debts can safely allow its cars to pass beyond its own line for any purpose; nor can any company, without exposing itself to the annoyance of continual litigations between other parties, and in which it has no interest, receive the loaded cars of other companies for transportation to their place of destination. The doctrine contended for . . . would make each railroad company an agency for the collection of the debts and liabilities of every other railroad company with whose track its line of road is immediately or remotely connected. The railroad companies would be compelled either to abandon the present economical and expeditious system of transportation or carry it on at the risk of being continually drawn into controversies between third parties, and of being exposed to expensive and vexatious litigations in which they have no interest."

The other two cases are decided upon widely different grounds, and, aside from the fact that foreign railroad cars were attached in each instance, they can not be considered authorities in favor of the doctrine that such a practice is not inimical to interstate commerce, as it is apparent that they were decided without a consideration of that question.

The question in Humphreys v. Hopkins (1889) 81 Cal. 551, 6 L. R. A. 792, 15 Am. St. Rep. 76, 22 Pac. 892, was whether a receiver appointed in a foreign jurisdiction to take possession of the property of a railroad corporation, and carry on its business, and who, in pursuance of his authority as such receiver, has taken a freight car into his actual possession, within the jurisdiction of the court by which he was appointed, can hold the car against the claim of the citizen of another state, who, upon finding it there, caused it to be attached as security for his just demand against the railroad company. In holding that the right of the attaching creditor was superior to that of the receiver the court stated that the latter had no right to sue in another state except on the ground of comity, and that in the case at bar the court, in justice to the citizens of its own state, would not extend the principle of comity so far as to award the property in question to the representatives of creditors residing in other states, who were seeking to hold it for their own exclusive benefit.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cleon Moore, Joseph I. Doran, and Marshall McCormick, for appellant:

The contract set up in the answer is certain and clear, and will be enforced.

As the garnishee is but a stakeholder, with no interest in the main controversy whatever, the pleadings of the garnishee are be attached as security for his just demand against the railroad company. In holding that the right of the attaching creditor was superior to that of the receiver the court stated that the latter had no right to sue in another state except on the ground of comity, and that in the case at bar the court, in justice to the citizens of its own state, would not extend the principle of comity so far as to award the property in question to the representatives of creditors residing in other states, who were seeking to hold it for their own exclusive benefit.

To this decision there is a dissenting opinion, concurred in by another judge, also, in which the theory is advanced that, the freight car having been in the possession of the receiver, within the jurisdiction of the court appointing him, he thereby acquired a special property in the car, as the hand and instrument of the court, which could not be interfered with by attachment in another jurisdiction.

The question in Buffalo Coal Co. v. Rochester & State Line R. Co. (1880) 8 W. N. C. 126, was whether the rolling stock of a railroad company was to be treated as realty or personality in regard to being subject to execution and attachment. In this case a Pennsylvania coal company sued a New York railroad company, in the latter state, for a balance due for coal, and by foreign attachment seized twenty-one freight cars belonging to the railroad company, found in Pennsylvania. It was contended that the rolling stock of a railroad company is to be treated as realty, and as not subject to seizure upon attachment, the remedy of a creditor being by process of sequestration; but the court stated that while that was formerly the rule, the legislature, in 1870, expressly provided that all property of a railroad company, excepting real estate held in fee, should be subject to seizure and sale. And the cars were held properly attached, the court stating that process of sequestration against the railroad company was out of the question, it being a foreign corporation, having no portion of its road within the state, and no officer or agent upon whom service could be made and that to quash the attachment would be to deny a right which, if the defendant were a natural person, would be too clear for question. The court also pointed out that no obligation to hold otherwise existed on the ground of comity, because the rule in New York had been finally settled to be that the rolling stock of a railroad company is personal property, which can be levied upon and sold as such.

The cars of a foreign railroad company cannot, in West Virginia, be reached by process of attachment or garnishment, because they are necessary to enable the owning company and the holding company to discharge their duties to the public, and are consequently exempt from such process.

The Norfolk & Western had the right, under its contract with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to use the car under the agreement set up in the answer.

Any construction of the attachment laws of West Virginia which would have the effect of laying a burden upon interstate commerce, by preventing the Norfolk & Western Railway Company from receiving the benefit of its contract for the use of the car, would not only nullify the contract, but would be a burden upon, and a regulation of, commerce between the states, such as would fall within the inhibition of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

If the Pennsylvania road had any interest in this car, that interest, whatever it was, was reached by the garnishment.

Garnishment reaches only such rights as the owner himself could assert, but it reaches every right which he could assert.

Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Paine, 29 Gratt. 502; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Chicago & M. L. S. R. Co. 1 Ill. App. 399.

Garnishment presupposes some sort of bailment to exist.

Bailment means the transfer of possession without a transfer of ownership.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 733.

The reversion may be garnished although the bailment protects the property from seizure.

There is a wide distinction between the kind of bailment which exists while a car is occupied transporting goods, and the kind of bailment which exists after the car is unloaded.

The Pennsylvania road could seize its empty car unless a contract gave the Norfolk & Western the right to retain possession.

A usage could not entitle the Norfolk & Western to hold the car, as against its owner, while it was standing empty on the siding.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

C. F. Wall brought an attachment in equity against the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in the circuit court of Jefferson county to recover damages for some cattle killed and others injured while being carried over the line of the defendant in the state of Pennsylvania, and sued out an attachment, and levied the same on a freight car of said company found at Shepherds-town, in Jefferson county,—the car being in the possession of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company,—and served the attachment also on the latter company, as a garnishee, on account of its having the car in its possession. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company is a foreign corporation. That company did not appear in the suit; but the Norfolk & Western company filed an answer, which stands as taken for true and uncontroverted as to its statement of facts. That answer, after stating that both railroad companies are common carriers of goods by railroad, states: "That at the time of the issue and service of the writs of attachment herein upon the garnishee, and ever since that time, an arrangement and understanding existed between the defendant and garnishee companies, according to the universal custom in such cases among railroad lines throughout the United States in the management of their freight business, by which, instead of unloading and transferring their freight from the cars of one company to the cars of another at a point of connection, each company receives the loaded cars of the other from and throughout connecting lines or direct, hauls them to the place of destination on its own line, and, after discharging the freight, under the implied agreement to return them, as soon as and when practicable, in the due course of business, reloaded with freight, to some point, on or near or reached by the line of the company owning them. That under the arrangement and understanding existing as aforesaid, the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, the garnishee, had the right to use in its business the cars aforesaid; the cars owned by it while on the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company being similarly in current and constant use of the Pennsylvania Railroad at all times, and each company paying the other by wheelage or mileage of such cars.

The method aforesaid of receiving and returning railroad cars of other lines by railroads facilitates traffic, and is a great accommodation to the shipping public, and has become a part of the general system of freight transportation throughout the United States. That it would be practically impossible for the garnishee to carry on its business with arrangements and understanding of this character with other lines, and that the garnishee, under the arrangements and understanding aforesaid, is entitled to hold and use as aforesaid the cars for said business free and discharged of, and without interference from, attachment or garnishment proceedings herein, and that the maintenance of such proceedings would nullify the rights of the garnishee with the defendant under the arrangement and understanding aforesaid, and interfere seriously with the proper movement of traffic and accommodation of the shipping public." The car levied upon had been loaded beyond Hagerstown, Maryland, with sacks of patent plaster, consigned to Shepherdstown, and when levied upon was standing upon a side track, loaded with plaster, to be delivered in said town, according to said bill, and, according to the answer, was being unloaded when the garnishee was served with the attachment. The case resulted in a decision by the circuit court holding the attachment and garnishment valid, and a decree was rendered against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company for $432.25 on account of its liability by reason of its possession of said car, and that company has appealed to this court.

The question is raised, Is this car subject to attachment? Upon the question whether the property of a quasi public corporation, essential to its operation, is so liable, there is much conflict of authority, as will appear from the authorities cited. Brady v. Johnson, 75 Md. 445, 20 L. R. A. 737, 26 Atl. 49; Gooch v. McGee, 83 N. C. 59, 35 Am. Rep. 558; Ammant v. New Alexandria & P. Turnp. Road Co. 15 Am. Dec. 593, note, 595 (13 Serg. & R. 210). All admit that the property of a purely private corporation, not serving the general public, though ever so essential to its use, is liable to execution; but, as to those corporations created to carry on business valuable to the public, such as a railroad corporation, which is a common carrier, this conflict of cases exists. On the one side, it is said that such a corporation would be disabled from performing its public duties if its property essential in so doing could be seized and sold away from it, and thus the public would suffer great harm. On the other side, to exempt so much property cripples the power of the law to enforce payment of debts, and exempts from its scope a great mass of property. If we say that such property is not wholly free from subjection to debt, for the reason that it may be reached by sequestration of earnings or by the sale of the whole property, the reply is that the ordinary and ready remedy by execution upon judgment is abortive, and that relief is practically denied to small debts. Between these adverse interests the courts have greatly conflicted. All the cases say that, unless statute authorizes, the franchise itself cannot be sold under execution; and the major part of legal authority says, also, that property of such corporations essential to the exercise of such franchise is also not subject to execution. In Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 24 How. 257, 16 L. ed. 635, the United States Supreme Court held that a corporate franchise to take tolls on a canal cannot be sold under fieri facias, unless authorized by a statute of the state granting the incorporation, and also that the lands or works essential to the enjoyment of the franchise cannot be separated from it and sold under a fieri facias, so as to destroy or impair the value of the franchise. So in East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. ed. 136, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869, it was held that a railroad right of way could not be sold to any one not owning the franchise, under an execution. Elliott on Railroads, vol. 2, § 520, says: "The franchise of a railroad company, and corporate property essential to the enjoyment of the franchise, are not subject to sale on execution unless the legislature authorizes or assents to the transfer. But locomotives, cars, and other personal property held by the corporation, if not in actual use in the operation of the road, are held by some authorities to be subject to sale on execution: and there seems to be no reason why property of a railroad corporation, not essential to the enjoyment of its franchise, should not be subjected to the payment of its debts." Amid the conflict, I have concluded that the law is properly stated in 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 620, as follows: "In the case of corporations, such as railroads or bridge companies, which, though not strictly public corporations, are created to serve public purposes, and are charged with public duties, such property as is necessary to enable them to discharge their duties to the public and effectuate the objects of their incorporation is not, according to the weight of authority, apart from statutory provision, subject to execution at law. But the property of a quasi public corporation, not necessary or not used for the purposes which called the corporation into being, is not exempt from seizure and sale under execution." There are some cases which, while admitting that a franchise or things indispensable to its use cannot be levied on under execution, yet hold that rolling stock is liable to execution. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Boney, 117 Ind. 501, 3 L. R. A. 435, 20 N. E. 432. It thus seems that the franchise itself and everything pertaining to it, essential to its operation, are exempt from execution, and thus the matter turns upon the question whether railroad rolling stock is so essential. I do not think that that question is tested by whether the property is indispensable in the use of the franchise, but that, as put by the case of Brady v. Johnson, 75 Md. 445, 20 L. R. A. 737, 26 Atl. 49, if it is of a nature to be of practical use in the operation of the franchise. Rolling stock is essential, next to the track or right of way,—in fact, equally with them. True, rolling stock taken can be replaced, but often this is beyond the ability of the company, and we can easily imagine cases where seizure of rolling stock would stop the performance of public duties. So I think the common law exempts such rolling stock from execution. The convention which framed our Constitution must have been of this opinion when it inserted in article 11, § 8, the provision: "The rolling stock and all other movable property belonging to any railroad company or corporation in this state shall be considered personal property, and shall be liable to execution and sale in the same manner as the personal property of individuals." It is argued that this section can have no application to foreign corporations, but only to those chartered by this state. It is a principle that no state can, and therefore no state is presumed to intend to, legislate as to persons or things outside of its territory, and I would be inclined to concur—did at first concur—in that view; but that would establish a difference between the property of foreign and home corporations, found within the territory of the state. And in this connection we must remember that it is a proposition disputed by no one that a state having property of a nonresident within its territory may appropriate it to satisfy demands of her citizens. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565. So I do not see but that the state Constitution would make all rolling stock of a railroad company, whether foreign or domestic, liable to execution when found within the state. If that provision of our Constitution had no application to property owned by a foreign corporation, then this car would not be leviable; but I think the Constitution applies to it.

It is said that this provision of the Constitution does not apply, for the reason that 64 L. R. A.

it makes rolling stock liable to execution only, and not to attachment, as execution is only the end of the law, issuing only upon a judgment, whereas an attachment goes at the opening of the suit, and is only a means to compel the appearance of the defendant. Such was the object of the ancient process of foreign attachment, according to the custom of London; but the modern doctrine is that attachment is not for the purpose of bringing the defendant into court, and that its object is to give the plaintiff execution against the thing attached,—to seize it, and create a lien upon it conditional upon the rendition of judgment. In this state, upon judgment, the order is not for another execution, but for sale under the attachment. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 187; 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. 395; 1 Shinn, Attachm. § 2. I do not think that it was the intention of the convention to make railroad rolling stock liable to ultimate execution, and deny its liability to attachment, as attachment would often be the only process available for prompt seizure to answer ultimate judgment. The object of the section was to do away with the law exempting rolling stock and other movable properties of railroads and other corporations, and not to discriminate between writs of process.

Is the Norfolk & Western Company liable as garnishee, under the circumstances of the case? It had possession of this car under the circumstances stated in the answer. We must look at the character of this possession. The garnishee held the car under "an arrangement and understanding between the defendant and the garnishee companies, according to the universal custom in such cases among railroad lines throughout the United States in the management of their freight business, by which, instead of unloading and transferring their freight from the cars of one company to the cars of another at a point of connection, each company receives the loaded cars of the other, from and throughout connecting lines or direct, hauls them to the place of destination on its own line, and, after discharging the freight, under the implied agreement to return them as and when practicable, in due course of business, reloaded with freight, to some point on or near, or reached by, the line of the company owning them." Here is a contract between the two companies, vesting the Norfolk & Western Company with a valuable right, which it could carry into effect by reason of its possession of the car, but could not if it was seized and taken from it. The Pennsylvania Company had got the load of plaster from some point on its line, carried it in this car to Hagerstown, where its line connected with the line of the Norfolk & Western, and the latter took up the car and hauled it to Shepherdstown; and, in consideration of so doing, it had the important right of loading that car, after discharge of the plaster from it, with freight at some point on its own line, hauling it over its own line, earning compensation thereby, and turning it over to the Pennsylvania Company for further transportation. The answer says it paid wheelage for this right. It is needless to endeavor to impress the fact that the use of a car to a railroad company to carry on its business is a valuable use. In short, the garnishee company had a subsistent contract for the possession and use of this car, and it had executed that contract, so far as was to its disadvantage, by haulage to the place to which the plaster was consigned, but had not yet enjoyed that part of the contract most beneficial to it, by loading it with freight on some part of its line, and earning compensation for its carriage. It had the right to keep the car until it returned it, loaded, to the Pennsylvania Company at Hagerstown, and it could not be levied upon and taken from it to defeat that right, because of principles of law that are beyond all question. What is such law? Drake, Attachm. § 462, states that law as follows: "It is an invariable rule that under no circumstances shall a garnishee, by the operation of the proceedings against him, be placed in any worse condition than he would be in if the defendant's claim against him were enforced by the defendant himself." "A plaintiff by garnishment cannot place himself in a superior position, as regards a recovery, than is occupied by the principal defendant. The garnishee's liability is measured by his responsibility and relation to the defendant. He can be charged only in consistency with the subject of his contract with the defendant." 2 Shinn, Attachm. § 516. In North Chicago Rolling Mill Co. v. St. Louis Ore & Steel Co. 152 U. S. 619, 38 L. ed. 573, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 717, we find the court saying: "The proposition here laid down is in harmony with the generally recognized principle that the rights of the garnisher do not rise above or extend beyond those of his debtor." "The service of garnishment neither changed nor interrupted the contractual relations existing between the Chicago Company and the St. Louis Company. The rights and equities existing and to arise out of those contractual relations were in no way terminated or defeated by that service." Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McCullough, 12 Gratt. 595, is pointed authority; also Neill v. Rogers Bros. Produce Co. 41 W. Va. 37, 23 S. E. 702. Therefore we hold that the Norfolk & Western Company could not incur liability by the possession of that car. Liability could only arise from possession of it. It did not owe the Pennsylvania company anything. It had the right to use that car, regardless of the levy on it, and carry it to Hagerstown and return it to the Pennsylvania Company, under its contract with that company. It will not do to say that it could be liable by reason of the ultimate right of the Pennsylvania Company to have possession of the car, because the right of the Norfolk & Western would be defeated by the subjection of the car to the attachment,—its right to carry the car back to Hagerstown. It would be impracticable, under the circumstances, to subject such reversion. In fact, the court took no steps to ascertain the value of the reversion, as its order shows that it ascertained the value of the car as it stood at Hagerstown, without reference to any idea of reversion, and, finding it greater than the demand, gave a personal judgment against the garnishee.

The case of Michigan C. R. Co. v. Chicago & M. L. S. R. Co. 1 Ill. App. 399, is very pointed in this case to sustain our decision. Loomis brought suit against a railroad company, and garnisheed another, having in its possession cars of the debtor company, just as in this case. It was held that "a railroad company is not liable to garnishment for cars received of a connecting line under running arrangements existing between them, such as are usually adopted by connecting lines throughout the country, whereby, instead of unloading and transferring their freight from the cars of one company to the cars of the other at the points of connection, each received from the other the cars loaded with freight, and hauled them to the place of destination on its own line of road, and, after discharging the freight, returned the cars as soon as practicable in due course of business." But it is said that the answer of the company does not set up a contract as actually existing, but relies simply on a universal custom among railroad companies as to such traffic arrangement. This contention cannot be sustained in the face of the fact that the answer affirmatively avers that "an arrangement and understanding existed between the defendant and the garnishee companies." Those words plainly import a perfect contract, because, by the agreement and understanding of the parties, there is a union of minds upon a specific thing. What if the answer does say that such agreement was according to the universal custom in such cases among railroad lines? That does not destroy the statement that there was an agreement and understanding between the parties to a certain effect. The averment as to custom is surplusage, merely stating that the contract conformed to such custom. Therefore we hold that, by reason of the contractual relation between the two companies, the car was not attachable; the garnishee was not subject to garnishment and liability. It is argued that there was no contract such as would forbid the Pennsylvania Company from taking the car from the Norfolk & Western Company at any time. There was that contract. It forbade the Pennsylvania Company from taking the car from the Norfolk & Western Company. The latter company had the right to do as it did under the contract; that is, take the car to Luray and load it with freight, and haul it to the end of its line, and there deliver it to the Cumberland Valley Railroad, to be carried over that road and delivered to its owner.

It may be thought that if the attachment created a lien on the car, conceding the right of the Norfolk & Western, under said contract, to carry the car back to Hagerstown, yet the attachment lien still clung to the car; and, it giving Wall a right superior to the right of the Pennsylvania Company, it was the duty of the Norfolk & Western to carry the car back to Jefferson county, to be made amenable to the attachment. It is an accepted principle of law that the laws and process of one state have no force outside of that state, and to say that the lien of the attachment clung to the car in its physical absence from the state would seem to violate that principle of law. This lien exists only under the attachment law and process, and is not a contractual lien. It passes no title. Where there is a mortgage or other conveyance passing the title to movable property, doubtless that title can be asserted in another state so as to recover the property there. So, likely, will a contractual lien avail there. How far this doctrine goes is not well settled. Even such mortgages or liens passing title have been held subordinate to rights acquired in the state to which the property is removed by third persons. Hervey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works, 93 U. S. 664, 23 L. ed. 1003; Walcworth v. Harris, 129 U. S. 355, 32 L. ed. 712, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340; Corbett v. Littlefield, 84 Mich. 30, 11 L. R. A. 95, 22 Am. St. Rep. 681, 47 N. W. 581; Hornthal v. Burwell, 109 N. C. 10, 13 L. R. A. 740, 26 Am. St. Rep. 556, 13 S. E. 721; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, 289, 298, 3 L. ed. 104, 106; Story, Conf. L. § 402. These authorities are not cited as pointed on this question, for they involve rights of third persons, but are cognate. In our case the rights of no third person had intervened. We do not say whether or not Wall could 64 L. R. A.

enforce this lien in another state. If he could not, the lien would end at the state line, and the garnishee, having rightfully taken the car to Hagerstown, would be under no obligation to return it. We must pass simply on the rights between Wall and the Norfolk & Western. The company had right to take the car loaded to Hagerstown. It seems clear that at that point it had the right to end its obligation to the Pennsylvania Company by delivery of the loaded car to it. It was not under obligations to assume the burden of carrying the car back to Jefferson county. Its contract placed upon it no such burden. On the contrary, that contract gave it the right to end its relation with the Pennsylvania Company by delivery of the car, and thus end its obligation, as the right to end an obligation under a contract is an essential part of the contract. The Norfolk & Western Company could not be called upon to unload the car, for that would be a violation of the rights of the shipper in the middle of the transit, and the company could not be required to haul the load back to Jefferson county, first, because that, also, would be a great wrong upon the shipper of the load in the car; and, second, because it would place a burden upon the Norfolk & Western which its contract did not put upon it. Thus we cannot see that the garnishee company was under any obligation to return the car.

There is another reason still, of very controlling force, exempting the garnishee from liability, and that is that clause of the Federal Constitution giving power to Congress to regulate commerce among the states, and the act of Congress providing "that every railroad company in the United States, whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road . . . passengers, . . . freight and property on their way from any state to another state, . . . and to connect with roads of other states, so as to form continuous lines for the transportation of the same to the place of destination." It has been frequently held that the powers of the Federal government under said clause of the Constitution are exclusive of all power in the state. This power in the national government was held in Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062, and Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. v. Richmond, 19 Wall. 584, 22 L. ed. 173, to be "designed to remove trammels upon transportation between different states which had previously existed, and to prevent a creation of such trammels in the future, and to facilitate railway transportation by authorizing the construction of bridges over the navigable waters of the Mississippi . . . to reach trammels interposed by state enactments. . . . The power to regulate commerce among the several states was vested in Congress in order to secure equality and freedom in commercial intercourse against discriminating state legislation. . . . So far as these regulations made by Congress extend, they are certainly indications of its intention that the transportation of commodities between the states shall be free, except where it is positively restricted by Congress itself." It would be easy to cite many Federal cases to show that any state legislation hindering, obstructing, or placing burdens upon interstate commerce are void, and that no state legislation can be so used or applied as to effect this result. No one can claim that the attachment laws of West Virginia are void under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, but that the use of the writ of attachment in this case works a hindrance of the freedom of interstate commerce; that is, that the writ is abortive and of no effect, applied as in this case. Any statute or action by state authorities which amounts to a regulation of commerce between the states is void; and, if it works obstruction or even retardation of such commerce, it is, in law, a regulation of commerce. Thus, a state tax on telegraph messages beyond the state is void for that reason. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, 26 L. ed. 1067. A state act requiring a telegraph company to deliver messages within a mile of the office was held void under the commerce clause. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 306, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1126. A state statute prohibiting a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer haul was held invalid because it tended to hinder interstate commerce, from the fact that it might prohibit, or operate to prohibit, the railroad from carrying freight from another state at lower rates than it could afford to carry for from points within the state. It worked a consequential effect upon business outside the state. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eubank, 184 U. S. 27, 46 L. ed. 416, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277. A steamboat was engaged in navigating a river between two towns in Michigan, but it was in a habit of carrying goods destined for points in another state. The court said that the case related to transportation on navigable waters, and, further, it was unable to draw any distinct line between the authority of Congress to regulate an agency employed in commerce between the states, and when it is confined in its action entirely within limits within a single state. Several agencies combining, each taking up the commodity transported at the boundary line at one end of the state, and leaving it at the boundary of the other, would not oust the Federal power under the commerce clause. The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999. In Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547, it was held that the statute requiring a steamboat to carry colored passengers in the same cabin with white was unconstitutional, in requiring those engaged in the transportation of passengers among the states to carry colored passengers in Louisiana in the same cabin with whites, and was void under the commerce clause. These cases will show that, no matter what the form, mode, or means by which such commerce is impeded or obstructed, it is void. 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1664. Even the states' power of taxation, large as it is, cannot be exerted on interstate commerce, because it tends to lessen it and impair it. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. It is true that, in order to brand state law or action as contrary to the Federal Constitution and law, the operation of such state law or action must be direct and substantially hurtful to such commerce, not merely remotely hurtful. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 183 U. S. 503, 46 L. ed. 298, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 95. But is not the operation of this writ of attachment a direct impediment and obstruction of interstate commerce? If this levy is given any effect, it would take the car from the custody of the Norfolk & Western after it had started on its mission of carriage from one state to another, while yet its freight was under its roof and entitled to shelter from the elements, and the security of its inclosure. Its transit with its freight had not yet ended when the writ was levied. The protection and security of the plaster were a part of the function of interstate carriage, and the railroad company and consignee were entitled thereto, just as much as they were entitled to the car for transportation to the point of consignment. Not only so because that attachment would prevent the Norfolk & Western Company from taking that car to some point on its line, loading it with goods, and hauling it back over its road, and prevent the Cumberland Valley Road from hauling in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and prevent the Pennsylvania road from hauling it on to Newark,—it would prevent those companies from earning freight for such return load, and would prevent citizens of West Virginia and another state from the benefit of such car in transporting their goods, and thus deprive them, as consignor and consignee, from the full enjoyment of the benefit of interstate commerce. I cannot imagine anything more directly operative on interstate commerce than an attachment so used. The Norfolk & Western Railroad Company passes from state to state with its line, and is engaged in the business of interstate commerce, as held in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S. 114, 34 L. ed. 394, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 178, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 958. It is a link and part of lines of railroads affording communication and transportation between different states.

It will not do to say that we can find no act of Congress saying that state process shall not be served upon railroad cars running from state to state, and that, until there is such act, state process can be so used. Powers of the national government were given to it in this commerce matter by the states at the foundation of the government, in order that the indispensable transaction of interstate commerce should be under one single governmental power, for the sake of uniformity, so that it would not be hampered and crippled by the action—the different and diverse and variant action—of many states, which would forbid the growth of commerce and prosperity of all the states; and this power in the nation is exclusive. It is well established that, “so long as Congress does not pass any law to regulate commerce among the several states, it thereby indicates its will that that commerce shall be free and untrammelled.” Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1091. The power is exclusive, and “the failure of Congress to make express regulations indicates its will that the subject shall be left free from any restrictions or impositions and any regulation of the subject by the states, except in matters of local concern only, as hereafter mentioned, is repugnant to such freedom.” Robbins v. Shelby County Tazewell Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

I have already said that our state attachment statute is entirely valid, but that it cannot be used in a manner and in cases in which it would operate to infringe upon the exclusive power of the Federal government as to interstate commerce. It may be asked, if this is so, what becomes of that section of the very Constitution of this state providing that rolling stock shall be liable to execution? I apply to it the same rule as the attachment law is subject to. Both are subject to the paramount force of the national Constitution, as it is an admitted principle that a state Constitution, can no more detract from the force of Federal law than can a state statute. It may be that this ruling will render the application in practice of the provision of the state Constitution making liable the rolling stock of foreign corporations, or even of railroad companies created by the state, very narrow; but, if so, it is the result of the force—the paramount force—of the Federal Constitution.

For these reasons, we reverse the decree of the Circuit Court, and dismiss the plaintiffs suit.

Messrs. W. B. Douglas, Attorney General, and Thomas R. Kane for respondent.

Lovely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Habeas corpus proceedings originally brought in this court to determine the legality of petitioner's imprisonment upon a complaint under chapter 362, p. 652, Laws 1903, which prohibits the sale of articles of merchandise on any portion of the Sabbath day. Under a proper complaint defendant was convicted of the offense charged, and is held upon a warrant issued thereon. The objection to plaintiff's detention rests upon the ground that this statute is invalid, as contravening the provisions of §§ 33, 34, art. 4, of the state Constitution, prohibiting partial or class legislation. The act under which petitioner was convicted reads as follows: "All manner of public selling or offering for sale of any property upon Sunday is prohibited, except that meals may be sold to be eaten on the premises where sold or served elsewhere by caterers; and prepared tobacco in places other than where spirituous or malt liquor or wines are kept or offered for sale; and fruits, confectionery, newspapers, drugs, medicines, and surgical appliances may be sold in a quiet and orderly manner: Provided, however, that nothing in this section shall be construed to allow or permit the public sale or exposing for sale of uncooked meats, fresh or salt, or groceries, dry goods, clothing, wearing apparel of any kind, or boots or shoes." While it is necessarily conceded that, as a police regulation, the law prohibiting work on the Sabbath is within the scope of legislative power and authority, it is insisted for petitioner that this statute involves and authorizes a discrimination for a favored class, which is so unreasonable as to convict the legislature of gross partiality in its adoption; that its provisions prohibit the sale of meats on the morning hours of Sunday, which had been previously permitted under § 6517, Gen. Stat. 1894 (§ 223, Penal Code), which is regarded as especially obnoxious to the retail city butchers, who are particularly interested in these proceedings, since the provision in the act abrogates the privilege previously conferred, but retains the right of dealers to sell fruit, confectionery, newspapers, drugs, medicines, and surgical instruments in a quiet and orderly manner.

It is insisted that there is no intelligent or apparent reason for these distinctions in the classes referred to. The right to dispose of drugs, medicine, and surgical appliances is so clearly a necessity in favor of health and life that it is not suggested that by the exception the vendors of these articles are improperly favored in the act, or that newspapers may be properly sold, but that there is no reason why cigars, candy, and tobacco in packages can be sold on Sunday, while uncooked meats, which are as much of a necessity, are restrained and forbidden. The consideration of this subject is not entirely new. Section 6513, regulating labor on Sunday, was passed upon by this court when we have held that keeping open a barber shop on Sunday was not a work of necessity, and that a statute prohibiting the same was not unreasonable discrimination. In the case referred to it was claimed that the act was invalid, as being class legislation, and we held that in the exercise of the police power in establishing a day of rest a very large discretion must be allowed to the legislature in determining what kind of labor or business should be prohibited, and what are and what are not works of necessity or charity; and, unless the classification is manifestly purely arbitrary, and not founded upon any substantial distinction or apparent natural reason which suggests the necessity or propriety of different legislation, the courts have no right to interfere with the exercise of legislative discretion. Courts, it was there said, would take judicial notice of the fact that, in view of the custom to keep barber shops open in the evening as well as in the day, the employees in them work more and during later hours, than those engaged in most other occupations, and that this is especially true on Saturday afternoons and evenings; also that, owing to the habit of so many men to postpone getting shaved until Sunday, if such shops were to be permitted to be kept open on Sunday, the employees would ordinarily be deprived of rest during half of that day. State v. Petit, 74 Minn. 376, 77 N. W. 225. The purpose of the Sunday law in this opinion was held to be, not to enforce religious observances, but, in the exercise of legislative judgment, to protect those who were engaged in servile labor from imposition by the public or employer upon their enjoyment of rest and recuperation, in furtherance of what has been well expressed in the sentiment of a modern aphorism that "He who ordained the Sabbath loves the poor." Very many of the population of our cities would not have the day of rest which the Sunday laws afford were it not for these provisions which have made this manifestly just and humane purpose the subject of legislative cognizance and protection, and if it can be found from a consideration of the way in which the people of our cities live and enjoy the repose and relief from labor every Sabbath day accorded by the Sunday law, and that there is to any sensible extent or degree a distinction in securing the proposed purposes of the law between the keeping open of butcher shops, grocery stores, and the sale of uncooked meats or family supplies that does not apply to the sale of confectionery and tobacco, the wisdom of the selection designated in the law is with the legislature, and not the courts.

It may be said here quite as pertinently as in State v. Petit, 74 Minn. 376, 77 N. W. 225, that the object is to give essential and useful benefits to employees from compulsory servile labor on Sunday, and it is not to be disputed that a custom which existed of making purchases of meats and the prohibited merchandise on Sunday required the employment during portions of that day of a large number of clerks and laborers who are engaged in and about these establishments when they serve the public, and that the purchase of meats and groceries therein can, without extreme disadvantage, be made on the previous day. This may impose some extra burden upon the patrons of such establishments as well as the proprietors; but it will, as it seems to us obvious, relieve the persons to be protected to a much greater extent than in the sale of confectionery and tobacco, and give the desired benefits more generally than in the occupation permitted by the statute. Whether the discrimination be justified by wise legislative policy, we are not required to determine. That is the province of the lawmaking power, not ours. It is our duty to ascertain, if possible, whether, from our knowledge of existing conditions, there is such a sensible distinction between these occupations as would furnish a basis of judgment in making the same. It is undoubtedly the custom of a large number of our people in the cities to visit public parks, which have been to a considerable extent provided by the liberality and civic spirit of our municipalities for the enjoyment of the occasion. The statute clearly prohibits the sale of intoxicating drinks in any form on Sunday, and only allows confectionery to be sold, which is on many occasions required by parents for the children and the more youthful class of visitors thereto. Tobacco has come to be among a very large portion of the respectable people of this country a necessity in the appreciation of appropriate Sunday rest and recreation, which cannot, in a practical way, be provided for beforehand in the suitable enjoyment of the period of recuperation and rest which makes the day of rest beneficial. In view of these differences, as well as the number of those engaged in these occupations and the nature and character of the business, it seems apparent that a distinction exists between the occupations distinguished in the statute, so far at least as to make the classification therein reasonably obvious in the judgment of the court; and we cannot say that an unusual favoritism is so clear that we must convict the legislature of the violation of the constitutional provisions invoked for the petitioner.

The writ is discharged.

I. Introduction.

It was formerly held that idiots, mad men, and such as were born deaf and dumb were incapable of suing, because they wanted reason and understanding; but actions may now be maintained in their names, and prosecuted on their behalf. Co. Litt. 135b.

This right to sue seems to have been uniformly admitted from the time of Fitzherbert (F. N. B. 63*g*), and is now never contested.

For some time after the right of lunatics and deaf and dumb persons to sue was conceded, the right of idiots to appear in the courts was still questioned. And the distinction between idiocy and lunacy was always carefully observed in the old cases. Indeed, the various degrees of insanity were formerly clearly defined, and persons non compos mentis divided into several classes. These classes are stated in Beverley's Case, 4 Coke, 124, to be four: "(1) Idiot or fool natural; (2) he who was of good and sound memory, and by the visitation of God has lost it; (3) lunaticus, qui gaudet lucidis intervallis, and sometimes is of good and sound memory, and sometimes non compos mentis; (4) by his own act, as a drunkard." And it is added that there is a great difference between an idiot, a nativitate, and he who was of sound memory and becomes, by the visitation of God, of unsound memory. The careful observance, in England, of this distinction between idiots and lunatics was doubtless due, in part at least, to the fact that in the case of idiots the King, who was regarded as the natural protector of all persons non compos mentis as parens patrie, had an absolute proprietary interest in their lands, but in the case of lunatics his interest was only that of a trustee.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County dismissing a suit filed by the next friend of Henrietta Sackman, to compel defendant to account for certain moneys, notes, mortgages, and other property in her possession alleged to belong to Mrs. Sackman. Reversed.

The facts are stated, in the opinion.

Messrs. James Lindon and Guy Brockway, for appellant:

Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, it was absolutely necessary for the complainant to sue by next friend. No conservator could have been appointed, for the complainant was in the hands of the defendant in Cook county, and her residence was in Lake county; and a proceeding for the appeal, and sometimes is of good and sound memory, and sometimes non compos mentis; (4) by his own act, as a drunkard." And it is added that there is a great difference between an idiot, a nativitate, and he who was of sound memory and becomes, by the visitation of God, of unsound memory. The careful observance, in England, of this distinction between idiots and lunatics was doubtless due, in part at least, to the fact that in the case of idiots the King, who was regarded as the natural protector of all persons non compos mentis as parens patrie, had an absolute proprietary interest in their lands, but in the case of lunatics his interest was only that of a trustee.

In the United States this distinction has not been observed except in a few of the early cases, and it is said in Holzheiser v. Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 33 S. W. 887, that the distinction made in England between idiots and lunatics, if really affecting the question as to the right to sue by next friend, cannot exist under our law; that the reason why the courts should hear complaints in their behalf when made by next friend exists in one case as well as in the other.

Therefore, in making this note this distinction has been ignored, and no effort has been made to marshal the cases as to suits by idiots in a division by themselves.

There is but little conflict in the decisions as to the right of a next friend to maintain a suit on behalf of an insane person, and the substance of such decisions, showing the general principles governing such actions both at law and in equity and before and after an adjudication of lunacy, has been summed up in the conclusion of this note.

II. In general.

The earliest reported case of proceedings instituted on behalf of an insane person by next friend is that of Dennis v. Dennis, 2 Wms' Saund. 328, 2 Keble, 691, in the reign of Charles II., in which a next friend was specially admitted by the court to represent an idiot in what seems to have been a writ of error coram nobis to annul a judgment taken at the same term against the idiot, who had appeared in the pointment of a conservator only, must be in the county in which the person resides.

Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 86, § 1; Van Buskirk v. Van Buskirk, 148 Ill. 9, 35 N. E. 383; Ronan v. Bluhm, 173 Ill. 277, 50 N. E. 694; Pyott v. Pyott, 191 Ill. 280, 61 N. E. 88.

On a proper showing, it is the court's duty to appoint a next friend to sue on behalf of an insane person; otherwise an insane person not under conservatorship is made an outlaw.

Messrs. Langworthy & Raymond for appellee.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 2d day of October, 1900, Mary A. Isle entered a motion in the circuit court of Cook county that she be appointed next friend of her mother, Henrietta Sackman, a original action by attorney, and not by next friend, as she claimed she should have done. It does not appear whether or not the plaintiff in error had been judicially declared insane and a committee appointed, and nothing is said in the opinion as to the right to sue by next friend. But the right must have been conceded, since the next friend was specially admitted by the court, and no objection appears to have been made by anyone to his acting. A footnote states that it is held that, if an idiot sue, he must appear in person, and anyone who prays to be admitted as his friend may sue for him; but that a lunatic, or one who becomes non compos mentis, must appear by guardian, if within age, and by attorney, if of full age. This undoubtedly was the old rule in actions at law.

Daniel's Chancery Pleading & Practice, 6th Am. ed. p. 9, cites West v. Davis, Rolls 1863, W. No. 83, to the proposition that persons incapable of acting for themselves, though not coming under the description of idiots or lunatics, have been permitted to sue by their next friends without the intervention of the attorney general; but it has been impossible to obtain access to the case itself.

To this same proposition he cites, also, the unreported case of Liney v. Wetherley, Ld. Red. 30, n., which is universally cited by all the text-books and many of the decisions to sustain the right to sue by next friend in case of partial incompetency. In this case, a decree in which was given in December, 1760, a decree on supplemental bill in March, 1779, the plaintiff was a person deaf and dumb, suing by her next friend.

In Gleddon v. Trebble, 9 C. B. N. S. 367, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 160, which was an action by the wife of a lunatic, not so found in his name, for the recovery of a debt, the court made absolute a rule for payment of the money to the wife. It is said in the argument that the action was founded upon a supposed implied authority in the wife to bring it in the name of her husband, he being a lunatic; but the wife is not here called a next friend, and there is nothing said as to the practice of instituting suits for lunatics by their next friends.

A similar case is Rock v. Slade, 7 Dowl. P. C. 22, 1 Arnold, 346, 2 Jur. 993, in which it is also held that the wife of a lunatic who has no committee has sufficient implied authority to sue in the name of the incompetent for a sum of money due him. Lord Abinger said: "It is 64 L. R. A.

every day's practice to sue in the name of a lunatic, and I never heard any question as to the propriety of such action where no committee was appointed."

As these two cases are sometimes cited to sustain the right of an insane person to sue by next friend, they have been included in this note, although there is nothing to show that the wife in either case sued as next friend.

A case frequently cited against the right of a lunatic to institute proceedings by next friend is Wartnaby v. Wartnaby, Jac. 377, but there is nothing in this case to indicate that there was any next friend in the suit, except the fact that the defendant alleged that the bill was not the bill of the plaintiff, but that somebody was using her name without her authority; she not being in a state of mind competent to give authority; and the court intimates that, if the mind of a person were gone, so that he could not, as a matter of choice, authorize a suit, he might be treated as if dead, and the bill taken from the files.

This case was cited in Blake v. Smith, Younge, 596, to sustain a motion by defendant to have the bill taken from the files on the ground that it had been filed in the name of the plaintiff, who was an imbecile, at the instance of defendant without the plaintiff's authority. The court referred the motion to the master to inquire what authority, if any, was given by the plaintiff, and whether the institution of the suit was for his benefit. Upon the master reporting that no authority had been given by plaintiff, and that the bill was filed at the instance of the defendant, and was not for the plaintiff's benefit, the bill was taken from the files.

Neither of these cases seems to be of any value on the question under discussion.

On motion of defendant after decree in Hartley v. Gilbert, 13 Sim. 596, the proceedings were stayed until after the opening of a commission of lunacy issued against his wife, who was the plaintiff in this case suing by next friend, the court saying that prima facie there was good ground for supposing that the suit, instead of being conducted by the next friend, would be conducted under the jurisdiction in lunacy. Apparently, however, the wife sued in this case by next friend because she was a married woman, and not because of her lunacy.

Hill v. Hill, 3 Ont. L. Rep. 202, was an action by a lunatic wife by her next friend, for alimony. Nothing is said as to the propriety distracted person, to file and prosecute a bill in chancery in the name of Henrietta Sackman against Kate Cranby. The bill desired to be filed was presented to the court with the motion, and sought to compel Kate Cranby to account for certain moneys, promissory notes, mortgages, and other property in her possession belonging to Henrietta Sackman. The motion was supported by the affidavit of Mary A. Isle, to the effect that Henrietta Sackman for many years last past had been a distracted person, who, by reason of her unsoundness of mind, was incapable of managing or caring for her estate; that Henrietta Sackman had no conservator; that she was then under the control of Kate Cranby, who was also her daughter, and that the affiant had no interest in the subject-matter of the suit, or otherwise, adverse to the interest of Henrietta Sackman. Thereupon the court entered the following order: "In the matter of the application of Mary A. Isle to be appointed as next friend to file and prosecute the bill of Henrietta Sackman, a distracted person, against Kate Cranby. This matter coming on to be heard on the motion of Mary A. Isle, supported by the affidavit of said Mary A. Isle, and it appearing to the court, by the said affidavit, that the said Henrietta Sackman is a distracted person and that there is no conservator of the estate of said Henrietta Sackman, and that the said Mary A. Isle is a proper person to bring suit as next friend of said Henrietta Sackman, it is ordered that said Mary A. Isle be, and she is ty of the action, and it does not appear whether she sued by next friend because of insanity or because she was a married woman.

The leading American case against the right of a lunatic to sue by next friend is that of Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, in which it is held that a bill in equity cannot be maintained in the name of a lunatic or insane person by his next friend to set aside a deed made by the incompetent, but that such a suit can only be maintained by a conservator who has the custody and control of the estate and rights of the lunatic. It does not appear whether a conservator had been appointed for the lunatic in this case or not, but the court in the case of ISLE V. CRANBY, in discussing the Covington Case, says that after a careful reading of the opinion he is inclined to think that a conservator had been appointed, but that, if the doctrine of the case was that an insane person not so adjudged could not sue by next friend, it is contrary to the weight of authority and in conflict with later decisions of the court. The case is also distinguished in Roughan v. Morris, 87 Ill. App. 642, infra, III. a.

And in Brown v. Riggin, 94 Ill. 560, a bill in chancery was filed on behalf of an insane person, by his next friend, and the propriety of the form of action was apparently recognized. It does not appear whether or not there had been a finding of lunacy.

So, also, in Ronan v. Bluhm, 173 IH. 277, 50 N. E. 694, in which one of the complainants in the bill was an insane person suing by next friend, there is nothing to show whether or not there had been an inquisition of lunacy. The court makes no comment on the fact that the insane complainant was represented by next friend, and seems to recognize such method of bringing the suit as being correct.

On a motion to tax costs, where a suit instituted by a next friend of an incompetent person to set aside a deed made by the incompetent was voluntarily dismissed by the next friend, the court said, in Nance v. Stockburger, 112 Ga. 90, 81 Am. St. Rep. 22, 37 S. E. 125, that it knew of no law in Georgia that authorized anyone, without authority from the court, voluntarily to institute a suit as next friend for an imbecile or lunatic; that when the property of such a person was being wasted, or had been seized wrongfully by others, it was, under the statute, the duty of the ordinary to appoint a guardian for such imbecile or lunatic. The court added, however: "We do not mean to say that a person could not, as next friend, without order of court, bring such an action for the protection of the rights of an irresponsible person; but we are confident that when it is done, and the next friend voluntarily dismisses his action, he has no right to ask that the court render a judgment for costs against the party for whose benefit he pretends to be acting."

In an earlier Georgia case—that of Wilson v. Ansley, 47 Ga. 278—a suit was brought in the name of a lunatic by her next friend; and, since nothing is said in the opinion or briefs as to the propriety of the form of action, it seems that the right so to sue must have been conceded.

And it has since been held that, under Ga. Civil Code, § 4283, providing that persons not sui juris may appear either by guardian or next friend, one non compos mentis may sue by any competent person as his next friend; and the fact that a suit is brought by a person as next friend of an incompetent, instead of by the incompetent by his next friend, though irregular according to the strict rules of pleading, is held to be immaterial in the absence of a demurrer at least. Dent v. Merriam, 113 Ga. 83, 38 S. E. 334.

The right of a next friend to institute a suit for divorce on behalf of a lunatic is denied in Worthy v. Worthy, 36 Ga. 45, 91 Am. Dec. 758; but the reasoning of the court seems to apply to suits for divorce only, the right to institute such suits being regarded as strictly personal to the party aggrieved, and to argue nothing against the right to bring suits generally by next friend.

In New Jersey a bill cannot be filed by a next friend without special authorization from the court. Dorshelmer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438.

And a bill which avers the lunacy of a complainant, and that she sues by her next friend, without recital of any adjudication that the complainant is a lunatic, or that there has been any order appointing the person who seeks to act for the lunatic as her guardian or next friend, is demurrable. Palmer v. Sinnickson, 59 N. J. Eq. 530, 46 Atl. 517.

And when idioy or lunacy is not partial a court of equity will not allow a suit to be brought on behalf of an idiot or lunatic by a next friend; but when a person is only partially hereby, appointed as next friend of said Henrietta Sackman, to file and prosecute the bill in chancery presented with said motion, said bill being against Kate Cranby." Thereupon the bill, which was brought in the name of "Henrietta Sackman, a distracted person, by Mary Isle, her next friend, duly appointed theretofore by this court," was filed, which afterwards having been amended, Kate Cranby appeared by her solicitor, and filed a demurrer thereto, and Henrietta Sackman appeared by her solicitor, and moved the court to dismiss the suit. The solicitor for Mary A. Isle, as next friend of Henrietta Sackman, moved the court to set the motion of Henrietta Sackman to dismiss the suit down for hearing for the purpose of determining the mental condition of Henrietta Sackman. This the court declined to do, but sustained the motion of Henrietta Sackman and the demurrer of Kate Cranby, and entered a decree dismissing the bill of complaint, as amended, "for want of jurisdiction, for the reason that the same is brought by the next friend, and not by a conservator," which decree has been affirmed by the appellate court. Henrietta Sackman has died since the filing of the transcript in that court, and Mary A. Isle, having been appointed her administratrix, and having been substituted in her stead in that court, has prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The first question presented by this record is, Was this suit properly brought in the name of Henrietta Sackman, a distracted person, by Mary A. Isle, her next friend?

incapable, as one merely deaf and dumb, the court will appoint a next friend to be joined with him in the suit, and to conduct it for him. Dorshemer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438.

But both of these cases are criticized in Collins v. Topplin, 63 N. J. Eq. 381, 51 Atl. 933, infra, III. a.

The court says, in Wood v. Throckmorton, 26 Colo. 248, 57 Pac. 699, that, persons non compos mentis not being able to judge for themselves as to the bringing of an action, their rights must be presented to the court for adjudication through the intervention of a next friend, or someone authorized to represent him, though not every action instituted by a next friend should be permitted to continue; that proper and necessary suits for the benefit of the incompetent should be encouraged, but that it is in the discretion of the court to allow an action so instituted to proceed or not.

It was said to be self-evident in Kerwin v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 35 La. Ann. 33, that the petitioners, who had brought a suit in equity for themselves and on behalf of minor brothers and sisters and their mother, who was of unsound mind, not being curators of the alleged insane person, had no capacity to bring her into court, and that no judgment rendered in such suit would be res judicata as to the alleged insane mother.

A case which is of value on this question only as an indirect denial of the right of a lunatic to sue by next friend is that of Ruchanan v. Rout, 2 T. B. Mon. 114, in which it is said that it is well settled that a lunatic must appear by guardian if within age, or by attorney if of full age. This was an action of trespass brought by a lunatic by her attorney, and it was objected that the plaintiff should have appeared by her committee; but the court said that it did not appear that the lunatic was within age, and, if she was of full age, according to the well-settled doctrine of the common law she could appear only by attorney.

This case cites, as authority on the question, Cameron v. Pottinger, 3 Bibb, 11, where it is said that a lunatic, or one who becomes non compos mentis, must appear by guardian if within age, and by attorney if of full age. But both these cases were actions at law, and were decided according to the old common-law principles, and, while nothing is said as to any distinction between suits at law and in equity, it seems reasonable to suppose that the court considered and intended to decide only the proper mode of procedure in the particular suit then before it, which was one at law.

So, likewise, in Amos v. Taylor, 2 Brev. 20, it is said, obiter, that one who becomes non compos mentis must appear by guardian if within age, or by attorney, citing Beverley's Case, 4 Coke, 124b.

There is no New York case expressly deciding the question, though in Runberg v. Johnson, 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 283, an unreported case, decided February 24, 1885, is referred to incidentally, in which a person, without notice to the nominal plaintiff, and in fact in open hostility to her, had procured an order appointing him her next friend for the purpose of commencing an action to set aside a conveyance of real estate, and the action was brought in her name by him as next friend. It was held that such a procedure was unauthorized by any law or practice in the state, but this seems to be on the ground that the next friend was acting in hostility to the incompetent, and does not seem to go so far as to hold that a suit could never be prosecuted on behalf of an incompetent by next friend.

And Chancellor Kent said, in Malin v. Malin, 2 Johns. Ch. 238, that, if a person has religious scruples in regard to becoming a party to a suit, which cannot be surmounted, and this shall be made to appear either by affidavit or the report of the master, perhaps she may be permitted to become plaintiff by her prochein ami, and that a person incompetent to protect himself from age or weakness of mind, or from some religious delusion or fanaticism, ought to come under the protection of the court.

The right of an insane person to sue by next friend is recognized in a dictum in Allen v. Babcock, 1 Harr. (Del.) 348, where the court says, in discussing the right of a lunatic to conduct proceedings by next friend, that as to this question a late author (citing Shelford, Lunatics, 395) lays it down that a lunatic can sue or defend by next friend. In this case, however, the lunatic was defending.

In Plympton v. Hall, 55 Minn. 22, 21 L. R. A. 675, 56 N. W. 351, it is held that an action on behalf of a person incapable of acting for himself, as a lunatic, may be brought in his name, and the court will authorize some suitable person to carry it on as next friend or guardian ad litem.

In King's Case, 161 Mass. 46, 36 N. E. 685,

We are of the opinion it was. Formerly the right of idiots and lunatics to sue in the courts was not recognized, but this rule has been universally abrogated, and at the present time such persons are as much entitled to have their rights settled by the courts as though they were sane. If an idiot or lunatic have a conservator, he should be represented by his conservator, unless for special reasons—as that the interests of the two are adverse—it be proper that some other person be appointed to represent him as next friend. If, however, a person of unsound mind has not been so adjudged, or he has no conservator appointed for him, the suit or proceeding is brought in the name of the incompetent by some responsible party to be appointed to represent him as his next friend. Mr. Daniell, in his work on Chancery Practice, thus states the rule: "Suits on behalf of a lunatic are usually instituted in the name of the lunatic; but, as he is a person incapable, in law, of taking any step on his own account, he sues by the committee of his estate, if any, or, if none, by his next friend, who is responsible for the conduct of the suit." Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5th ed. p. 83. In Story's Equity Pleading the author (§ 66) says: "Where persons are incapable of acting for themselves, although not strictly either idiots or lunatics, the suit may be brought in their name, and the court will authorize some suitable person to carry it on as their next friend. But in every such case it is in the discretion of the court to allow the suit to proceed or not;

on appeal from the dismissal of a petition for writ of habeas corpus to obtain the release of a person from an insane asylum, although nothing is decided as to the right to sue by next friend generally, the court holds that, if the person imprisoned is a minor, or if there is reason to believe that he is not of sound mind, a next friend or guardian ad litem may be appointed by the court; and that, after a next friend or guardian ad litem has been thus appointed, a mere stranger, who shows no interest in the controversy, and by whom the petition was filed, cannot control the proceedings, and has no right to appeal from the decision of the court.

Upon appeal from a judgment remanding an insane petitioner for writ of habeas corpus to an insane asylum, it was held in King v. McLean Asylum, 12 C. C. A. 139, 21 U. S. App. 407, 64 Fed. 325, that the prochein ami, by whom the petition was presented, might prosecute an appeal therefrom until he was especially challenged for some cause, or until the higher court appointed a guardian ad litem. The court says that the aid of a prochein ami in cases of this character, including appeals, is necessary for the protection of those who, on account of the rigorous nature of their detention, or of their mental inability, are incapable of acting for themselves, and that wherever a proceeding is commenced by prochein ami the presumption that it was properly so commenced stands until rebutted.

In a subsequent opinion filed in this cause (26 L. R. A. 784, 12 C. C. A. 145, 21 U. S. App. 481, 64 Fed. 331) the right of the court to supersede the next friend by a guardian ad litem was contested, but the court said that this right was so well established that it required no comment, except to say that it would be a reproach to the law if, in the case of a person unable, through weakness of intellect, or age, to conduct his own litigation, the court had not the right to supersede a volunteer when, in its just discretion, it finds it for the interests of the petitioner or plaintiff to do so. It is added that the privilege of suit by next friend in behalf of a person non compos mentis seems to be of modern growth, and to be wholly the creation of the chancellor.

In Stephens v. Porter, 11 Helsk. 341, it was held that where a petition for the sale and partition of a tract of land was signed by an insane wife by her husband as attorney, and the petition did not show that the wife was a lunatic, a sale of the land was void as to the wife; that while a suit for partition might be prosecuted by an insane wife by her husband as next friend this should appear upon the face of the proceedings, so that the court could protect her rights. This was a bill in chancery to recover the complainant's interest in the land, and the headnote says that the bill was filed by the next friend of the insane wife, but there is nothing in the opinion or case to show this. The case, however, is relied upon as authority for the right to sue by next friend, in Parsons v. Kinzer, 8 Lea, 349, infra, III. a.

In Harris v. Schlinke (Tex. Civ. App.) 62 S. W. 72, which was a suit of trespass to try title, one of the plaintiffs being a lunatic suing by her next friend, it was held that where, on the appearance day at the ensuing term, defendants filed a cross bill, and, plaintiffs failing to appear, judgment was entered against them, the fact that one of the plaintiffs was a lunatic did not render the judgment void because no notice of the cross bill was given, where she was represented, as in this case, by a next friend. This decision was reversed, however, in 95 Tex. 88, 65 S. W. 172, on the ground that judgment could not be entered on a cross bill by defendants in such case without service of it on plaintiff, where he failed to appear.

In Kline's Estate, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 386, upon demurrer to the petition it is stated in the opinion that, since the claimant was of full age, he should have been the petitioner, and that there was no authority for his appearance as a suitor by a next friend; and if, as alleged, he was not mentally competent to make affidavit, then a committee of his person and estate was the proper party to present the petition. The court added that this was evident from the fact that, should the claim be adjudged valid and awarded, it could not be paid to a next friend, but only to a committee, who is alone, authorized to receive it. The petition was, therefore, held defective for want of proper parties. There is no statement of facts in this case, and it is impossible to tell from the title whether or not the petitioner sued as an insane person by a next friend, but, from the extract given above from the opinion, it would seem that this probably was the case.

and it will order a stay of proceedings, or the bill to be taken off the file, if the suit is deemed improper." In Chicago & P. R. Co. v. Munger, 78 Ill. 300, which was an action at law, the court says (p. 301): "By our statutes the conservator of a lunatic shall demand, 'sue for, and receive in his own name, as conservator, all personal property of and demands due the ward,' etc. Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 86, § 11. But until the appointment and qualification of the conservator it is clear, suit is properly brought in the name of the lunatic." In Brown v. Riggins, 94 Ill. 580, a bill in chancery was filed by James H. Riggins, an insane person, by his next friend, Ignatius Riggins, to contest a will. The case was reversed for lack of necessary parties defendant, but the propriety of bringing the suit by next friend was not questioned. In Speck v. Pullman Car Co. 121 Ill. 33, 12 N. E. 213, which was a partition suit, the bill was filed in the name of James Dunn, who was described therein as a lunatic, and who brought the suit by Simeon Straus, as his next friend. The court says (p. 50, 121 Ill., and p. 220, 12 N. E.): "We are not required to assume, from the evidence, that this lunacy [the lunacy of James Dunn] existed when the suit was commenced; but, if it did, no conservator having been appointed under our statute, the suit might be prosecuted in the name of the lunatic." Van Buskirk v. Van Buskirk, 148 Ill. 9, 35 N. E. 383, was a suit in chancery by an insane person suing by next friend. The court treats the proceed-

III. Before inquisition of lunacy.

a. In general.

In the case of Eyre v. Wake, 4 Ves. Jr. 795, decided in 1798, the right of a person non compos to sue by next friend seems to be conceded, since, though the question is not passed upon, an action instituted on behalf of an insane person not so found, by next friend, against the widow and executrix of a trustee to whom money had been bequeathed for the benefit of the incompetent, was sustained, and the relief asked for granted.

And it is stated, arguendo, in the opinion of the master of the rolls in Nelson v. Duncombe, 9 Beav. 211, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 296, 10 Jur. 389, that a bill may be filed in the name of a person alleged to be of unsound mind, though not so found by inquisition, by anyone professing to be his next friend.

This case is cited as authority in Carr v. Boyce, 13 Ir. Eq. Rep. 102, which was a bill by a person of unsound mind by his next friend asking that a receiver be appointed to raise the arrears of a rent charge devised to the plaintiff. The objection that, as there had been no commission of lunacy, there was no one capable of giving a valid discharge for the rent charge, payment to the pretended next friend would not protect the defendant in the event of a commission of lunacy, and that the proper course where no commission had sued out was an information by the attorney general, was held to be merely technical, and the bill was, therefore, sustained.

The question was directly raised in 1858 in the case of Light v. Light, 25 Beav. 248, which was a suit in chancery by a person of weak mind by his next friend, and is one of those most frequently cited to sustain the right of an incompetent to sue by next friend. But its value as authority is somewhat weakened by the fact that the master of the rolls gave as one reason for refusing to give way to the objection that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue in that way, that the defendant had not demurred to the bill or moved to take it from the file, and added that there was a great deal of force in many of the observations of the defendant's counsel. However, as the question was directly raised in the contentions of counsel, and as the court made a decree for the benefit of the plaintiff, the case must be considered as sustaining the right,—at least in favor of persons of weak mind, if not in favor of idiots or lunatics actually so found.

It is said in the brief of counsel in this case that the right of a person of weak mind to sue by his next friend was discussed in Makins v. Thompson in March, 1848, before the vice chancellor, who intimated that he was prepared to take such a bill off the file; but the case went off on the merits.

So in a suit in chancery instituted in the name of a next friend by an imbecile person who was said to be incapable of managing her affairs, though not insane, the lord chancellor in an opinion of but a few lines said that it was for the security of the defendant that a next friend should be instituted, and that it was difficult to draw the line; that, the parties agreeing upon the minutes, it may be done. Wilkinson v. Harwood, 4 Jur. 957.

In Re Law, 30 L. J. Ch. N. S. 512, 7 Jur. N. S. 410, and also in Re Macfarlane, 2 Johns. & H. 673, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 335, 8 Jur. N. S. 208, 6 L. T. N. S. 154, 10 Week. Rep. 369, a petition in the name of an incompetent, by his father and next friend, for the transfer of money and property of the incompetent to his father in satisfaction of money expended for his support, was entertained and dealt with without anything being said as to right of the next friends to file the petitions.

And the right is indirectly recognized in Palmer v. Walesby, L. R. 3 Ch. 732, 16 Week. Rep. 924, in which, after a bill was filed in the name of an alleged incompetent not so found by inquisition, by his next friend, a petition in lunacy was presented, and the alleged incompetent found to be of sound mind, the vice chancellor, on the motion of the alleged incompetent, took the bill from the files, but refused to tax the next friend with the costs of the proceeding, on the ground that there was reasonable and probable cause for supposing the alleged incompetent to have been of unsound mind, and that there was a case demanding inquiry.

The same is true of Re Green, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 681, 41 L. T. N. S. 30. In this case, an incompetent having been found by inquisition to be of unsound mind, and a committee appointed after the institution on her behalf by next friend of an action for the administration of the estate of the deceased person, an ex parte application was made on behalf of the committee for leave to continue the action for the administration of the estate in the same manner as the plaintiff ing as entirely proper, saying (p. 26, 148 Ill., and p. 387, 35 N. E.): "No conservator seems to have been appointed for his estate but this suit has been brought for him by a next friend." In Ronan v. Bluhm, 173 Ill. 277, 50 N. E. 694, one of the complainants in the bill was an insane person suing by next friend. The court makes no comment on that fact, but seems to recognize such method of bringing suit as correct, and the established practice. In the case of Pyott v. Pyott, 191 Ill. 280, 61 N. E. 88, a bill for separate maintenance was filed. The defendant being insane, the court appointed the defendant's son as his guardian ad litem and next friend, and gave leave to file a cross bill. The defendant, by said guardian ad litem and next friend, filed a cross bill to annul the marriage contract. The court, on page 289, 191 Ill., page 91, 61 N. E., says: "After an inquisition and appointment of a conservator for an insane person under the statutory provisions on the subject, all suits and proceedings in behalf of the lunatic should be brought by the conservator, unless the interests of the conservator are adverse to those of his ward, or for other sufficient reason the court shall deem it better to appoint some other person as next friend to appear for, counsel, prosecute, or defend for such insane person. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 601; Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, chap. 86, § 13, p. 1132. Before such inquisition the rule which now obtains in both England and the United States is that a lunatic may sue in his own might have done by her next friend, or otherwise, if she had not been found a lunatic. Leave was granted without any discussion as to the right to sue by next friend.

And the right is sustained in Beall v. Smith, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 245, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, 29 L. T. N. S. 625, 22 Week. Rep. 121, in which it is said that where there is a person of unsound mind, not found so by inquisition, and, therefore, incapable of invoking the protection of the court, that protection may, in proper cases, be invoked on his behalf by any person as next friend; but that every person so constituting himself the protector of a person of unsound mind does so entirely at his own risk, and must be prepared to vindicate the necessity and propriety of his proceedings if they are called in question.

A bill in chancery by a person of unsound mind, not so found, by his next friend, praying for the dissolution of a partnership in which plaintiff was interested, and for the appointment of a receiver, was sustained in Jones v. Lloyd, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 826, L. R. 18 Eq. 275, 30 L. T. N. S. 487, 22 Week. Rep. 785, though the court refused to say whether the incompetent could or could not obtain a final decree without application to the jurisdiction in lunacy. It was contended that, if there was an equity in the insane partner to have the partnership dissolved, it could only be asserted by the committee in lunacy, and not by a bill filed by next friend. But the court said that he did not think this proposition well founded; that he thought such an equity might be asserted by next friend; adding that he did not say it was not desirable to have a committee appointed, or that, if the cause came to a hearing, he himself, if the judge to hear it, or the court which might hear it, might not think it desirable that it should not be finally adjudicated until an application had been made for an adjudication in lunacy, and the appointment of a committee; but that what he had now to decide was merely whether the bill itself was maintainable, and whether an interim order for the protection of the property of the lunatic or his interest in the partnership could, or could not, be obtained. But, after referring to the cases of Light v. Light, 25 Beav. 248, and Beall v. Smith, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 245, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, 29 L. T. N. S. 625, 22 Week. Rep. 121, he said that, independent of distinct authority, the reason of the thing required that the suit be allowed to be main- 64 L. R. A.

tained, since if this were not the law, anybody might, at his will and pleasure, commit waste on a lunatic's property, or do damage or serious injury to him, without there being any remedy whatever, as, in the first place, the lord's justices, or the lord chancellor, are not always sitting for applications in lunacy, and, in the next place, if they were, it takes a considerable time to make a man a lunatic; and that if a man is insane, but his family hesitate about making him a lunatic, or hope for his recovery, it could not be tolerated that any person could injure him or his property without there being any power in any court of justice to restrain such injury.

In the unreported case of Fisher v. Meiles, M. R. (1870) F. 3, before Lord Romilly, referred to in the preceding case of Jones v. Lloyd as having discussed the question of right to sue by next friend, a bill was filed by a person of weak mind by his next friend, asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from meddling with the assets of a partnership in which plaintiff was interested, and that the partnership might be dissolved. Lord Romilly ordered that the motion should stand over until the fact that the plaintiff was a person of such unsound mind as to be incapable of taking care of himself or his property might be established. A petition in lunacy was presented, the plaintiff found lunatic by inquisition, and the next friend appointed his committee. This account of the case is given in a footnote to Jones v. Lloyd, but it does not show what discussion there was in regard to the right of the next friend to institute the proceedings.

In Higginson v. Hall, L. R. 10 Ch. 235, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 250, 39 L. T. N. S. 603, 27 Week. Rep. 469, which was a suit in equity by a person of unsound mind, not so found, by her next friend, asking to have an account taken of certain sums alleged to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff, the right of the next friend to maintain the suit seems to be conceded, the question discussed being the right of the defendant to demand that the next friend make an affidavit of documents in the possession and power of the plaintiff.

And in Howell v. Lewis, 65 L. T. N. S. 672, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 89, 40 Week. Rep. 88, which was an action by a woman in her own name and as next friend of her nephew, a person of unsound mind, not so found, for an accounting of money received from the sale of land in which the plaintiffs were interested, where the alleged name by some proper person appointed or recognized by the court, as the next friend or guardian ad litem for the insane person." In Plympton v. Hall, 55 Minn. 22, 21 L. R. A. 675, 56 N. W. 351, the doctrine was announced that, where persons are incapable of acting for themselves, as in the case of lunatics, they are entitled to the protection of the courts, and proceedings will be instituted under its direction. Suit may be brought in their name, and the court will authorize some suitable person to carry it on as next friend or guardian ad litem; and the power of the district courts to exercise such authority is not taken away by the provisions of the general statute authorizing the probate courts to appoint general guardians for insane persons. In Beall incompetent asked that his name might be stricken out as coplaintiff on the ground that he had been joined without his authority, being falsely alleged in the writ to be of unsound mind.—It was held that the court of chancery, in the exercise of its general jurisdiction to allow lunatics and persons of unsound mind to sue by their next friends, had power, in case of a dispute as to the condition of the mind of the alleged insane person, to direct an inquiry to ascertain whether his condition of mind was such as to incapacitate him from instituting proceedings himself. Inquiry was accordingly directed.

A petition on behalf of a lunatic, not so found, confined in an insane asylum in New South Wales, was presented in Re Barlow, L. R. 36 Ch. Div. 287, 56 L. J. Ch. N. S. 795, 57 L. T. N. S. 95, 35 Week. Rep. 737, by the master in lunacy in New South Wales as next friend, asking for the transfer to him of a fund which had accumulated from the income of a portion of the estate of a testator in England to which the lunatic was entitled for life. This petition was entertained and dealt with without any question being raised as to the right of the next friend to institute the proceedings.

Where, after a suit in chancery had been instituted, the plaintiff became incapable to transact business and to comply with an order of the court to file an affidavit of documents, it is held in Cardwell v. Tomlinson, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 957, 52 L. T. N. S. 746, 33 Week. Rep. 814, upon motion of defendant to dismiss the action, that the action still subsisted, and the plaintiff should have leave to amend by adding a next friend. It is said in the opinion that the practice of the court at all times has been that a person incapacitated from conducting an action himself might do so by means of a next friend.

And a suit by information and bill was instituted on behalf of a lunatic not so found, by her next friend, in Atty. Gen. v. Wilkinson, L. R. 2 Eq. 817, 12 Jur. N. S. 593, 14 L. T. N. S. 725, 14 Week. Rep. 910, and the right to do so was apparently conceded, not being discussed.

Upon a petition in bankruptcy by the mother and next friend of a lunatic, not so found, praying that the affidavit directed by statute to be made by the bankrupt on the allowance of his certificate might be dispensed with, and that the commissioners be directed to sign the certificate without such affidavit, it was held, in Es parte May, 2 Mont. D. & DeG. 381, to be sufficient if the affidavit were made by someone else. 64 L. R. A.

v. Smith, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 245, 29 L. T. N. S. 625, 22 Week. Rep. 121, James, L. J., said: "The law of the court of chancery undoubtedly is that in certain cases, where there is a person of unsound mind, not found so by inquisition, and therefore incapable of invoking the protection of the court, that protection may in proper cases, and if and so far as may be necessary and proper, be invoked on his behalf by any person as his next friend." In Jones v. Lloyd, L. R. 18 Eq. 265, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 826, 30 L. T. N. S. 487, 22 Week. Rep. 785, the plaintiff, who sued by a next friend, was a lunatic, but had not been so found by inquisition, and he sought to dissolve a partnership of which he was a member, on the ground of his mental condition. The juris-

The question of the propriety of the form of the petition is not discussed.

But, that a liquidation petition in bankruptcy cannot be filed by a next friend in the name of a lunatic not so found by inquisition, is decided in Es parte Cahen, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 183, 39 L. T. N. S. 645, 27 Week. Rep. 387. The court said that it seemed to him utterly impossible that any man should be able to say, for a lunatic, that he was unable to pay his debts and desired to have his affairs liquidated, adding that possibly, if he had been found a lunatic by inquisition, the court of lunacy might think that this course would be for his interest, and might be able to act on his behalf, but that the court of bankruptcy had no such jurisdiction.

A writ on behalf of a person of unsound mind, not so found, suing by next friend, was entertained and dealt with in Vane v. Vane, L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 124, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 381, 34 L. T. N. S. 613, 24 Week. Rep. 602, without anything being said as to the propriety of the form of action, that apparently being conceded.

The latest English authority upon the subject is that of Didisheim v. London & W. Bank, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 443 [1900] 2 Ch. 15, 82 L. T. N. S. 738, 48 Week. Rep. 501, in which it is held that an action in the name of a lunatic not so found may be maintained by a next friend for the recovery of the lunatic's personal property, without the sanction of the court in lunacy, in the absence of any lunacy proceedings, and that a foreign curator of a lunatic, domiciled and resident abroad, may sue in England as such next friend. Lindley, M. R., says in his opinion that in chancery it has long been the settled practice to institute suits in the names of lunatics, not so found by inquisition, by a next friend.

The case of ISLE v. CRANBY seems to be in accord with the weight of authority in the United States in holding that a person of unsound mind, who has not been adjudged insane, and for whom no conservator has been appointed, may bring a suit by next friend. It is said in this case, in discussing Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, where the right to sue by next friend is denied, though it does not appear whether or not a conservator had been appointed, that, if the doctrine of that case is that a bill will not lie in the name of a lunatic or insane person who has not been adjudged insane, or who has no conservator, by his next friend, it is contrary diction to entertain the suit before the plaintiff had been "found" a lunatic was strenuously denied. On this question the master of rolls said: "Can a suit be instituted by the lunatic, not found so by inquisition, by his next friend? I have no doubt it can. There is authority upon the subject, and it seems to me so distinct that I have no occasion really to refer to the reason. . . . But, independently of authority, let us look at the reason of the thing. If this were not the law, anybody might, at his will and pleasure, commit waste on a lunatic's property, or do damage or serious injury and annoyance to him or his property, without there being any remedy whatever. In the first place, the lords justices or the lord chancellor are not always sitting for applications in lunacy. In the next place, if they were, everybody knows it takes a considerable time to make a man a lunatic by inquisition, and his family sometimes hesitate about making him a lunatic, or hope for his recovery, and take care of him in the meantime without applying for a commission in lunacy. Is it to be tolerated that any person can injure him or his property without there being any power in any court of justice to restrain such injury? Is it to be said that a man may cut down trees on the property of a person in this unfortunate state, and that, because no effort of his can be made, no member of his family can file a bill in his name, as a next friend, to prevent that injury? Is it to be allowed that a man may make away with the share to the weight of authority, and is in conflict with later decisions of the court and must be deemed to have been overruled.

And it is said, obiter, in Pyott v. Pyott, 191 Ill. 280, 61 N. E. 88, that, before an inquisition of lunacy, the rule that now obtains in both England and the United States is that a lunatic may sue in his own name by some proper person appointed or recognized by the court as the next friend or guardian ad litem for the insane person.

So, likewise, it is said, in Dudgeon v. Watson, 23 Blatchf. 161, 23 Fed. 161, that any person may volunteer to act as next friend, and bring a suit for an insane person, when no committee has been appointed, and the court will entertain it and decide its merits. The point actually decided, however, was as to the sufficiency of a plea by the defendant of the insanity of the plaintiff who brought the action, without the intervention of any other person.

And in Wager v. Wagoner, 53 Neb. 511, 73 N. W. 937, it is said that the cases holding that a lunatic may not sue by next friend are for the most part those where a guardian or committee has been appointed, or where, as in Ohio and Illinois, the statute makes adequate provision for suing in another manner. In this case it is held that an action may be brought on behalf of an insane person, by a volunteer as next friend, where there has been no adjudication of insanity, and no guardian appointed.

A person non compos mentis may sue by next friend before and without inquisition of lunacy, but one who thus voluntarily institutes such a suit always proceeds at his peril,—peril that the alleged non compos may not in fact be so, and may recover and repudiate the interference; or that the chancery court may not consider him a suitable person, and may disallow his intermeddling. Whetstone v. Whetstone, 75 Ala. 495.

Upon an information by the attorney general to set aside a deed made by a person of unsound mind, not so found, it was held, in Pennington v. Thompson, 5 Del. Ch. 328, after an extensive review of the authorities, that the proper proceeding was a bill in the name of the incompetent by his next friend. It was contended that a trustee duly appointed after inquisition of lunacy was the only person competent to bring the suit, but the court said that the idea that a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition, cannot, by a next friend, 64 L. R. A.

invoke the interference of a court of chancery must be owing to the old notion on the subject of a person not being permitted to disable or stultify himself; and it was held that, without the appointment of a trustee, the court had authority to act in the exercise of its inherent and original power to declare such a conveyance void.

It was strongly insisted in Reese v. Reese, 89 Ga. 645, 15 S. E. 846, that no suit can be brought in behalf of a lunatic or person non compos mentis, except by a legal guardian appointed after the question of sanity or insanity has been tried by a commission of lunacy as provided by the Code. But the court held that there was no statutory provision preventing a lunatic who is without legal guardian from suing by any competent person as his next friend, and that it knew of no reason which should preclude one from claiming the protection of the courts until his mental status is adjudicated and a legal guardian appointed.

In Arkansas it is expressly provided by statute (Gantt's Dig. § 4486) that the action of a person judicially found to be of unsound mind must be brought by his guardian, or, if he has none, by his next friend; and the court said in Jetton v. Smead, 29 Ark. 372, an action for the recovery of personal property, in which defendants objected that plaintiff was non compos mentis, and had no lawful curator or guardian, that, if the plaintiff was in fact insane before suit, he should properly have sued by his next friend, though no inquisition had been held by the proper court, but that it was not certain that his failure to do so would be cause for abating the suit. However, as the objection of the defendants was not filed until after several continuances and after the trial had commenced, it was held properly stricken out by the court.

Likewise, in Kentucky the right to sue by next friend is, where no committee has been appointed, granted by statute (Civil Code, § 35, subs. 3), and in Howard v. Howard, 87 Ky. 616, 1 L. R. A. 610, 9 S. W. 411, it is held that such a suit on behalf of one of weak mind by next friend is authorized both by the Code and under the general chancery practice. The court said that, in respect to allowing a lunatic having no committee to sue by next friend, the Code made an innovation upon the elementary chancery practice which did not allow a lunatic to sue by next friend, but that in reference to persons of of a lunatic in a partnership business, or take away the trust property in which he is interested, without this court being able to extend its protection to him by granting an injunction at the suit of the lunatic by a next friend, because he is not found so by inquisition? I take it those propositions, when stated, really furnish a complete answer to the suggestion that he cannot maintain such a suit." In Denny v. Denny, 8 Allen, 311, it is held a court of chancery has authority to entertain a petition filed by a third party representing that the libellant for divorce is insane, and, if such insanity is established, the court will appoint a guardian ad litem to conduct the cause for the libellant. The court, on page 313, says: "The doctrine, as stated in Story, Eq. Pl. §

66, is that, where persons are incapable of acting for themselves, although not strictly idiots or lunatics, the suit may be brought in their name, and the court will authorize some suitable person to carry it on as their next friend. In every such case it is in the discretion of the court to allow the case to proceed or not. In Malin v. Malin, 2 Johns. Ch. 240, the chancellor says: 'A person incompetent to protect himself, from age or weakness of mind, or from some religious delusion or fanaticism, quem urget fanaticus error, vel iracunda Diana, ought to come under the protection of the court.'"

Neither is the power of the court to act upon this subject taken away by the provisions of §§ 5 and 6 of the chancery act (1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. chap. 22, pp.

weak or unsound mind such section by allowing them to sue by next friend simply declared a rule of chancery practice.

In an earlier Kentucky case, that of Wilson v. Oldham, 12 B. Mon. 55, tried before the enactment of the Code provision, a suit in equity by a person of unsound mind, by his next friend, was sustained against the contention that a lunatic cannot sue by next friend. The court said that this question did not arise in the case, as the complainant did not appear to be a lunatic, and did not sue as such, the bill alleging that he was an old man of great mental weakness, unable to protect himself against imposition, but not alleging that he was a lunatic. After quoting from Mitford's Pleading, to the effect that persons incapable of acting for themselves, though not idiots or lunatics, have been permitted to sue by next friend, the court added that it could not be denied that the complainant, though of weak intellect, could sue in his own name without a next friend, and that were there no authority on the subject, it could not be supposed that the mere addition to his name of the phrase "by his next friend" would vitiate his suit.

So, in Newcomb v. Newcomb, 13 Bush, 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222, also decided before the Code went into effect, it is held that a person of unsound mind, who has no committee, and who has never been found a lunatic by any judicial proceeding, may institute an action by her next friend.

A bill on behalf of an insane person, filed by his next friend, asking for the appointment of a receiver to collect rents of real estate of the incompetent and manage his business until a conservator could be appointed, on the ground that the estate was being wasted by the mismanagement of one who had obtained from the incompetent a pretended power of attorney, was sustained in Roughan v. Morris, 87 Ill. App. 642. Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, supra, II., was distinguished in this case, the court saying that, if the purpose of the present suit was the termination of the agency created by the power of attorney and for an accounting, it would be governed by the Covington Case, and a bill for such purpose would not be brought by one volunteering as next friend, but that here the purpose of the bill was merely to preserve the estate until a conservator might be appointed. The court added that it seemed clear that it was not intended in the Covington Case to hold that a suit by next friend might not in any case be allowed, and that there is a distinction between an attempt to procure equitable relief in chancery by setting aside a deed of a lunatic (as in the Covington Case) and an effort merely to protect the estate of a lunatic until a committee or conservator could be appointed.

And the right of a lunatic for whom no committee has been appointed to sue by his next friend is recognized in Ryder v. Topping, 15 Ill. App. 216, and it was held that the mere fact that the suit was brought without leave of court was no ground for dismissing it. Illinois Rev. Stat. 1884, chap. 86, § 13, provides that, where a conservator has been appointed, it shall be his duty to represent his ward in all suits and proceedings, but permits the court to appoint a next friend to commence or prosecute a suit, even though there is a conservator, but it was held that, even if it was thus made a matter of discretion with the court to permit a suit to be so brought, there should be some reason for refusing it before the suit will be dismissed.

In New Jersey a suit may, by leave of court, be maintained in a court of chancery by a next friend on behalf of a lunatic who has not been so found by inquisition. Collins v. Toppin, 63 N. J. Eq. 381, 51 Atl. 833. The bill in this case did not state that the next friend had been appointed by the court, but the order of the chancellor granting leave to file the bill by next friend was produced, and, in distinguishing Palmer v. Sinnickson, 59 N. J. Eq. 530, 46 Atl. 517, supra, II., the court said that he could not believe that the vice chancellor in that case would have held the bill demurrable because of its failure to recite that the next friend had been appointed by the court, if the facts had shown that he had actually been so appointed. As to the statement of the chancellor in Dorshelmer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438, infra, IV. a, that he had found no case or authority in which it is held that persons of unsound mind may sue by next friend, either voluntarily, or upon appointment for that purpose, the court said, after examining the authorities on the subject, he came to the conclusion that the rule stated is confined to cases where there has been an adjudication of lunacy and the appointment of a committee, and that, if there is none, the court may order suit to be brought by next friend.

And the right of a next friend to institute a suit for a person of unsound mind is impliedly 560, 562), or § 13 of the act upon lunatics, etc. (2 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. chap. 86, p. 2666). Under a statute substantially the same in Massachusetts, where the probate courts have the exclusive jurisdiction to appoint guardians for the persons and estates of lunatics, the supreme court of that state sustains this view, and holds that the provisions of the statute do not limit the powers of the court in which an action is brought by or on behalf of a lunatic to appoint a guardian or next friend to appear in his behalf. To the same effect is Plympton v. Hall, 55 Minn. 22, 21 L. R. A. 675, 56 N. W. 351.

No authority has been cited holding that a bill will not lie in the name of a lunatic or insane person by his next friend, when he has no conservator, except it be that of Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764. While it does not clearly appear from the opinion in that case that George W. Covington, in whose name the bill was filed by his next friend, Alexander Covington, then had a conservator, we are inclined to think, from a careful reading thereof, that such was the case, in which event the suit should have been brought by the conservator, and not in the name of the lunatic by his next friend. Especially was this true as it appears that the next friend was not appointed by the court, but seems to have been a mere volunteer. On the other hand, if the doctrine of that case is that a bill will not lie in the name of a lunatic or insane person who has not recognized in Kidder v. Houston (N. J. Eq.) 47 Atl. 336, where a bill was filed on behalf of a person simple-minded and non compos from her birth, by her next friend, to quiet title and set aside a mortgage sale. Laches in bringing the suit was urged as a defense, but it was held that limitations could not run against an imbecile, and that the laches of the next friend in bringing the suit could not be imputed to the incompetent. The propriety of the form of action was not discussed. This case is said, in the preceding case of Collins v. Topplin, to have been brought by the next friend by leave of the court, but that leave was granted by the court does not appear from the case itself.

The right is also recognized in Lamb v. Lamb (N. J. Eq.) 23 Atl. 1009, where a person old and feeble-minded, though not actually insane, having been permitted to proceed with her case until her testimony was all produced before any objection to her right to maintain the action was made, the court refused to dismiss the bill, and appointed a next friend to continue the suit for her. It was insisted that she could only sue by guardian, citing Dorsheimer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438, and Norcum v. Rogers, 16 N. J. Eq. 484, infra, IV. b, but the court said that, however forcibly these cases might apply to proceedings instituted by volunteers in the name of another who has been actually adjudged insane, it had not been the practice in New Jersey to apply this rule to cases like the present, in which complainant was not actually insane, but only feeble-minded and incapable of managing her affairs, and had no guardian.

On the petition of the solicitors of a person who, though not a lunatic, was, by reason of old age, incapable of transacting business, to have reinstated an action brought by her for the cancellation of a deed because of fraud, but which she had ordered to be dismissed, the court held, in Owings's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 370, 17 Am. Dec. 311, that as an imbecile adult might be permitted to sue in that court by his next friend (citing 1 Mont. Dig. 39), the suit should be reinstated and the solicitors allowed to conduct it, subject, however, to the control of the court should there be any occasion for its interference.

In Denny v. Denny, 8 Allen, 311, it is said that the doctrine as stated in Story's Equity Pleading, § 66, is that, where persons are incapable of acting for themselves, although not strictly idiots or lunatics, the suit may be brought in their name, and the court will authorize some suitable person to carry it on as next friend, but that in every such case it is in the discretion of the court to allow the suit to proceed or not. This, however, was not a suit by one suing as next friend on behalf of a lunatic, but a petition by the children of a libellant in a divorce suit asking the court to appoint a guardian ad litem for the libellant on the ground that she was insane.

In Smith v. Smith, 106 N. C. 498, 11 S. E. 188, it was held that there can be no question but that a person non compos mentis may sue by his next friend when he has no general or testamentary guardian, citing N. C. Code, § 180. But the court also cites, in support of the right of a next friend to sue for a lunatic, several leading English cases, and says that, when there has been no inquisition of lunacy, the right to so sue is well settled. A new trial was granted in this case on other grounds, and the action was dismissed upon the second trial, and costs taxed against the next friend, but upon appeal such taxation of costs was held error. See Smith v. Smith, 108 N. C. 365, 11 S. E. 188.

Likewise, in Abbott v. Hancock, 123 N. C. 99, 31 S. E. 268, it is held that an insane person may sue by his next friend, though there has been no inquisition of lunacy. This was an action by a woman and her husband suing by the wife as next friend, and the wife had been regularly appointed next friend by the clerk of the superior court in the mode prescribed by rule 16 of that court.

Where, in an action of ejectment brought by a lunatic, which was prosecuted by a person appointed by the court on her own motion as next friend of the plaintiff, the objection that no suit could be brought in the name of a lunatic was made for the first time on appeal, it was held, in Rankin v. Warner, 2 Lea, 302, that the objection came too late. But the court also held that, even if the objection had been taken in proper form, it could not have availed; that the object of the rule requiring a next friend in the prosecution of suits for the use of persons under disability is to have someone responsible for costs and liable to judgment therefor, and against whom the court may make and enforce its orders, and for the more especial purpose that there may be someone before the court capable of looking after, taking care of, and protecting the interests of those incapable of understanding and defending their own rights.

And that a bill may be filed on behalf of a been adjudged insane, or who has no conservator, by his next friend, it is contrary to the weight of authority, and is in conflict with the later decisions of this court, and must be deemed to have been overruled, as it clearly appears that a lunatic or person of unsound mind who has not been adjudged insane or who has no conservator, may sue by his next friend.

The next question that arises on this record is, What is the proper course to pursue in case the person who is alleged to be of unsound mind appears in court and protests that he is not of unsound mind, and that the suit was instituted and prosecuted without his authority, and against his will, and asks that the same be dismissed? The presumption is that all adult persons are of sound mind, and capable of managing their own affairs, and caring for their estate; and the mere fact that it is alleged in an affidavit filed in support of a motion by a person asking that he be appointed the next friend to a particular person, who, it is alleged, is of unsound mind, and not capable of taking care of his own affairs, does not destroy that presumption. Neither would such presumption be rebutted by the order of the court, based upon ex parte affidavits, appointing such person, and permitting him to file a bill in the name of and on behalf of the person who is alleged to be of unsound mind, as his next friend. Such motions are usually made in behalf of persons alleged to be of unsound mind, by some friend; and it is presumed, we think, in the absence of any-person of unsound mind by her next friend, either before or after inquisition of lunacy, where there is no committee or guardian, is held in Parsons v. Kinzer, 3 Lea, 346.

A dictum in Pelham v. Moore, 21 Tex. 756, states the rule in equity to be, as shown by the cases cited by Judge Story in the notes to his Equity Pleadings, that, if a lunatic have no guardian, or his interests clash with those of his committee, an information may be exhibited on his behalf by the attorney general. This would seem to imply that an action could not be brought on behalf of an incompetent by next friend; but that question was not discussed, the action in this case having been brought by the lunatic himself.

In Abrahams v. Vollbaum, 54 Tex. 226, a suit having been brought by a party for himself and as next friend, for his minor brother and sister, and for his mother alleged to be non compos mentis, though not so found, to enjoin the selling, under a deed of trust, of a tract of land, it was held that the proper procedure at the time this suit was instituted and tried was to apply to the court to appoint a special guardian, and that it was error to allow the suit to proceed in the name of the next friend. But it was pointed out that the Revised Statutes have omitted this requirement.

And in the later case of Holzheiser v. Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 33 S. W. 887, brought after the passage of the Revised Statutes, the right to maintain a suit by next friend on behalf of a person who from his birth had been of unsound mind, though never so adjudicated, is sustained. The court calls attention to the fact that since the change in the law by the Revised Statutes omitting the requirement of a special guardian to represent the non compos the law had been recognized, in the case of infants, as authorizing suits on their behalf by next friend, instead of by special guardian, and said that he thought the same rule existed as to suits in behalf of idiots and lunatics. The fact that provision was made for the appointment of guardians for such persons, the court held should no more be held to prohibit suits in their favor by the next friend when no guardian had been appointed than such suits in behalf of minors are prevented by a like provision.

This case is cited in Edwards v. Edwards, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 87, 36 S. W. 1080, to sustain the decision that a court of equity has jurisdiction 64 L. R. A.

to entertain a suit by next friends of an alleged incompetent to have conveyances of land made by her set aside on the ground of fraud and undue influence, although she is not of such unsound mind as to be declared a lunatic and an attempt to have her so declared has failed, where she is, nevertheless, so incapacitated by disease, decrepitude, or other infirmity as to require the protection of a court of equity against the undue influence and fraud of others.

In Mills v. Cook (Tex. Civ. App.) 57 S. W. 81, a judgment for the cancellation of a deed on the ground that plaintiff at the time it was made did not possess sufficient mental capacity to execute it was reversed on the ground that there was evidence to show that such mental incapacity existed, if at all, at the time of the institution of the suit; and that, if the plaintiff relied upon insanity to execute the deed, and the facts averred and proved did not show that she had regained her mental condition, the court should, upon another trial, if she were not represented by a guardian, permit the suit to be conducted for her benefit by some one as next friend.

It is said in Owings's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 290, that, according to the loose proceedings of the land office, it seems that a warrant of resurvey was obtained by his next friend for the benefit of one who was then non compos mentis, although not found so by inquisition, citing Land, H. A. 180.

In Wentz's Appeal, 76 Conn. 405, 56 Atl. 625, an appeal by an insane person suing by his next friend was taken from a decision denying an application by the next friend for the appointment of a conservator for the incompetent. The appeal was entertained and dealt with without anything being said as to the right to so sue.

b. In actions affecting real estate.

The question of the right of a next friend to sue on behalf of a lunatic in an action affecting the latter's real estate is one which has been passed upon in but few cases, and it is doubtless now settled that the rule in such actions is no different from that in any other action. There is no American case in which the question whether or not any distinction exists between actions affecting real estate and other actions has been discussed and decided. In Stephens v. Porter, 11 Heisk. 341, the right to prosecute a suit for partition on behalf of an insane person by next friend is expressly recognized, but nothing is said to indicate that the court considered an action for partition to be governed by any thing appearing to the contrary, that whatever consent to the bringing of the suit such person is capable of giving has been obtained, and that it is, in fact, his suit. But when he makes known to the court that it is not his suit; that he is competent to take care of his own affairs, and that the supposed friend is a mere intermeddler,—what should the court do? The individual liberty of the person is involved, and his right to dispose of his property as he may see fit. These are rights which he cannot be deprived of by any court, unless it be made to appear that by reason of the condition of his mind he has become incapable of taking care of his property. We see no reason, however, under our practice, why this question cannot be properly disposed of in the cause different rule than that governing other actions. It is not entirely clear whether this action was brought before or after an adjudication of lunacy, but it seems probable that there had been no inquisition.

That a bill for partition cannot be filed by next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, is held in Halfhide v. Robinson, L. R. 9 Ch. 373, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 398, 22 Week. Rep. 448, 30 L. T. N. S. 216. It was held that the proper course, if it were desirable to avoid the expense of an inquisition of lunacy, was to proceed under the lunacy regulation act of 1853, and Lord Justice James, writing the opinion, said: I desire it to be clearly understood that I do not think a bill can be filed on behalf of a person of unsound mind for dealing with his real estate. In this case, it appearing that one of the defendants was absent from the country, which would prevent the property from being sold at public sale, the other defendant offered to purchase the shares of his two cotenants, and, this offer being sanctioned by the court, this petition was presented in the suit asking for an order vesting plaintiff's share in the property in the purchaser.

But in Watt v. Leach, 26 Week. Rep. 475, which was also a partition action, although it is assumed that Halfhide v. Robinson was correctly decided, it is held that that case is no longer law since the passage, in 1876, of 39 and 40 Vict. chap. 17, § 6, under which the next friend of an insane person might "request a sale;" and that, that being so, the next friend might also institute an action for sale, the section having to that extent altered the law since the decision in Halfhide v. Robinson.

And Halfhide v. Robinson, L. R. 9 Ch. 373, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 398, 22 Week. Rep. 448, 30 L. T. N. S. 216, is distinguished in Porter v. Porter, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 420, 58 L. T. N. S. 688, 36 Week. Rep. 580, in which an action by a person of unsound mind, not so found, by his next friend, asking for a sale of real estate, was sustained. The decision in the lower court was based on the ground that since the partition act of 1876 Halfhide v. Robinson was no longer law, but, upon appeal to the supreme court of judicature, the court stated that, although no doubt the case of Halfhide v. Robinson raised a difficulty, it was not there laid down that no bill could be filed for partition by a person of unsound mind, by his next friend; that, notwithstanding then pending in court, either by the chancellor, or by submitting the question to a jury, should a jury be demanded. In the Pyott Case, on page 289, 191 Ill., page 91, 61 N. E., it is said: "When the mental capacity of a party to a proceeding arises for determination as an issue in a case in chancery (other than bill to contest a will), the better practice is to cause the question of sanity to be submitted to a jury for an advisory verdict; but the court is not without jurisdiction to hear and determine the question without a jury, and even upon verdict rendered by a jury the court may decline to accept the finding of the jury, and decide for itself the issue, upon the evidence presented in the case."

standing the statement of James, L. J., in that case, that he wished it to be understood that a bill could not be filed by next friend for dealing with the real estate of a person of unsound mind not so found, he thought that, taking into consideration the fact that the court was not asked to carry out an order for sale made in a partition action, that the application was apparently not under any provisions of the partition act, and that the petition was presented, not for carrying the decree into effect, but for vesting the share of the person who was of unsound mind in one of the other parties to the action. All that James, L. J., meant to decide was that the course taken was not the proper course; that there should have been a petition to the lords' justices under the lunacy regulation act of 1862. The judge adds that, if he had felt that James, L. J., had really decided the point involved in the present case, such respect was due to his opinion that he should not have given the judgment which he did give. In a concurring opinion Bowen, L. J., speaks of this statement of James, L. J., as to the right to bring an action by next friend to deal with the real estate of an incompetent as a dictum, but, since the judge expressly raised the question of the authority of the next friend to file the bill, and stated so plainly his opinion that such a bill could not be filed by next friend, the statement can hardly be treated as mere dictum. Bowen, L. J., in his concurring opinion argues at considerable length that, since the true ground upon which a next friend is allowed to institute proceedings on behalf of a person of unsound mind, not so found, is that such person stands in need of the protection or intervention of the court, and that, in case he would, if sane, be entitled to such protection or intervention, a stranger may do that which is clearly for the benefit of the incompetent, the reason would apply as well to an action for partition, where that would be for the benefit of the lunatic, as to any other action not dealing with real estate. It was, therefore, said that the question to be decided was not whether the act of 1876 created this right, but whether it destroyed it, and that there was nothing in that act which would prevent an action for partition being brought in any case where it could be brought before that act was passed.

And an action for the recovery of land and for damages, instituted by the next friend of plaintiff, a person of unsound mind not so found, claiming to be the owner in fee of the premises, 610, 1 L. R. A. 610, 9 S. W. 411, this identical question was before the Kentucky court of appeals. After having held it was proper to commence a chancery suit in the name of a person of unsound mind by his next friend, when he has no conservator, the court, in disposing of the question, said: "The court, in such a state of case, is presented with the question, What is the proper course to pursue? The individual liberty of the person is involved. His right to dispose, of himself [provided he does not interfere with the rights of others], also of his property, by sale, gift, or otherwise, as he pleases, is at once recognized as an absolute right, which he cannot be deprived of by any court of the land,—not even the highest,—unless it be made to appear that he by age, disease, or other cause has ceased to be a man by so far losing his mind as to be incapable of taking care of his property, and has become the victim of shrewd and designing persons. But when he puts in issue the charge that he has thus ceased to be a man, and has become a mere hulk, how is the fact to be determined? It seems to us that the issue which thus involves his personal liberty should be settled by his peers,—a jury of his country; and for that purpose the chancellor should issue his writ out of chancery, directing an inquiry by a jury into the fact as to whether the mind of the person is so impaired by age, disease, or otherwise as to render him incapable of understanding and appreciating his property rights to such an extent as to render him is held in Waterhouse v. Worsnop, 59 L. T. N. S. 140, to be authorized by order 16, r. 17, which provides that, when lunatics and persons of unsound minds, not so found by inquisition, might, before the passing of the practice act, have sued as plaintiffs, they may sue as plaintiffs in any action by their committee or next friend, according to the practice of the chancery division. It was contended by counsel for defendant, relying on Halfhide v. Robinson, that before order 16, r. 17, was made, there was no jurisdiction in the court of chancery to deal with real estate of a person of unsound mind not so found, and that this rule made no change; but, without discussing this contention, the action was held properly instituted and the writ regular.

IV. After inquisition of lunacy.

a. In general.

In all cases in which idiocy or lunacy has been found on inquisition a court of equity will not allow a suit to be brought on behalf of an idiot or lunatic by a next friend nominated by himself or appointed by the court; but his guardian or committee must join in the suit. Dorshelmer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438. The court states that he finds no case or authority in which it is held that an idiot or lunatic may sue in equity by a next friend.

And the vice chancellor, in Collins v. Topplin, 63 N. J. Eq. 381, 51 Atl. 933, says, in speaking of this statement, that the authorities all agree that idiots and lunatics must sue in equity by their committees or guardians; that this is undoubtedly true when they have been found such on inquisition, and committees have been appointed.

An action in the name of a person judicially found to be of unsound mind cannot be maintained by his next friend, since Iowa Code, § 2569, requires that all actions on behalf of a person judicially found to be of unsound mind must be brought by his guardian, or, if he has none, by a guardian appointed by the court for the purposes of the action. Tiffany v. Worthington, 96 Iowa, 560, 65 N. W. 817.

So, in Chavannes v. Priestley, 80 Iowa, 316, 9 L. R. A. 193, 45 N. W. 766, which was an action by a person adjudged to be insane, for libel, the court held that under Iowa Code, § 2569, a person adjudged insane, and for whom a guardian has been appointed, can sue only in the name of his guardian. Nothing is said as to the right to sue by next friend, but the plain implication is that, under the statute, an action by the guardian is the only proper mode of procedure.

In Penington v. Thompson, 5 Del. Ch. 328, the court said that all the text writers, supported by the judicial decisions, say that idiots and lunatics must sue in courts of equity by the committees of their estates, and that such doubtless is the case where committees exist.

And that a lunatic for whom a conservator has been appointed must sue by the conservator, and not by his next friend, is recognized in LSLA v. CRANBY, where, in discussing the case of Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 648, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, in which the right of a lunatic to sue by next friend is denied, it is said that, while it does not clearly appear that a conservator had been appointed in that case, the court was inclined to think, from a careful reading of the opinion, that such was the case; in which event the suit should have been brought by the conservator.

And a dictum in Pyott v. Pyott, 191 Ill. 280, 61 N. E. 88, states that after an inquisition and appointment of a conservator for an insane person under the statutory provisions on the subject all suits and proceedings in his behalf should be brought by the conservator, unless his interests are adverse to those of his ward, or for other sufficient reason the court shall deem it better to appoint some other person as next friend to appear and prosecute for such insane person.

Likewise, a dictum in Owings's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 290, says that a lunatic—that is, one who has been found and returned to be non compos mentis—can sue only by his committee.

But a suit in equity to annul the marriage of a person adjudged to be a lunatic may be maintained by his next friend although a committee of his person and estate has been previously appointed under D. C. Code, § 1286, which specifically provides that a proceeding to declare the nullity of a marriage of an idiot or lunatic may be instituted by next friend; but the committee should be made a party defendant to such suit. Mackey v. Peters (App. D. C.) 31 Wash. L. Rep. 504. But this decision is expressly limited to a suit to annul the marriage, that being said by the court to be a peculiar proceeding, and to have been specifically provided for by the Code,—and that undoubtedly the general rule is that when a committee has been appointed for a luunable to protect himself against designing persons; and upon the verdict of the jury, if in the affirmative, the chancellor should appoint a committee for the person, and allow him to prosecute the suit in his name; but, if the verdict should be in the negative, then the suit should be dismissed, unless the court, from the evidence before the jury, should deem it proper to take other steps in reference to the matter."

We see no good reason why it should be held that the circuit court should be ousted of jurisdiction as soon as the person who it is claimed is of unsound mind, through an attorney, appears, and asks that the suit be dismissed; but think that the court, having taken jurisdiction of the case by the appointment of a next friend, and having allowed the bill to be filed, has the right to determine for itself the question of whether or not it should retain jurisdiction by investigating the mental condition of the complainant either by hearing the evidence and passing upon the question, or by submitting the question to a jury; otherwise the very object of allowing the suit to be commenced might be defeated by the defendant procuring an attorney, in the name of the complainant, to appear without the knowledge of the complainant, and who, by reason of his mental incapacity, was incapable of taking any action in the case, by employing an attorney or otherwise, and moving that the cause be dismissed. Persons of unsound mind, incapable of caring for themselves or their property, are the special wards of a natic all suits for his benefit, or for the benefit of his estate, should be instituted by such committee.

While the right of a lunatic not so found to sue by next friend is sustained in Didisheim v. London & W. Bank, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 443 [1900] 2 Ch. 15, 82 L. T. N. S. 738, 48 Week. Rep. 501, it is said in the opinion that, when a lunatic has been so found by inquisition, the court of chancery will stay a suit instituted in his name until the appointment of a committee.

But in Re Gordon, L. R. 10 Ch. 192, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 208, 32 L. T. N. S. 348, 23 Week. Rep. 760, after an inquisition of lunacy and the appointment of a committee, leave was given to a son of the lunatic to file a bill as next friend to impeach a settlement made by the lunatic at a time when there was reasonable ground for believing he was of unsound mind.

The court said, in Bird v. Bird, 21 Gratt. 712, that it is clear that, when there is a committee, every suit respecting the person or estate of a lunatic must be instituted by the committee.

This case is relied upon in Cole v. Cole, 28 Gratt. 365, to obtain the dismissal of a suit in equity, brought in the name of a person of unsound mind by his next friend and committee, on the ground that the suit could be maintained only by the committee. The court, however, said that the bill, which was in the name of the incompetent, "who, being a person of unsound mind, sues by his next friend and committee," was substantially a suit by the committee; and that, if there was any defect in the bill, the objection should have been made in the circuit court, where, by amendment, the error, if any, might have been corrected.

b. Where interests of committee and lunatic clash.

In Melick v. Melick, 17 N. J. Eq. 159, it is said, arguendo, that a lunatic ordinarily sues only by his committee or guardian; but, if the guardian has an interest adverse to that of the lunatic, he may sue by the attorney general, or by next friend specially appointed by the court. In Norcom v. Rogers, 16 N. J. Eq. 484, it is held that a lunatic sues only by his committee or guardian, who is responsible for the conduct of the suit, or by the attorney general or next friend, where the interests of the guardian clash with those of the lunatic. This was a bill exhibited by a lunatic in his own name against his guardian.

In all cases where the interests of the committee clash with those of the lunatic, it is said, in Bird v. Bird, 21 Gratt. 712, that the lunatic should be permitted to institute a suit in his own name, with some responsible party named as next friend.

In Bonner v. Evans, 89 Ga. 656, 15 S. E. 906, it is said that, if a next friend, suing in behalf of a lunatic, can maintain an action for waste by the guardian, or recover money in his hands, it can be done only in connection with a proceeding to remove the guardian and revoke his letters. In this case a judgment in favor of the next friend, for a sum of money alleged to have been misappropriated by the guardian, without any disposition of the case in so far as it related to the removal of the guardian, which was asked in the petition, was held contrary to law.

In an action against the guardian of an insane person, seeking, among other things, his removal and an accounting, brought by a next friend, it was held, in Tiffany v. Worthington, 96 Iowa, 560, 65 N. W. 817, that an action in the name of a person judicially found to be of unsound mind cannot be maintained by his next friend; since Iowa Code, § 2569, requires all actions on behalf of a person judicially found to be of unsound mind to be brought by his guardian, or, if he has none, by a guardian appointed by the court for the purposes of the action.

The right of a lunatic to sue by his next friend is evidently conceded in Wood v. Throckmorton, 26 Colo. 248, 57 Pac. 698, which was an action by the brother of a lunatic, as his next friend, to remove a conservator of the lunatic's estate; the point discussed and decided being whether or not the removal of the conservator would be for the lunatic's benefit. The court says that, persons non compos mentis not being able to judge for themselves as to the bringing of an action, their rights must be presented to the court for adjudication through the intervention of a next friend or someone authorized to represent him, though not every action instituted by a next friend should be permitted to continue; that proper and necessary suits for the benefit of the incompetent should be encouraged; but that it is in the discretion of the court to allow an action so instituted to proceed or not, as it may be governed by a consideration of its necessity for the protection of the inter-court or chancery, and the chancellor has the power to investigate, with or without a jury, the question of the mental capacity of the complainant, and to determine whether he will retain jurisdiction of the case, and not force the party out of court, and into the county court, to adjudicate the question of the mental condition of the complainant before a jury in that tribunal, which, by reason of the delay incident thereto, might lead to the entire loss or sacrifice of the complainant's rights. When the solicitor appeared on behalf of Henrietta Sack-man, and moved the court to dismiss the case, and the court was asked to set that motion down for hearing, and to investigate the mental condition of said Henrietta Sackman, the court, in declining so to do, and in dismissing the cause, committed reversible error.

The judgment of the Appellate Court and the decree of the Circuit Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for such other proceedings as are not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

ests of one mentally incapable of judging in this respect for himself.

An implied recognition of the right of an insane person to sue by next friend is made in Clark v. Crout, 34 S. C. 417, 13 S. E. 602. This was an action between the administrators of the estate of a deceased idiot and the administrators of his committee, in which mention is made of a former suit by the idiot, who had been judicially declared such, suing by his next friend, against his committee, for an accounting. It was held that a settlement of that suit, whereby it was agreed in writing that the committee should be discharged from further liability, but should provide proper maintenance for the lunatic for life, did not prevent the administrators of the lunatic's estate from demanding from the committee, or his representatives, an account of the lunatic's estate, where the settlement was never presented to, or signed by, the judge. The propriety of the form of action in this previous suit is not discussed, apparently being conceded.

c. Where committee refuses to act.

In Row v. Row, 53 Ohio St. 249, 41 N. E. 239, which was an action in the name of an imbecile to recover property alleged to have been obtained from her through fraud, the petition in which stated that her guardian refused to bring such action, and it was, therefore, brought by the next friend, a demurrer was sustained to the petition on the ground that, if the guardian refused to bring the action, he should have been removed and another guardian appointed. The court said that it could not be tolerated that the rights and property of an imbecile should be controlled by a next friend in opposition to the wishes of the guardian.

d. Where no committee has been appointed.

A bill may be filed on behalf of a person of unsound mind by her next friend, either before or after an inquisition of lunacy, where there is no committee or guardian. Parsons v. Kinzer, 3 Lea, 346. In this case the incompetent had been found lunatic by the verdict of a jury, and this bill was filed after the inquisition for a construction of a certain item of her father's will. The court said that the text writers concur in the statement that a person of unsound mind may sue by next friend either before or after an inquisition of lunacy,—at any rate where there is no committee or guardian; and that the weight of authority is in accord.

And a suit in equity by next friend, on behalf of a person judicially declared to be a lunatic, but for whom no conservator had been appointed, was entertained in Van Buskirk v. 64 L. R. A.

Van Buskirk, 148 Ill. 9, 35 N. E. 383. The court apparently considered the proceeding an entirely proper one, and, in disposing of the question of laches in bringing the suit, said that the rights of the lunatic could not be prejudiced by the fact that the next friend did not bring the suit immediately after the declaration of lunacy.

When no committee has been appointed for a lunatic, it is said, in Bird v. Bird, 21 Gratt. 712, that he may be permitted to institute a suit in his own name, by some responsible party as next friend.

Where, after the institution of a suit on behalf of a person of unsound mind, by a mere stranger calling himself a next friend, the plaintiff was found lunatic by inquisition, though no committee was appointed, it was held, in Beall v. Smith, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 245, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, 29 L. T. N. S. 625, 22 Week. Rep. 121, that every proceeding and order taken or made in the suit after the inquisition was irregular and void,—as much so as if it had been taken or made after the lunatic's death. While the court conceded the right of an insane person to sue by next friend before a finding of lunacy, it was said that, if the plaintiff be found lunatic by inquisition, so as to come under the control and protection of the court of lunacy, there is no pretext for continuing the officious protection of a self-constituted guardian. Some decisions or dicta to the effect that a suit is abated by the appointment of a committee were referred to, and it was contended from this that there could be no abatement until such appointment. But this contention was held unsound, the court saying that it is not because a committee has been appointed, but because the Crown, by its proper tribunal, has the lunatic and all his affairs under its exclusive care and protection; that the power of any person to commence or prosecute any proceeding for his protection is taken away.

e. Where committee has died or been removed.

In Gillespie v. Hauenstein, 72 Miss. 838, 17 So. 602, which was a suit in equity on the bond of a deceased guardian of a person declared insane after inquisition, the bill was filed by a person as guardian and next friend of the incompetent. It was alleged that the bill did not show that the one filing it had ever been appointed guardian, and that he had no authority to prosecute the action as guardian and next friend; also that the inquisition of lunacy and the appointment of the first guardian were void. All the court says is that the suit was properly brought by the lunatic suing by his guardian and next friend, without discussing the validity of the inquisition, or whether or not the next friend suing had ever been appointed guardian by the court.

A suit in equity in the name of a lunatic, by her next friend, against the former committee of the plaintiff, to surcharge and falsify the accounts of the committee, was sustained in Bird v. Bird, 21 Gratt. 712, against the objection that a lunatic is incompetent to maintain an action, except through the intervention of a committee. The court admitted that ordinarily suits must be instituted by the committee, but said that when the committee has been removed, as in this case, the lunatic should be permitted to institute a suit in his own name with some responsible party named as next friend and approved by the court. The force of this decision is weakened, perhaps, by the fact that, the objection to the form of action not having been made until the hearing of the case upon appeal, the court said the defendant must be considered to have waived the objection by his silence.

1. In case of nonresident having no committee within jurisdiction.

In Cook v. Thornhill, 13 Tex. 293, 65 Am. Dec. 63, which was an action in the name of an incompetent by her next friend to recover the possession of two slaves, it was contended that, as the lunatic was a resident of Virginia, where she had been adjudged a lunatic and a committee appointed, she could not bring a suit by next friend in another state, where neither she, her committee, nor her next friend, resided; that idiots and lunatics must appear by the committees of their estates when they have any. A previous suit had been instituted by the plaintiff by her next friend in Mississippi, where judgment was recovered for the slaves or their value, and the court in the present case held that the record of the judgment recovered in Mississippi established the right of the plaintiff to recover in the name and capacity in which she was now suing; that her right to sue by next friend was matter material and traversable in that suit, and that, as to that matter, the judgment was final and conclusive.

In Pelham v. Moore, 21 Tex. 756, where the plaintiff had been adjudged a lunatic in another state, and brought an action in his own name, the court said that, if he were a resident having a guardian, no doubt the action ought to be brought by his guardian; but that, being a non-resident, having neither a guardian nor a committee authorized to sue in his behalf within the state, it seemed that, if he could sue at all, it must be by information, or by the appointment by the court of someone to sue in his behalf as next friend.

In Thiery v. Chalmers [1900] 1 Ch. 80, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 122, 81 L. T. N. S. 511, 48 Week. Rep. 148, which was an action by a person described to be of unsound mind, not so found, resident and domiciled in France, by his next friend and his tuteur, to recover certain money and securities held by the defendants as the lunatic's bankers, the court held that where there has been a judicial declaration of the status of lunacy, and the applicant on the lunatic's behalf has the latter's property vested in him, an application for the transfer or payment of that property may be granted; that under these circumstances no difficulty arises from the fact that the lunatic is described as a person of unsound mind not so found, and, therefore, sues by his next friend; that in truth, although the action was properly framed as it stood, the tuteur might have sued in his own name. The lunatic in this case had in fact been so declared in France, and the tuteur appointed by a family council, which, according to French law, vested in him the whole estate of the lunatic.

And an application on behalf of a person, who, after judicial inquiry by the Royal Bavarian court, had been found to be of unsound mind and made a ward of the court, presented by her next friend, who was a judge of that court, asking that a fund standing in court in England to her credit might be sold and the proceedings paid to the deposit commission of the court, was entertained and considered in Re Linden [1897] 1 Ch. 453, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 295, 76 L. T. N. S. 180, 45 Week. Rep. 342, without any discussion or decision as to the propriety of the form of the application.

A bill in chancery on behalf of a nonresident lunatic duly adjudged to be such in England, filed by his next friend, was entertained and disposed of in Speck v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 121 Ill. 33, 12 N. E. 213, without anything being said as to the propriety of the form of action.

V. Distinction between suits in equity and at law.

a. In general.

It is said in Stock on the Law of Non Compotes Mentis, chap. 2, p. 32, that the incapacity of persons non compotes mentis to sue or defend in the King's courts is of a very partial nature, and varies greatly according to the jurisdiction, whether legal or equitable, civil or criminal, under which the proceeding took place; that the incapacity to sue or defend in equity is more considerable than at law. This seems to have been true as to persons judicially found to be insane, the old rule at law apparently being that, in actions at law, a lunatic should appear by guardian if within age, and by attorney if of full age; but that, in equity he must sue by the committee of his estates; and that in such a suit the committee, as well as the lunatic, should be a party. But when a person is in fact insane, but has not been judicially so declared or placed in charge of a committee or guardian it seems that the courts, whether of law or equity, have always had jurisdiction to entertain suits brought by one as next friend of the insane person. Buswell, Insanity, § 120; Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 6th Am. ed. p. 9.

It is said in 1 Fonblanque, Eq., that bills in chancery to set aside conveyances and settlements by idiots and lunatics ought properly to be brought by the attorney general, and it is true that sometimes informations have been exhibited by the attorney general on behalf both of idiots and lunatics, considering them as under the peculiar protection of the Crown,—especially if the interest of the committee has clashed with that of the lunatic; but it has been held that in such cases a proper relator ought to be named (Atty. Gen. v. Tiler, 1 Dick. 378, 2 Eden, 230), which would seem to be the same as requiring a next friend to be joined. And in Daniel's Chancery Pleading & Practice, 6th Am. ed. p. 82, it is stated that, although in certain cases suits may be instituted in the form of informations by the attorney general, yet the proper course to proceed to assert their rights in equity is by a suit in the name of the lunatic, which, as he is a person incapable in law of taking any steps on his own account, is brought by the committee of his estate, if any, or, if none, by his next friend.

This distinction between suits at law and in equity is not discussed in many of the cases, and in the United States seems to be ignored except in a few states. Since a large proportion of the states has now by statute abolished the distinction between actions at law and in equity generally, there have been collated in this division only those cases which were decided before the enactment of such statutes, or in which this distinction has been discussed. Nor have cases decided under the express provisions of statutes granting or denying the right to sue by next friend, without referring to any distinction between suits at law and in equity, been included here.

In England, also, an attempt was made by the judicature act of 1878, as amended in 1875, to abolish the distinction between suits at law and in equity. It should, therefore, seem that in that country the question of the right of a lunatic to sue by next friend is not now affected by the nature of the action, whether legal or equitable; and this is confirmed by the latest English case on the subject,—Didlsheim v. London & W. Bank, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 443, [1900] 2 Ch. 15, 82 L. T. N. S. 738, 48 Week. Rep. 501,—in which it is said that the notion that, either at law or in equity, an action or suit cannot be successfully maintained if brought in the name of a lunatic not so found by inquisition, without the sanction of the Crown, is not supported by authority or sound principle. This was an action in the nature of a common-law action of detinue, in the name of a lunatic suing by his next friend, and the right to so sue was sustained. It is also said in the opinion that, in chancery, it had long been the settled practice, before the judicature act, to institute suits in the names of lunatics, not so found by inquisition, by next friend. The right to sue in this way, both at law and in equity, is thus recognized.

In Nebraska there is no distinction as to the right of an insane person, not so found by inquisition, to sue by next friend, between cases at law and in equity. The procedure is the same. Wager v. Wagoner, 53 Neb. 511, 73 N. W. 937.

And in Holzheiser v. Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. 11 Tex. Civ. App. 677, 33 S. W. 887, it is said that the authorities show that in courts of law and equity a recognized mode of prosecuting suits for the protection of the interests of idiots, lunatics, and parties non compos mentis, when no guardian or committee has been appointed, is by next friend.

b. In equity.

Idiots and lunatics must sue in equity by their committees or guardians. Dorshelmer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438. The court states that the authorities all agree to this, and that he has found no case in which it is held that they may sue in equity by next friend, either voluntarily or upon appointment for that purpose.

But this statement is criticized in Collins v. Topplin, 63 N. J. Eq. 381, 51 Atl. 933, where the chancellor says that, after examining the authorities on the subject, he came to the conclusion that the rule stated is confined to cases where there has been an adjudication of lunacy and the appointment of a committee, and that, if there is none, the court may order suit to be brought by next friend.

And when a person is only partially incapable, as one merely deaf and dumb, it is conceded in Dorshelmer v. Roorback, supra, that a court of equity may appoint a next friend to be joined with him in the suit, and to conduct it for him.

In Mellick v. Mellick, 17 N. J. Eq. 159, and Norcom v. Rogers, 16 N. J. Eq. 484, the right to sue in equity by next friend where the interests of the lunatic clash with those of his committee is recognized.

And a suit in chancery by next friend of a lunatic was entertained in Kidder v. Houston (N. J. Eq.) 47 Atl. 336, the right to so sue not being contested.

While in Lamb v. Lamb (N. J. Eq.) 23 Atl. 1009, a next friend was appointed by the court to conduct a suit for a person of unsound mind, against the contention that she could only sue by guardian.

But a demurrer was sustained in Palmer v. Sinnickson, 59 N. J. Eq. 530, 48 Atl. 517, to a bill in equity filed by next friend in behalf of an insane person, because it failed to show that the next friend had been appointed by the court.

The right of an imbecile adult to sue in a court of equity by next friend is recognized in Owings's Case, 1 Bland Ch. 370, 17 Am. Dec. 311.

The chancellor, in Penington v. Thompson, 5 Del. Ch. 328, says that he takes it to be settled law that in all cases in equity, where idiots and lunatics are parties plaintiff and have committees, they must sue by the committees of their estates; and that there is no exception to this rule, unless in cases where the interests of the committees clash with those of the idiots or lunatics. But the right to sue in equity by next friend where there has been no inquisition of lunacy is sustained, the court saying that the idea that a person of unsound mind, not so found, cannot, by a next friend, invoke the interference of a court of chancery to set aside instruments or other gifts obtained by persons taking fraudulent advantage of his mental weakness must be owing to the old notion on the subject of a person not being permitted to stultify himself.

And in Whetstone v. Whetstone, 75 Ala. 495, it is held that, where a brother has constituted himself a trustee or agent for his insane sister without the inquisition of lunacy, and has taken her estate into his control and management, she being of weak and imbecile mind, equity has jurisdiction to entertain a suit on her behalf, by next friend, to bring his executors to a settlement.

It is stated in Howard v. Howard, 87 Ky. 616, 1 L. R. A. 610, 9 S. W. 411, that Ky. Civil Code, § 85, subs. 3, which permits any person of unsound mind who has no committee to sue by next friend, made an innovation, in respect to allowing a lunatic having no committee to sue by next friend, upon the elementary chancery practice, which did not allow a lunatic to sue by next friend; but that, in reference to persons of weak or unsound mind, such section, by allowing them to sue by next friend, simply declared a rule of chancery practice.

And in the two earlier cases of Wilson v. Oldham, 12 B. Mon. 55, and Newcomb v. Newcomb, 13 Bush, 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222, both of which were suits in equity tried before the enactment of the Code, the right of a person of unsound mind, who has never been declared a lunatic, to sue by next friend, is sustained.

. And the right to bring a suit for partition by next friend on behalf of a lunatic is recognized in Stephens v. Porter, 11 Helsk. 341, which was a suit in chancery to set aside a sale under partition proceedings, said in the headnote to have been brought by next friend.

And Chancellor Kent stated, in Malin v. Malin, 2 Johns. Ch. 238, that, if a person has religious scruples as to becoming a party to a suit, perhaps he may become plaintiff by prochein ami; and that a person incompetent to protect himself from age or weakness of mind, or from some religious delusion or fanaticism, ought to be protected by the court.

And in Dudgeon v. Watson, 23 Blatchf. 161, 23 Fed. 161, and Pyott v. Pyott, 191 Ill. 280, 61 N. E. 88, which were suits in equity, it is said, obiter, that a suit for an insane person may be prosecuted by next friend when no committee has been appointed.

So, the right to sue by next friend was sustained in Parson v. Kinzer, 3 Lea, 346, and Bird v. Bird, 21 Gratt. 712, which were both suits in equity.

In Denny v. Denny, 8 Allen, 311, it is said that the doctrine, as stated in Story's Equity Pleading, § 66, is that where persons are incapable of acting for themselves, though not strictly idiots or lunatics, the suit may be brought in their name, and the court will authorize some suitable person to carry it on as next friend; but that in every such case it is in the discretion of the court to allow the suit to proceed or not.

But in Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, it is held that a bill in equity cannot be maintained in the name of a lunatic or insane person by his next friend, to set aside a deed made by the incompetent, but such a suit can only be maintained by a conservator, who has the custody and control of the estate and rights of the lunatic. The court said that whatever might be the rule of law in an action to recover money did not affect the question here, as this was a proceeding in equity, and rested upon a different principle.

This case, however, is distinguished in Roughan v. Morris, 87 Ill. App. 642, where a bill in chancery was filed by next friend on behalf of an insane person, asking for the appointment of a receiver to collect rents of real estate of the incompetent and manage his business until a conservator could be appointed, on the ground that the estate was being wasted by the mismanagement of one who had obtained from the incompetent a pretended power of attorney. The court said that, if the purpose of the suit was the termination of the agency created by the power of attorney and for an accounting, it would be governed by the Covington Case, and a bill for such purpose would not lie when brought by one volunteering as next friend, but that here the purpose of the bill was merely to preserve the estate until a conservator might be appointed. That it should seem upon principle that a court of chancery should have power to protect the estate of an insane person until a conservator could be appointed, though the jurisdiction of the chancellor to thus appoint a receiver could not be maintained upon the ground alone that the subject-matter of the suit was a matter proper for equitable cognizance,—that is, the agency, the waste, and the right to an accounting,—for, in respect to such relief as the complainant might be entitled to in 64 L. R. A.

these matters, the suit could not be maintained by one volunteering as next friend, but that it should seem that the suit might be maintained under the general chancery power to protect the estates of lunatics. The court added that it seemed clear that it was not intended in the Covington Case to hold that a suit by next friend might not in any case be allowed, that there was a distinction indicated between an attempt to procure equitable relief in chancery by setting aside a deed of a lunatic who appears only by next friend (as in that case), and an effort merely to protect the estate of the lunatic through suit brought by next friend until a committee or conservator might be appointed to represent him. It was therefore held that while, under the decision in the Covington Case, the suit could not be maintained for the ultimate purpose, alone, of annulling the deed by which the agency of the defendant was created, nor for obtaining an accounting alone, yet it might be maintained for the sole purpose of protecting the estate of the lunatic until a conservator might be appointed.

Although these two cases seem to indicate that in Illinois the jurisdiction of chancery to entertain suits on behalf of insane persons when brought by next friend is limited, nevertheless, in Speck v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 121 Ill. 33, 12 N. E. 213, a bill in chancery on behalf of a nonresident lunatic, duly adjudged to be such in England, by his next friend, to vacate and set aside a sale of land under a decree of the court in a partition suit, was entertained and dealt with without anything being said as to the right of the lunatic to thus sue.

So, also, in Van Buskirk v. Van Buskirk, 148 Ill. 9, 35 N. E. 383, a bill on behalf of a person judicially declared to be a lunatic, but for whom no conservator had been appointed, was filed by his next friend to have a resulting trust declared in favor of complainant in a certain tract of land, and for an accounting of the rents and profits, and for such other relief as equity might require. Since these two bills, filed by next friends, seeking, not merely to preserve the estate of the lunatic until the appointment of a conservator, but to procure the fullest equitable relief, were entertained and dealt with by the court without any question being raised as to the propriety of the form of action, it should seem that the right of the lunatic to thus sue in equity by next friend was conceded.

And in the case of ISLE V. CRANBY, which was a suit in chancery on behalf of an insane person by his next friend, it is said, in discussing the Covington Case, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, that, if the doctrine of that case is that a bill will not lie in the name of a lunatic or insane person who has not been adjudged insane, or who has no conservator, by his next friend, it is contrary to the weight of authority, in conflict with the later decisions of the court, and must be deemed to have been overruled.

So, also, the right is expressly recognized in Ryder v. Topping, 15 Ill. App. 216, where a bill in chancery was filed by a next friend against persons who held in trust for an insane person certain money left for his support by his father's will, alleging waste and mismanagement on the part of the trustees, and asking for an accounting. The court held that, although ordinarily it is the duty of the committee to represent a lunatic, the court had power, under the statute, to appoint a next friend to represent his interests in a pending suit, and that the mere fact that suit was brought by next friend without leave of court was no ground for dismissing it.

And the right to thus sue in chancery is impliedly recognized in Ronan v. Bluhm, 173 Ill. 277, 50 N. E. 894, where one of the complainants filing a bill in chancery was an insane person appearing by next friend, and also in Brown v. Riffin, 94 Ill. 560, in which a bill in chancery was filed on behalf of an insane person by his next friend to contest the validity of a will. In neither of these cases is the form of action discussed, the right to so sue being apparently conceded.

In Gillespie v. Hauenstein, 72 Miss. 838, 17 So. 602, a suit in equity on behalf of a lunatic by one calling himself his guardian and next friend was sustained against the objection that the person filing the bill had not been appointed guardian, and had no authority to sue.

But the right of next friend to bring a suit for divorce on behalf of an insane person is denied in Worthy v. Worthy, 36 Ga. 45, 91 Am. Dec. 758.

The law of the court of chancery on this subject is stated in Beall v. Smith, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 245, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, 29 L. T. N. S. 625, 22 Week. Rep. 121, to be that in certain cases where there is a person of unsound mind, not found so by inquisition, and, therefore, incapable of invoking the protection of the court, that protection may, in proper cases, be invoked on his behalf by any person as next friend, but that every person so constituting himself the guardian and protector of a person of unsound mind does so entirely at his own risk, and must be prepared to vindicate the necessity and propriety of his proceedings if they are called in question, and to bear the consequences of any unnecessary and improper proceeding. The court adds that it must be borne in mind that unsoundness of mind gives the court of chancery no jurisdiction whatever; that it is not by reason of the incompetency, but notwithstanding it, that the court entertains the proceedings; that it can exercise only such equitable jurisdiction as it could under the same circumstances have exercised at the suit of the person himself if of sound mind. An essential element of such a suit is said to be that the plaintiff must be of unsound mind, and that he should not have been so found by inquisition.

This statement of the rule of the court of chancery is quoted as authority in Jones v. Lloyd, L. R. 18 Eq. 265, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 826, 30 L. T. N. S. 487, 22 Week. Rep. 785, but nothing further is said to indicate what distinction, if any, there is between the right to sue by next friend in equity and the right to so sue at law.

It was claimed in Light v. Light, 25 Beav. 248, that a person of unsound mind could sue in a court of chancery only by a committee duly appointed in lunacy, but, without any discussion of the question, the right of the lunatic to sue by next friend was sustained.

So, in Howell v. Lewis, 65 L. T. N. S. 672, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 89, 40 Week. Rep. 88, it is said that the court of chancery, in the exercise of its general jurisdiction to allow lunatics and persons of unsound mind to sue by their next friends, has power, in case of a dispute as to the condition of the mind of the alleged insane person, to direct an inquiry to ascertain the condition of his mind.

While in Cardwell v. Tomlinson, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 957, 52 L. T. N. S. 746, 33 Week. Rep. 814, which was a suit in chancery, it is said that the practice of the court at all times has been that a person incapacitated from conducting an action himself might do so by means of a next friend.

In Nelson v. Duncombe, 9 Beav. 211, 15 L. J. Ch. N. S. 296, 10 Jur. 399, which was a suit in equity, there is a dictum to the effect that a bill may be filed in the name of a person of unsound mind, though not so found, by anyone professing to be his next friend.

Other English cases decided before the passage of the judicature act in which suits in equity by next friend on behalf of an insane person not so found have been entertained, without anything being said as to whether the rule governing such suits in equity differed from the rule at law in regard thereto, are: Eyre v. Wake, 4 Ves. Jr. 795; Re Law, 30 L. J. Ch. N. S. 512, 7 Jur. N. S. 410; Re Macfarlane, 2 Johns. & H. 673, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 335, 8 Jur. N. S. 208, 6 L. T. N. S. 154, 10 Week. Rep. 369; Palmer v. Walesby, L. R. 3 Ch. 732, 16 Week. Rep. 924; Wilkinson v. Harwood, 4 Jur. 957; Atty. Gen. v. Wilkinson, L. R. 2 Eq. 817, 12 Jur. N. S. 593, 14 L. T. N. S. 725, 14 Week. Rep. 910; West v. Davis, Rolls 1863, W. No. 83; and the unreported case of Fisher v. Mellie, M. R. 1870, F. 3.

While in Re Gordon, L. R. 10 Ch. 192, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 208, 32 L. T. N. S. 348, 23 Week. Rep. 760, and Carr v. Boyce, 13 Ir. Eq. Rep. 102, such suits were entertained after an adjudication of lunacy.

And a suit in equity by next friend on behalf of one deaf and dumb was sustained in Liney v. Wetherley, Ld. Red. 30, n.

c. At law.

In New Jersey Idiots and Lunatics may sue at law by next friend to be appointed by the court. Dorshelmer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438.

And an action at law for ejectment, prosecuted on behalf of a lunatic by next friend appointed by the court, was sustained in Rankin v. Warner, 2 Lea, 302.

Also, in Wilson v. Ansley, 47 Ga. 278, a legal proceeding by next friend on behalf of an insane person was sustained.

Cameron v. Pottinger, 3 Bibb, 11, and Buchanan v. Rout, 2 T. B. Mon. 114, were both actions at law in which the question of the right to sue by next friend did not arise, but they are included here as impliedly denying the right, since the court in both cases said that a lunatic, or one who becomes non compos mentis, must sue by guardian if within age, or by attorney if of full age. In both these cases the lunatics had been so adjudged and committees appointed. Nothing is said as to any distinction between suits at law and in equity, but, since the rule stated is that which undoubtedly governed actions at law under the old common-law rules, and these suits were at law, it may be inferred that the court intended to limit its decision to the particular form of action then before it.

As to the right of a lunatic to sue at law in Illinois, Ryder v. Topping, 15 Ill. App. 216, supra, V. b, refers to Chicago & P. R. Co. v. Munger, 78 Ill. 300, where it is held that, until the appointment and qualification of a conservator, he may maintain an action at law in his own name without anyone to represent him. It should seem that, as he may sue at law without anyone to represent him, there could be no objection to suing in a legal action by a next friend, and this right is apparently conceded in the Covington Case, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, supra, V. b.

In King v. McLean Asylum, 12 C. C. A. 139, 21 U. S. App. 407, 64 Fed. 325, a petition for habeas corpus on behalf of an insane person was filed by next friend, and the right to so recognized.

While in King's Case, 161 Mass. 46, 36 N. E. 685, in which a petition for habeas corpus was filed by a stranger on behalf of an insane person, it is said that when the person imprisoned is brought into court, if a minor or of unsound mind, a next friend or guardian ad litem may be appointed by the court.

An action at law on behalf of an idiot, prosecuted by next friend, was sustained in Dennis v. Dennis, 2 Wms' Saund. 328, 2 Keble, 691. But the old common-law rule, which, while recognizing the right of an idiot to so sue, required an action on behalf of one non compos to be brought by guardian or attorney, is set forth in this case.

Actions at law by a wife in the name of her insane husband, to recover a debt due him, were sustained in Gleddon v. Trebble, 9 C. B. N. S. 367, and Rock v. Slade, 7 Dowl. P. C. 22, 1 Arnold, 346, 2 Jur. 993. It is not here stated that the wife sued as next friend, but the cases are often cited to sustain the right to thus sue, and they seem to be substantially the same in principle as a case brought by one expressly designated a next friend.

VI. Conclusion.

While there is some conflict as to the right of an insane person to institute proceedings by next friend, it is pretty well settled that where a person is actually insane, but has not been judicially declared so, actions both at law and in equity may be maintained on his behalf by a next friend. In some states, as in New Jersey, it is necessary that the next friend should be appointed by the court, while in others it is held that any person may volunteer to act as next friend; though in such cases it has sometimes been said that it is in the discretion of the court to permit the suit to proceed, and that a volunteer takes the risk of being held liable for costs if the court sees fit to dismiss the suit or to account to the lunatic in case he recovers his mind.

The authorities are harmonious in holding that in all cases where a person is not actually insane, but is incapable, through age or weakness of mind, from conducting his own affairs, suits may be maintained on his behalf by his next friend.

But where a person has been judicially declared of unsound mind, and a committee appointed, a majority of the cases holds that all suits should be brought by his committee, unless the interests of the committee clash with those of the lunatic, in which case most of the authorities hold that a next friend may prosecute an action, though some declare that a special guardian should be appointed to conduct the suit.

However, notwithstanding an inquisition of lunacy and the appointment of a committee, in one case a son was permitted to file a bill as next friend to impeach a settlement made by the lunatic at a time when he was alleged to be

And actions have been maintained by next friend after a finding of lunacy and appointment of a guardian where such finding and the appointment of the guardian were made in another country or state, and there was no guardian in the jurisdiction where the action was brought. Re De Linden [1897] 1 Ch. 453, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 295, 76 L. T. N. S. 180, 45 Week. Rep. 342; Cook v. Thornhill, 13 Tex. 293, 65 Am. Dec. 63; Thiery v. Chalmers, [1900] 1 Ch. 80, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 122, 81 L. T. N. S. 511, 48 Week. Rep. 148; Speck v. Pullman Palace Car Co. 121 Ill. 33, 12 N. E. 213, supra, IV. f.

So, where there has been a finding of lunacy within the jurisdiction, but no committee has been appointed, it has been held that an action may be maintained by next friend. Parsons v. Kinzer, 3 Lea, 346, supra, IV. d.

But the contrary was held in Beall v. Smith, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 245, L. R. 9 Ch. 85, 29 L. T. N. S. 625, 22 Week. Rep. 121, supra, IV. d.

The only American cases, other than those governed by statute, that deny the right of a lunatic to sue by next friend in terms broad enough to include lunatics not so found, as well as those judicially pronounced insane, are Covington v. Neftzger, 140 Ill. 608, 33 Am. St. Rep. 261, 30 N. E. 764, supra, II.; Dorsheimer v. Roorback, 18 N. J. Eq. 438, supra, II., IV. a; and Palmer v. Sinnickson, 59 N. J. Eq. 530, 46 Atl. 517, supra, II. But in Covington v. Neftzger and Palmer v. Sinnickson it is not clear that there had been no adjudication of lunacy, and the Covington Case has been practically overruled by later decisions of the same court, while in Palmer v. Sinnickson the denial of the right was based on the fact that the petition failed to show that the next friend had been appointed by the court, as required by the New Jersey practice. In Dorsheimer v. Roorback there had been an adjudication of lunacy, and, although the rule there laid down against the right to so sue expressly includes lunatics not so found, the case has been criticised in the later case of Collins v. Toppin, 63 N. J. Eq. 381, 51 Atl. 933, supra, III. a, and the rule held to be limited to cases in which the lunatic has been judicially declared such, and a guardian appointed. And, in any event, these decisions affect only suits in equity, and not actions at law.

The English cases are unanimous in holding that, before an inquisition of lunacy, an insane person may sue in a court of equity by his next friend. Under the old common-law rule a lunatic could not sue at law by next friend, but was required to appear by attorney if of full age, or by guardian if within age. But an idiot, though required to appear in person, was permitted to sue by next friend. Cd. Litt. 135b; Dennis v. Dennis, 2 Wms' Saund. 328, note; Bacon, Abr. title, Idiots and Lunatics, g.

But this distinction between idiots and lunatics is not observed in the United States, and the distinction between the right to sue at law or in equity has been considered in but few cases, that point being usually ignored. And, since a large number of the states have now, by statute, abolished the distinction between law and equity, this question is of little importance. In England, also, an attempt was made by the judicature act of 1873, as amended in 1875, to do away with the distinction between legal and equitable actions, and, according to the latest English case on the subject, a lunatic may now sue by next friend in that country, either at law or in equity. Didshelm v. London & W. Bank, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 443, [1900] 2 Ch. 15, 82 L. T. N. S. 738, 48 Week. Rep. 501, supra, V. a.

But it has been held that a liquidation petition in bankruptcy cannot be filed by a next friend in the name of a lunatic not so found by inquisition. Ex parte Cahen, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 183, 39 L. T. N. S. 645, 27 Week. Rep. 387, supra, III. a.

And the right of a next friend to file a bill for partition on behalf of a lunatic not so found is denied in Halfhide v. Robinson, L. R. 9 Ch. 373, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 398, 22 Week. Rep. 448, 30 L. T. N. S. 216, supra, III. b; but this case is no longer law.

Informations have, indeed, been exhibited by the attorney general on behalf of idiots and lunatics, considering them as under the peculiar protection of the Crown,—especially where the interests of the committee and lunatic clash. But the propriety of this form of action in the United States has been denied (Penington v. Thompson, 5 Del. Ch. 328, supra, III. a.). And it is said in Bird v. Bird, 21 Gratt. 712, supra,

IV. a, b, d, e, in regard to this question, that the practice has sometimes been pursued in England, because there the custody and the care of the persons and estates of lunatics devolve upon the lord chancellor, in virtue of his general power as holding the Great Seal and Keeper of the King's conscience; that the attorney general, as the law officer of the Crown, is authorized to institute suits in their behalf in the form of Informations, but that here the custody, control, and management of the estates of lunatics are regulated by statute, and that it is clear, therefore, there is no analogy between the practice pursued here and that followed in the English courts.

There have been some implied denials in this country of the right to sue by next friend in some of the early cases, as in Buchanan v. Rout, 2 T. B. Mon. 114, supra, II., and Cameron v. Pottinger, 3 Bibb, 11, supra, II., where it is said that a lunatic must appear by guardian if within age or by attorney if of full age. These cases were both actions at law, and the decisions may be presumed to have been limited to such actions, and not to affect suits in equity. In any case, however, they are not in accord with the present weight of authority.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Pauline S. MURRAY

v.

J. T. WILCOX, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A defendant in a criminal case, coming into the state to attend the trial, both as a witness and in accordance with the obligations of his bail bond, is exempt from service of process in a civil action during the pendency of the proceedings, and for such reasonable time thereafter as is necessary for his return to the state of his residence.
2. A statute prescribing in what manner appearance may be made in an action has no effect upon a rule exempting nonresidents from suit while in the state as witnesses or parties to an action.
3. Motion to set aside the service is the appropriate remedy for a nonresident who is served with process while in the state as a defendant in a criminal action.

(January 16, 1904.)

recover damages for alleged breach of promise of marriage, in which the process was served on defendant while in the state as a party to another action. Reversed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

On January 1, 1902, the plaintiff filed her petition alleging that defendant had promised to marry her, and, because of his failure to comply, she had been greatly damaged. The original notice was duly served in Story county, and on the 14th day of the same month the defendant filed a motion to set aside the service, and that he be discharged on three grounds: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction of his person; (2) that the service of the notice conferred no such jurisdiction; and (3) that defendant, when served with the original notice, was exempt from service of civil process or notice in Iowa, and especially in Story county. This motion was supported by an affidavit of defendant to the effect that since September 1, 1901, he had been a bona fide resident of Nebraska, with home at Wood River, in that state; that at the August, 1901, term of the district court of Story county, two indictments for felonies had been returned by the grand jury against him, on which a requisition had issued by the governor of this state; that by virtue thereof he was arrested in Nebraska, and brought to Story county, where he gave bail for his appearance, and then returned to his home; that at the October, 1901, term of court in said county said indictments were set for trial; that for the sole and only purpose of attending as a party and as a witness in his own behalf he returned from his home in Nebraska to Story county on the 23d of October, 1901, and on that day was put on trial for the offense charged in one of the indictments, and acquitted; that thereupon the other indictment was dismissed; that he intended to and did return to his home at Wood River, Nebraska, on the first railroad train leaving in that direction after these proceedings, but before he could do so the original notice herein was served upon him. This motion was overruled, Judge Kenyon then presiding, and at a subsequent term of court default and judgment were entered, Judge Richard presiding. The defendant appeals.

Mr. Tom H. Milner, for appellant:

The full purpose and intention of the statute regarding appearances is carried out if it be held that, by filing this motion, we appear in the action. We say to the court: "While it is true that we are here in court both in fact and in law, yet it is also true that we ought not to be detained herein, or required to plead to plaintiff's petition because our rights have been violated in this: We were served with a notice at a time when and at place where we were privileged and exempt from service, and we came into court, and now here claim our privilege and exemption, and ask the court to recognize and enforce the same by setting aside the service of such notice, and discharge the defendant."

This court would have jurisdiction in the absence of an appearance by the defendant.

No appearance for appellee in supreme court.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The immunity from service of civil process of a witness while attending a trial in a state other than that of his residence to give evidence seems to be universally recognized. The privilege protects him in coming, in staying, and in returning, if he acts in good faith, and without unreasonable delay. Sherman v. Gundlach, 37 Minn. 118, 33 N. W. 549; Mitchell v. Huron Circuit Judge, 53 Mich. 541, 19 N. W. 176; Thompson's Case, 122 Mass. 428, 23 Am. Rep. 370; Person v. Grier, 66 N. Y. 124, 23 Am. Rep. 35. See note to Mullen v. Sanborn, 25 L. R. A. 721. As to whether a party is entitled to a like exemption there is some conflict in the authorities. In Bishop v. Vose, 27 Conn. 1, the defendant, a resident of another state, had come to Connecticut to attend the trial of a case which he had caused to be brought, and he was held not exempt from the service of summons; but in Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Wilson, 23 Blatchf. 51, 22 Fed. 803, 51 Conn. 595, it was decided otherwise as to a nonresident defendant whose attendance was necessary both as a witness and to instruct his counsel; the reason for the distinction being that a plaintiff, having sought the aid of the courts of another state, ought not to shrink from being subjected to their control, while the attendance of the defendant may be said to be compulsory. In Baldwin v. Emerson, 16 R. I. 304, 27 Am. St. Rep. 741, 15 Atl. 83, 64 L. R. A.

17 Atl. 913, however, this distinction was disregarded, and the reason for exempting either a plaintiff or a defendant in a civil action, because of being a nonresident, from service of summons, was declared "fanciful, rather than substantial." See also Ellis v. De Garmo, 17 R. I. 715, 19 L. R. A. 561, 24 Atl. 579. But a different view has been taken by the great weight of authority, declaring both party and witness alike entitled to the privilege. First Nat. Bank v. Ames, 39 Minn. 179, 39 N. W. 308; Letherby v. Shaver, 73 Mich. 500, 41 N. W. 677; Fisk v. Westover, 4 S. D. 233, 46 Am. St. Rep. 780, 55 N. W. 961; Re Healey, 53 Vt. 694, 38 Am. Rep. 713; Andrews v. Lembeck, 46 Ohio St. 38, 15 Am. St. Rep. 547, 18 N. E. 483; Matthews v. Tufts, 87 N. Y. 568; Wilson v. Donaldson, 117 Ind. 356, 3 L. R. A. 266, 10 Am. St. Rep. 48, 20 N. E. 250; Halsey v. Stewart, 4 N. J. L. 367. As a party may testify in his own behalf in this state, there is no room for the distinction made between parties and witnesses, save, possibly, as suggested in the Connecticut cases. The reasons for exemption of service of process have been so often stated that repetition seems superfluous. They relate to the free and unhampered administration of justice in our courts, and are as applicable to service of summons or original notice as the beginning of an action by arrest on civil process under the old common-law practice. Said Elliott, J., in Wilson v. Donaldson, 117 Ind. 356, 3 L. R. A. 266, 10 Am. St. Rep. 48, 20 N. E. 250, concerning the exemption: "It is his privilege, under our laws, to testify in his own behalf; and this privilege should not be burdened with the hazard of defending other actions in our forums. Our own citizens will often derive a substantial benefit from the personal appearance of a nonresident defendant, since it may enable them to obtain a personal judgment which else were impossible. If citizens of other states are allowed to come into our jurisdiction to attend court as parties or witnesses, and to freely depart from it, the administration of justice will be best promoted, since a defendant's personal presence is often essential to enable his counsel to justly conduct his defense. The principle of state comity, too, demands that a citizen of another state, who submits to the jurisdiction of our courts, and here wages his forensic contest, should not be compelled to do so under the limitation and obligation of submitting to the jurisdiction of our courts in every case that may be brought against him. While coming and departing, as well as while actually in necessary attendance at court, he should be free from the hazard of being compelled to answer in other actions. It is an evidence of respect for our laws and confidence in our courts that he comes here to litigate, and the laws he respects should give him protection. If he can come only under the penalty of yielding to our jurisdiction in every action that may be brought against him, he is deprived of a substantial right, because he is willing to trust our courts and our laws without removing his case to the Federal courts, or refusing to put himself in a position where a personal judgment may be rendered against him. High considerations of public policy require that the law should encourage him to freely enter our forums by granting immunity from process in other civil actions, and not discourage him by burdening him with the obligation to submit to the writs of our courts if he comes within our borders." See also excerpts from numerous decisions collected in note to Mullen v. Sanborn, 25 L. R. A. 721. Of course, there may be exceptions, as Mullen v. Sanborn, supra, where a plaintiff in an attachment suit came from another state to testify, and was held not to be privileged from the service of summons while there in an action for maliciously bringing the attachment suit. Having resorted to this drastic remedy, the equal administration of justice seemed to demand recoupment of the resulting damages in the same jurisdiction. It is also to be noted that the decisions with reference to immunity of witnesses or parties from service of process or summons within the same state, but in counties other than their residence, are in conflict. See Christian v. Williams, 111 Mo. 429, 20 S. W. 96. Though that question is not now involved, it may be observed that it is probably settled by the statutes of this state. Unless, then, the privilege is obviated by some provision of our Code, the defendant was entitled to the immunity claimed. Section 3541 provides that "the mode of appearance may be: . . . (1) By delivering to the plaintiff or the clerk of the court a memorandum in writing to the effect that the defendant appears, signed either by the defendant in person or his attorney, dated the day of its delivery, and to be filed in the case; (2) by entering an appearance in the appearance docket or judge's calendar, or by announcing to the court an appearance which shall be entered of record; (3) by an appearance, even though especially made, by himself or his attorney, for any purpose connected with the cause, or for any purpose connected with the service or insufficiency of the notice; and an appearance, special or other, to object to the substance or service of the notice, shall render any further notice unnecessary, but may entitle the defendant to a continuance, if it shall appear to 64 L. R. A.

the court that he has not had the full timely notice required of the substantial cause of action stated in the petition." The object had in enacting this statute was to do away with allowing a party to specially appear for the sole purpose of advising the court that he is not there. See Hodges v. Brett, 4 G. Greene, 345. It relates to the acquirement of jurisdiction of the person, and not what shall be done with him after jurisdiction has been obtained. No exception was taken by the defendant to the manner of service or to the character of the notice, and he admits having been brought into court. What he objected to was being detained therein and compelled to plead to plaintiff's petition and litigate the issues in a jurisdiction into which the plaintiff had no right to bring him. The service is merely the method of invoking jurisdiction. The immunity extends further, and shields him from litigating the controversy in the place where he was exempt from service. If he had failed to appear this would have been a waiver of his privilege, and a valid and binding judgment might have been rendered against him. Thornton v. American Writing Mach. Co. 83 Ga. 288, 20 Am. St. Rep. 320, 9 S. E. 679; Freeman, Judgm. § 296; note to Mullen v. Sanborn, 25 L. R. A. 721. In enacting the above statute, and in authorizing suit against a nonresident in any county of the state where found, the legislature had no thought of interfering with a rule concerning exemption from service of notice. Wilson v. Donaldson, 117 Ind. 356, 3 L. R. A. 266, 10 Am. St. Rep. 48, 20 N. E. 250; Fisk v. Westover, 4 S. D. 233, 46 Am. St. Rep. 780, 55 N. W. 961. These statutes, like others, were enacted with reference to the great body of law as it existed, and should not be isolated therefrom when being construed. The suit contemplated is such as may be properly instituted, and against which the defendant is not shielded by the privileges of his situation. The circumstances were such as to bring the case clearly within the rule announced. The defendant was bound to be in attendance of court to avoid the forfeiture of his bond. He came also as a witness in his own behalf. His stay was not unreasonable, and he should have been allowed to go hence from the jurisdiction of the court, which had been illegally invoked against him. The remedy by motion, with which defendant availed himself, was that generally recognized by the authorities as appropriate. Indeed, it would seem that no other would have been effective in relieving him from in some way responding to the petition and dismissing him from the court's jurisdiction.

Adelaide S. SHOCKLEY, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A property owner is not liable for injuries to a traveler caused by obstructions placed in the street in front of the property without danger signals, by an independent contractor whom he has employed to construct a building on the property.
2. Assent by the agent of a property owner to the placing of sand in the street in front of it, by an independent contractor who has undertaken to erect a building on the premises, will not render the property owner liable for injuries caused to travelers on the street by failing to mark the obstruction by warning lights after dark.
3. An appellate court is not deprived of jurisdiction of a cause by failure to get it into that court for the term specified in the notice of appeal.

(February 11, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiff, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was responsible. Reversed.

Statement by McClain, J.:

Action to recover damages on account of personal injuries to plaintiff's wife, resulting from being thrown from a buggy on account of a pile of sand in the street in front of the premises of the defendant, Mrs. Shockley. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Messrs. J. A. Merritt and J. K. Macomber, for appellant:

If Winburn was an independent contractor, the owner is not liable for his negligence in failing to guard the sand by red lights or otherwise.

An independent contractor is one who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods, and without being subject to the control of his employer, except as to the results of his work.

Humpton v. Unterkircher, 97 Iowa, 514, 66 N. W. 776; Callahan v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 23 Iowa, 562; Brown v. McLeish, 71 Iowa, 381, 32 N. W. 385; Miller v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 655, 14 Am. St. Rep. 258, 39 N. W. 188; Hughbanks v. Boston Invest. Co. 92 Iowa, 267, 60 N. W. 640. See Overhouser v. American Cereal Co. 118 Iowa, 417, 92 N. W. 75; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 624.

It was no more the duty of Mrs. Shockley to guard the sand pile than it was the duty of the owner to guard the lumber pile which was left in the street by the contractor in the case of Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 743.

Mrs. A. S. Shockley was not liable because G. A. Shockley told Winburn he could put the sand in the street.

Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 743; Richmond v. Sitterding, 9 Va. Law Reg. 41, 43 S. E. 562; Emmerson v. Fay, 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. 386; Humpton v. Unterkircher, 97 Iowa, 509, 66 N. W. 776.

When the contract is for something that may be lawfully done and is proper in its terms, and the person for whom work is done is only interested in the ultimate result of the work, and not in the several steps as it progresses, the latter is neither liable to third persons for the negligence of the contractor as his master, nor is he master of the persons employed by the contractor, so as to be responsible to third persons for their negligence.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, Mrs. Shockley, procured a building permit from the proper city authorities for the erection of a dwelling house on her lot abutting upon a paved street, and then made a written contract with one Wynburn to construct such house; the contractor to furnish all the labor and material, except the brick, which was to be furnished by defendant. In the course of the work, Wynburn caused sand to be hauled and piled up in the street in front of defendant's lot; the place for depositing it being selected with the approval of defendant's husband. This pile of sand being left unguarded and unmarked by danger signals of any kind, the plaintiff, driving along the street at night in a buggy with his wife, drove upon it, and the buggy was overturned, and plaintiff's wife was thrown out and injured. Wynburn and two others were made codefendants with Mrs. Shockley, but the action was dismissed or abated with reference to the two other defendants, and verdict and judgment for $4,700 were returned and entered against Mrs. Shockley and Wynburn. As 64 L. R. A.

Wynburn does not appeal, the case will be treated as one against Mrs. Shockley alone.

The sole question necessary to consider is whether, under the facts, as to which there is practically no dispute, defendant is liable for what may be conceded to have been the negligence of Wynburn in allowing the pile of sand to remain in the street unguarded, and in such condition that plaintiff, in the exercise of reasonable care, drove his buggy upon and over it, and the injury complained of resulted proximately therefrom. It is clearly established by the evidence that Wynburn was an independent contractor, and it is unnecessary to cite authorities to the general proposition that one who employs another to do a piece of work according to the methods to be adopted by the latter, and without reservation of control on the part of the employer, except as to the result of the work done, is not liable for injuries suffered by a third person by reason of the negligence of the contractor in carrying on the work. There are qualifications of the rule thus broadly stated, which need not be here discussed. This case does not fall within any such qualifications or exceptions, unless it be some exception or qualification predicated upon the fact that defendant was the owner of the premises on which the improvement was being made, and allowed a dangerous obstruction, created through the contractor's negligence, to exist on the street in front of such premises. Such a state of facts was held in Bush v. Steinman, 1 Bos. & P. 404, to render the owner of the premises liable, and, if the doctrine there announced has been adhered to in subsequent decisions, and remains a correct exposition of the law, then the judgment against the defendant is well founded. As the case cited is typical, it will facilitate the discussion to quote the statement of facts from the report: "The defendant, having purchased a house by the roadside (but which he had never occupied), contracted with a surveyor to put it in repair for a stipulated sum; a carpenter, having a contract under the surveyor to do the whole business, employed a bricklayer under him; and he, again, contracted for a quantity of lime with a lime burner, by whose servant the lime in question was laid in the road." Under this state of facts, the lord chief justice of the English court of common pleas, before whom the case was tried, was of opinion that the defendant was not answerable for the injury sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the lime being piled in the highway. But, to get the case before the full bench, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, with leave to defendant to move for a nonsuit. After full consideration, the court agreed that the action could be maintained, although the chief justice still entertained doubts as to the precise principle on which the verdict should be sustained. The rule adopted by the court is most clearly stated by Rooke, J., who says: "He who has work going on for his benefit and on his own premises must be civilly answerable for the acts of those whom he employs. According to the principle of the case in [Michael v. Alestree] 2 Lev. 172, it shall be intended by the court that he has a control over all those persons who work on his premises, and he shall not be allowed to discharge himself from that intentment of law by any act or contract of his own. He ought to reserve such control, and, if he deprive himself of it, the law will not permit him to take advantage of that circumstance in order to screen himself from an action. . . . The person from whom the whole authority is originally derived is the person who ought to be answerable, and great inconvenience would follow if it were otherwise." It will be noticed that the learned judge rendering the opinion substantially ignores the distinction between the case of master and servant and one of independent contractor. But, in view of the full recognition which the doctrine of independent contractor has received in the modern cases, the conclusion of the court in Bush v. Steinman is to be supported, if at all, as establishing an exception to the effect that the owner of fixed property owes a duty to make the premises safe, regardless of whether the unsafe condition complained of results from the negligence of himself or his servants, or from the negligence of an independent contractor and his servants. But, as applied to a case of a dangerous nuisance in the highway in front of the owner's premises, not caused by the act of the owner, nor of persons for whose acts he is responsible as master or employer, this doctrine has not been accepted by the authorities. The courts of England have expressly refused to follow the case of Bush v. Steinman, and it has been distinctly and unanimously disclaimed as authority in this country. Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 743; Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 494, 68 Am. Dec. 345; King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37. As is said in Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 743: "Bush v. Steinman is no longer law in England. If ever a case can be said to have been overruled, indirectly and directly, by reasoning and by authority, this has been. No one can have examined the case without feeling the difficulty of that clear-headed judge, Chief Justice Eyre, of knowing on what ground its decision was put. It could not stand on the relation of master and servant.

That relation did not exist. It could not stand upon the ground of the defendant having created or suffered a nuisance upon his own land, to the injury of his neighbor's property. The lime was on the highway. There is no rule to include it but the indefinitely broad and loose one that a person shall be answerable for any injury which arises in carrying into execution that which he has employed another to do,—a rule which ought to have been, and was, expressly repudiated." The contention of counsel for the appellee seems to be this: Defendant should have known that the carrying on of the work by the contractor would involve the deposit of sand in the street, and, while this would not necessarily and of itself constitute a nuisance, it might become a nuisance by reason of failure to properly guard it or warn against it, and the defendant should have taken pains to see that the contractor took proper precautions. But such an argument, if acceded to, would require conclusions which are wholly untenable. The defendant must have known that it would be necessary for the contractor to drive his wagons along the street in front of defendant's premises, and thereby, to some extent, obstruct the use of the street while they were being unloaded. And yet could it be claimed that the negligence of the contractor in so driving his wagons or managing them as to injure persons using the street would render the defendant liable? The street was a public highway, and the contractor used the street in carrying out his contract subject to the same limitations as those imposed upon others in the use of a public highway. But it was not the concern of the defendant how the contractor used the street, nor did defendant have any control over the use which the contractor should make of the street. He might, perhaps, have gotten permission to use the adjoining lot for the purpose of piling his material thereon, or he might have mixed his sand and lime at another place, and transported the mortar to defendant's premises as it was needed, or he might have carried out his contract in any other manner which seemed to him feasible and proper. It was not incumbent on the defendant to stipulate how he should do his work. The real negligence complained of was the failure to put out barriers of warning lights, and this was not an act as to which the defendant had any responsibility, or over which defendant had any control. Even if defendant's husband acted as her agent in approving the placing of the sand in the street, his assent did not render her liable, for the placing of the sand in the street was not a wrong in itself. Callanan v. Gilman, 107 N. Y. 360, 1 Am. St. Rep. 831, 14 N. E. 264.

Such an act may be entirely proper, and does not necessarily give rise to a nuisance. The wrong was in leaving the pile of sand in the street at night, without barricade or danger signals, so as to imperil the safety of those using the street in the usual way. For this neither defendant nor her husband was responsible.

The conclusion which we reach—that defendant was not chargeable with the consequences of the contractor's negligence—is supported by the great weight of authority. For instance, in Wright v. Big Rapids Door & Blind Mfg. Co. 124 Mich. 91, 50 L. R. A. 495, 82 N. W. 829, it was held that a property owner was not liable for the act of an independent contractor in negligently piling lumber near the owner's premises. In Sanford v. Pawtucket Street R. Co. 19 R. I. 537, 33 L. R. A. 564, 35 Atl. 67, it was held that the defendant, a street car company, was not liable for negligence of an independent contractor in stretching rope or wire across a public street in the construction of the road. In Leavitt v. Bangor & A. R. Co. 89 Me. 509, 36 L. R. A. 382, 36 Atl. 998, it was held that the defendant company was not liable for damages by fire communicated from the cooking car used by an independent contractor engaged in cutting wood for the company, although the car stood on the company's track. In Berg v. Parsons, 156 N. Y. 109, 41 L. R. A. 391, 66 Am. St. Rep. 542, 50 N. E. 957, it was held that the negligence of a contractor in blasting rock on defendant's premises, causing damages to a building upon the adjoining lot, did not make the defendant responsible. In Smith v. Benick, 87 Md. 610, 42 L. R. A. 277, 41 Atl. 56, it was held that the proprietor of a public resort, employing an independent contractor to make a balloon ascension to attract visitors, was not liable for injury to a visitor by a pole which fell because of the negligence of the contractor in endeavoring to raise the pole for use in inflating his balloon. In Louthan v. Hewes, 138 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 1065, it was held that the owner of a public building was not liable for the negligence of a contractor in putting a stairway into such temporary condition that it was dangerous to persons using it. In Richmond v. Sitterding, 9 Va. Law Reg. 41, 43 S. E. 562, it was held that the owner of premises was not liable for injuries resulting from negligence of an independent contractor in placing a plank in the street in front of the premises so as to create an unlawful obstruction. In Emmerson v. Fay, 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. 386, it was held that the owner of a building was not liable for the negligence of the servant of an independent contractor at work on the building in dropping an iron ball from the roof to the street below. Similarly, in Hexamer v. Webb, 101 N. Y. 377, 54 Am. Rep. 703, 4 N. E. 755, it was held that the owner of a building was not liable for the negligence of a contractor in allowing a plank to fall from the building, which was in process of erection, to the sidewalk below. In Frassi v. McDonald, 122 Cal. 400, 55 Pac. 139, 55 Pac. 772, it was held that the owner of a building in process of erection, intrusting to an independent contractor the work of laying pipes in the street, connecting with the building, was not liable for the negligence of the contractor in tearing up the sidewalk in the prosecution of his work, and leaving it in such condition as to be dangerous to persons passing by. In Harrison v. Collins, 86 Pa. 153, 27 Am. Rep. 699, it was held that the owner of premises was not liable for an injury resulting from the negligence of an independent contractor in leaving open for a short time a coal hole in the sidewalk in front of the premises. And in Hilliard v. Richardson, 3 Gray, 349, 63 Am. Dec. 743, which has already been cited, it was held that the owner of land, employing a carpenter as an independent contractor to alter and repair a building, and furnish the materials for the purpose, was not liable for damages resulting to a third person from boards deposited in the highway in front of the land by a teamster in the employ of the contractor. Other illustrations are furnished by cases which are cited in Thompson, on Negligence, §§ 620 et seq. The conclusions which we reach are in harmony with the doctrine as announced by this author. This court has recognized the same principle in Brown v. McLeish, 71 Iowa, 381, 32 N. W. 385, in which the court reverses on account of an instruction extending the rule of respondeat superior to the act of a servant or employee when the master or employer, by the terms of the employment, has no authority to control and direct the manner of the execution of the work; and the court says that, if the employer has no control over the workmen, or the manner of doing the work, he is not liable for their negligence,—such as the throwing of earth from a ditch onto a public street, or the leaving of an unfinished ditch open during the night.

In the view which we take of the case before us, the authorities relied on by appellee are not in point. They are cases where a person is charged with maintaining premises in a safe condition for others,—as, for instance, where the owner of a building is required to have his premises safe, or a city, having control of its streets, is required to maintain them in a safe condition for the use of the public. If the thing contracted to be done involves, as a direct consequence, a danger which the owner of the premises or the city is bound to avoid or to provide against, then the delegation of the work to an independent contractor will not relieve from liability for consequences proximately resulting from negligence in doing the thing thus contracted to be done. As furnishing illustrations of this rule of liability, which is wholly distinct from the rule as to the negligence of an independent contractor in carrying on the work contracted for, see Southern Ohio R. Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207, 7 L. R. A. 701, 24 N. E. 269; Woodman v. Metropolitan R. Co. 149 Mass. 335, 4 L. R. A. 213, 14 Am. St. Rep. 427, 21 N. E. 482; Colgrove v. Smith, 102 Cal. 220, 27 L. R. A. 590, 36 Pac. 411; Wiggin v. St. Louis, 135 Mo. 558, 37 S. W. 528; Chicago v. Robbins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. ed. 298; Storrs v. Utica, 17 N. Y. 104, 72 Am. Dec. 437. The cases of Van Winter v. Henry County, 61 Iowa, 685, 17 N. W. 94, and Wood v. Independent School District, 44 Iowa, 27, illustrate this distinction. The distinction is clearly pointed out in Robbins v. Chicago, 4 Wall. 657, 18 L. ed. 427, in which this language is used: "where the obstruction or defect caused or created in the street is purely collateral to the work contracted to be done, and is entirely the result of the wrongful acts of the contractor or his workmen, the rule is that the employer is not liable; but, where the obstruction or defect which occasioned the injury results directly from the acts which the contractor agrees and is authorized to do, the person who employs the contractor, and authorizes him to do those acts, is equally liable to the injured party." And see Palmer v. Lincoln, 5 Neb. 136, 25 Am. Rep. 470, where the same distinction is made.

The trial court therefore erred in submitting the case to the jury on the theory that the defendant was liable for the negligence of Wynburn in not sufficiently protecting the public, including the plaintiff and his wife, from the danger incident to putting the pile of sand in the street in front of defendant's premises, and leaving it unguarded.

Counsel for appellee urge the insufficiency of the notice of appeal, on the ground that no appeal was perfected at the term of the supreme court to which, by the terms of the notice, the appeal was taken. But we have never held that failure to get the case into the Supreme Court for the term specified in the notice was a ground for dismissal, or that the notice became inoperative to give this court jurisdiction on that account. Ob- 64 L. R. A.

jection is also made to the form of the notice, but we find that, as set out in appellant's abstract, it is sufficient.

1. A corporation is not liable for injuries to its employee in attempting to rescue one of its members, who, in superintending and working with the employee, undermines a wall so that it is about to fall upon him, when the employee springs forward from a place of safety to avert the impending accident.
2. A corporation cannot be held liable to one who is injured in attempting to save its superintendent from peril, on the ground that it ought to have anticipated that, when the superintendent placed himself in peril, someone, upon discovering that fact, would attempt to shield him, where there is nothing to show that the work undertaken by the superintendent might not have been done with safety; since the company was not bound to assume that the superintendent would needlessly expose himself, or that, in case he did so, someone would imperil his own safety to rescue him.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff had been employed by Parsons, Rich, & Co. as a blacksmith. That firm had concluded to enlarge its factory, and on the 11th day of November, 1898, directed plaintiff, with others, to assist in removing a one-story addition thereto. This addition was about 24 feet square, with brick walls running against, not into, the main building. After the roof had been removed, they proceeded to take down the north and east walls. The south wall was to be extended as a part of a larger building. After a portion of the east wall had been removed, the other employees went at work elsewhere, but plaintiff continued until the brick had been taken away within a few feet of the ground. He then took out a window frame, and in returning through a doorway in the east wall after setting it aside, noticed that Parsons, who had been overseeing the work, and also working with the men, bent over next to the north wall undermining it at the bottom with a 5-foot iron bar. He was but 12 or 14 feet distant, and the wall appeared to be toppling over toward him. Believing Parsons to be in imminent danger, plaintiff seized a piece of scantling, 2 inches by 4 or 6 inches and about 7 feet long, rushed over, and threw it against the wall about 2 feet from the top, and over a window, to prevent the wall from falling. Parsons immediately rose up and withdrew without serious injury. But the brick against which plaintiffs prop had been placed gave way, letting plaintiff forward, and he was caught by the falling wall, and his leg so crushed that amputation was necessary. The wall was then about 10 feet high at one end and 8 feet at the other, with an aperture for a window about 2½ feet wide and 5 feet high. Parsons was about 3 or 4 feet west of this window. Subsequently, in expressing his sympathy with plaintiff, he said to him that, but for his coming as he did, he (Parsons) might have been crushed and killed. Upon the conclusion of the evidence in behalf of plaintiff tending to establish facts as stated, the jury, on motion, was directed to return a verdict for the defendants.

1. A person who seeks to rescue another from imminent danger, thereby imperiling his own life, is not necessarily guilty of contributory negligence. "The law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under circumstances constituting rashness in the judgment of prudent persons." Eckert v. Long Island R. Co. 43 N. Y. 502, 3 Am. Rep. 721. In Cottrill v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Wis. 634, 32 Am. Rep. 796, 3 N. W. 376, an engineer had continued at his post in order to save life, and the court, in reversing the finding of a jury that he was negligent in not jumping from the engine, said: "According to the common appreciation of human conduct and character, this evidence presents an example of heroic bravery and fidelity to duty at the post of danger most praiseworthy and commendable, and an occurrence worthy of lasting record in the book of heroic deeds. . . . To hold as matter of law in this case that the deceased was guilty of a want of ordinary care and prudence, as the engineer in charge of the locomotive and the train, in not jumping off at this crisis and abandoning his engine, from the mere apprehension of uncertain danger, would make a legal precedent very dangerous to the railway service in life and property, and by which it would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish the cases and the circumstances in which it would or would not be the duty of an engineer to jump off and desert his engine, or to determine in point of time when he should do so, and the necessity or prudence for him to do so." See also Central R. Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 737, 58 Am. 64 L. R. A.

Rep. 463. Cases involving the rescue of adults as well as infants from imminent danger are numerous, and the principle seems to be well established that he who springs to the rescue of another, encountering great danger to himself, is not to be denounced as negligent, but that the propriety of his conduct is to be left to the judgment of the jury. Pennsylvania Co. v. Langendorf, 48 Ohio St. 316, 13 L. R. A. 190, 29 Am. St. Rep. 553, 28 N. E. 172; Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 506, 30 Am. Rep. 692; Becker v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 110 Ky. 474, 53 L. R. A. 267, 96 Am. St. Rep. 459, 61 S. W. 997; Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 88 Md. 482, 42 L. R. A. 842, 71 Am. St. Rep. 441, 42 Atl. 60; Thomp. Neg. § 198. See Liming v. Illinois C. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 246, 47 N. W. 66.

2. But negligence on the part of the defendant either toward the person rescued or the party making the rescue after the attempt had been begun is essential to a recovery in all cases. This was illustrated in Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Hiatt, 17 Ind. 102, where a son undertook to rescue his father from in front of a moving train on a bridge, and recovery was denied for the reason that the employees of the railroad company did not observe either in time to avoid a collision. In Donahoe v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 560, 53 Am. Rep. 594, the court, in considering the liability of the company for injury to a mother in attempting to rescue her child, perspicuously states principles governing cases of this character: "It is to be observed that it is only when the railroad company, by its own negligence, created the danger, or through its negligence is about to strike a person in danger, that a third person can voluntarily expose himself to peril in an effort to rescue such person, and recover for an injury he may sustain in that attempt. For instance, if a man were lying on the track of a railroad, intoxicated or asleep, but in such a position that he could not be seen by the men managing an approaching train, and they had no warning of his situation, and another, seeing his danger, should go upon the track to save his life, and be injured by the train, he could not recover unless the trainmen were guilty of negligence with respect to the rescuer, occurring after the beginning of his attempt. If the railroad company is not chargeable with negligence with respect to the person in danger, the case of the person who attempted to rescue him and was injured must be determined with reference to the negligence of the company in its conduct toward him and his in making the attempt. In other words, the negligence of the company as to the person in danger is imputed to the company with respect to him who attempts the rescue, and, if not guilty of negligence as to such person, then it is only liable for negligence occurring with regard to the rescuer after his efforts to rescue the person in danger commenced." See also Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684. It is not pretended that plaintiff was not assigned a safe place to do his work; nor is it claimed there was any want of care with respect to him after he began his efforts to sustain the wall with the stick. But was there any negligence on the part of defendants toward Parsons, the person rescued? The law of negligence is based on the relative rights and duties of one person toward another. Says Judge Thompson, in his Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, § 3: "An essential ingredient in any conception of negligence is that it involves the violation of a legal duty which one person owes another,—the duty to take care for the safety of the person or property of the other; and the converse proposition is that, where there is no legal duty to exercise care, there can be no actionable negligence. Therefore it is reasoned that a plaintiff who grounds his action upon the negligence of the defendant must show, not only that the conduct of the defendant was negligent, but also that it was a violation of some duty which the defendant owed to him."

These principles are of universal recognition in text-books and decisions. Undoubtedly Parsons owned the moral duty of protecting his own person from harm. But the love of life is regarded as a sufficient inducement to self-preservation; all that is deemed essential for the government of persons in matters affecting themselves alone. Where no one else is concerned, the individual may incur dangers and risks as he may choose, and in doing so he violates no legal duty. He cannot be guilty legally, though he may be morally, of neglecting himself. It matters not whether he (Parsons) was vice principal or fellow servant, as he voluntarily undertook, on his own motion, to undermine the wall. This endangered no one's life but his own. If he was in peril, it was because he placed himself there. There was no negligence on the part of either defendant as to him, and for this reason there could have been none as to his rescuer. To illustrate, suppose a person with intent to suicide should jump into the river, and another, seeing his peril, but without knowledge of his intent, should leap in after him, and in attempting to save him be injured. Would anyone contend that the latter could recover the damages resulting from the former or his administrator? Certainly not, and for the reason that negligence could not be imputed to the suicide. His was the dereliction of a moral, not a legal, duty to himself; for to take one's own life, though a crime at the common law, is not so declared by our Code. It may be said, however, that Parsons ought, in placing himself in peril, to have anticipated that someone would, upon discovering his danger, undertake to shield him from harm. But this was a contingency which, as it seems to us, would not be likely to be contemplated. In the first place, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Parsons, in the exercise of ordinary care, could not have undermined the wall with safety to himself. That he so intended must be presumed, for the presumption in favor of prudence is always to be indulged until the contrary appears. If, then, he might have performed the work with safety to himself, neither he nor the company is chargeable with negligence for not anticipating that he would do it otherwise, and that, if he so did, somebody would attempt to rescue him. Nor is the probability of receiving such assistance a matter which a person of ordinary diligence, in undertaking a perilous enterprise, would be likely to take into consideration. Men do not expose their lives to danger with the idea that others will protect them from harm by risking their own lives. Though history teems with accounts of heroic conduct and self-sacrifice, deeds of this kind have not become so common that they are to be anticipated as likely to occur whenever opportunity is afforded. The instincts of self-preservation still so dominate human conduct that acts like that under consideration, in which life itself was risked for the protection of another, are of such rare occurrence as always to commend the special attention and admiration of the entire community, and by the common voice of mankind those who do them are singled out as worthy of enrollment on the scroll of heroes. Because of their infrequency, however, it cannot be said they should enter into the calculations of men as at all likely in the ordinary transactions of life. As they spring from magnanimity, magnanimity must be relied upon in cases like this for reparation.

Affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. Mental anguish and suffering will

- sustain an action for breach of contract promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram.
2. An action of tort will lie against a telegraph company for breach of a contract promptly to transmit a telegram, since there is also a breach of its public duty as a common carrier.
 3. Allegation of the contract relations in an action to recover for failure accurately to transmit a telegram does not necessarily make the action one upon contract, since that matter may be pleaded by way of inducement to an allegation of facts constituting a tort.
 4. The measure of damages in actions for tort is not the amount which might reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties as the reasonable result of the wrongful act, but such amount as represents the direct injury resulting from the act, although it could not have been contemplated as the probable result of the act done.
 5. The sender of a telegram which was altered in transmission need not allege freedom from contributory negligence, in an action to recover for the injury thereby caused to her, where the statute makes telegraph companies liable for mistakes in transmitting messages, and provides that, in actions to recover damages, the burden is upon the company to prove that the mistake was not due to its own negligence.

In 1895 this court adopted the Texas doctrine.

Twenty cases are cited in support of the conclusion reached. Of these cases nine are Texas cases. Of the remaining eleven, three have since been overruled, three are not in point, and most of the remaining cases, being those of Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina, and Kentucky, have been more or less limited in their application.

The cases which have been overruled are:

Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583, 24 N. E. 163; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stratemeyer, 6 Ind. App. 125, 32 N. E. 871; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Newhouse, 6 Ind. One of the cases cited supporting the doctrine, which is not in point, is Logan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 84 Ill. 468.

Since that case the Illinois court has repudiated the Texas doctrine.

The reason why an independent action for such damages cannot, and ought not to, be sustained is found in the remoteness of such damages, and in the metaphysical character of such an injury, considered apart from physical pain. Such injuries are generally more sentimental than substantial, depending largely on physical and nervous conditions. The suffering of one under precisely the same circumstances would be no test of the suffering of another. Vague and shadowy, there is no possible standard by which such an injury can be justly compensated, or even approximately measured. Easily simulated and impossible to disprove, it falls within all the objections to speculative damages which are universally excluded because of their uncertain character.

The present tendency of the courts is to support the doctrine of nonrecovery for mental suffering alone.

In actions for damages because of negligent acts, before a plaintiff can recover he must allege and prove his own freedom from negligence.

Joyce, Electric Law, § 821.

Messrs. Courts & Tomlinson and W. E. Blake for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence tends to establish the following state of facts: James Henry Cowan died in Louisa county, Iowa, on or about January 12, 1901. Immediately upon his death, his widow, the plaintiff herein, prepared to take his body to the home of his parents and other family relatives near Seaton, Illinois, for burial. To apprise these friends of the decease of her husband, and to insure their meeting her at the station upon her arrival with the body, and accompanying her to the family home, some miles in the country, she sent a message by the defendant to one Robert Swearingner, who was an acquaintance of the family, and the manager of a telephone exchange at Seaton, as follows:

Harry dead. Arrive with corpse at 6 A. M. Tell Thomas.

[Signed]

Edith Cowan.

The message was received by Swearingner in the evening, in time to have notified the parties; and he would have given the notice, and plaintiff would have been met at the 64 L. R. A.

station and cared for as expected by her, but for the mistake or negligence of the telegraph company. As delivered by the telegraph company, the message was signed, "Edith Erwin," and Swearingner, not knowing and being unable to learn of any person of that name, and not knowing for whom the message was in fact intended, did nothing with it. The relatives of the deceased, having received no notice of his death or of the coming of the widow, did not meet her at the station. Arriving there, and finding none of the friends in waiting, and no preparation made for the conveyance of herself and of the body of her husband to their destination in the country, plaintiff was much distressed in mind, and, to some extent, broken down in bodily strength. She was thereupon taken to a hotel by a brother, who accompanied her, and placed upon a couch, where she remained three or four hours, until her friends had been notified, and arrived with conveyances for her accommodation. These allegations are not in serious dispute, and upon them plaintiff seeks to recover damages. The jury returned a verdict in her favor of $275, and from the judgment entered thereon defendant appeals.

1. It will be observed that the basis of plaintiff's claim for damages is mental anguish and suffering resulting to her from the failure of defendant to properly transmit the message to Swearingner. That such damages are recoverable in a proper case was held by this court in Mentzer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L. R. A. 72, 57 Am. St. Rep. 294, 62 N. W. 1, and, unless we abandon that precedent, plaintiff's right of action must be conceded. Anticipating this suggestion, counsel for appellant submit an able and elaborate argument in support of their contention that the Mentzer Case should be overruled. The decision of that case was reached only after much deliberation and a careful review of the authorities. Most of the cases now so exhaustively marshaled were then called to our attention, and their bearing and value duly considered. We are still satisfied with the result there announced, and recognize its authority as a precedent in the case before us. The opinion accompanying that decision sets forth very fully the principles upon which it is founded, and there is no occasion for their re-statement at this time. We are reminded by counsel that Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583, 24 N. E. 163, cited by us in support of our decision in the Mentzer Case, has since been overruled by the Indiana court. This appears to be the case, but we must be permitted to say that, being satisfied with the strength of the reasoning and soundness of the principles announced in the first case, we are not disposed to concur in their recantation. Uniformity in judicial holdings throughout the various jurisdictions of the nation is much to be desired, and, where it prevails, no court should lightly disregard it, or introduce confusion into the precedents. But where, as upon the questions raised by this appeal, there is an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions, and respectable courts are arrayed upon either side of the controversy, we feel at liberty to adopt the theory which seems to us most logical, reasonable, and just, without special reference to the numerical preponderance of the authorities. As suggested in the Mentzer Case: "One of the crowning glories of the common law has been its elasticity and adaptability to new conditions and new states of fact. . . . Should it ever fail to be adjustable to the new conditions which age and experience bring, then its usefulness is over, and a new social compact must be entered into." It is nevertheless true that every demonstration of this elastic quality of the common law, and every readjustment made necessary by changing conditions, has been accomplished over the insistent protest and opposition of those who have professed to find in it a subtle and dangerous attack upon fundamental principles. The recognition of the right of a party under certain circumstances to recover substantial damages for physical and mental suffering has been no exception to this rule, and even yet it is the subject of much controversy. Recovery of such damages was at first sought to be confined to cases of mental suffering arising from physical injury wrongfully or negligently inflicted. So strictly and literally has this rule been applied, that in some jurisdictions it has been held that a wrongful act producing nervous shock or fright, which results in physical prostration, insanity, and death, affords no cause of action against the wrongdoer. Mitchell v. Rochester R. Co. 151 N. Y. 107, 34 L. R. A. 781, 56 Am. St. Rep. 604, 45 N. E. 354; Haile v. Texas & P. R. Co. 23 L. R. A. 774, 9 C. C. A. 134, 23 U. S. App. 80, 60 Fed. 557; Evinc v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 147 Pa. 40, 14 L. R. A. 666, 30 Am. St. Rep. 709, 23 Atl. 340. The doctrine thus approved is so manifestly unjust, and so out of harmony with the general spirit of the law, that many courts have wholly repudiated it, while still others have limited and modified it by important exceptions. In direct opposition to the cases above cited as to damages arising from fright or nervous shock in the absence of immediate physical injury, we may note Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hayter, 93 Tex. 239, 47 L. R. A. 325, 77 Am. St. Rep. 856, 54 S. W. 944; Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L. R. A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034; Hill v. Kimball, 76 Tex. 210, 7 L. R. A. 64 L. R. A.

Some of the foregoing cases go much farther than is necessary for us to go in disposing of this appeal, and we cite them, not as adopting all their conclusions, but as indicating that the rule asserted by the appellant is not to be considered as of universal application. In the case now sought to be overruled, we called attention to the proposition (often overlooked in discussing this much-vexed question) that in an action sounding in tort the rule allowing recovery for mental suffering is much more liberal than in actions on contract. Many of the decisions which deny the soundness of the rule adopted in the Mentzer Case expressly plant their finding upon the principle that mental suffering cannot be presumed to have been within the contemplation of the parties to the contract as a necessary or natural result of its breach. For instance, the supreme court of Minnesota, in an action for damages on account of nondelivery of a telegram, says: "This action is not one of tort, but on contract. . . . We are therefore left to determine the question here presented according to the rules of common law applicable to actions for damages for breach of contract." Francis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078. If this premise be admitted, it must also be conceded that the conclusion announced by that eminent court is supported by many precedents. We cannot agree, however, that, in a case of this kind, plaintiff is limited to his damages as for a breach of contract. True, appellant's undertaking to transmit the message was a contract obligation; but negligence in the performance of that obligation, by which injury results to the sender, is a tort, damages for which are not restricted by rules applicable to ordinary actions for breach of contract. The appellant company is engaged in a public employment, and is, within certain limits, to be considered and treated as a common carrier. Gillis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 61 Vt. 461, 4 L. R. A. 611, 15 Am. St. Rep. 917, 17 Atl. 736; Parks v. Alta California Teleg. Co. 13 Cal. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 589. As such, it is charged with a common-law duty, and "an action may be brought in tort, although the breach of duty assigned is the doing or not doing something contrary to an agreement made in the course of such employment." Southern Exp. Co. v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 264. A breach of duty of a common carrier is a breach of the law, for which an action lies, and which wants not a contract to support it. Bretherton v. Wood, 3 Brod. & B. 54, 6 J. B. Moore, 141, 9 Price, 408, 23 Revised Rep. 556; Burkle v. Ellis, 4 How. Pr. 288; McPeck v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 Iowa, 362, 43 L. R. A. 214, 70 Am. St. Rep. 205, 78 N. W. 63. This principle is discussed with great clearness and thoroughness in Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 348, 11 N. W. 358, where it is said, in reference to the facts pleaded as constituting actionable negligence: "All these matters are a breach of the contract to carry 64 L. R. A.

the passenger safely; yet the carrier is held liable in an action for tort. . . . All the cases hold that the person injured through the negligence or carelessness of the carrier may proceed either upon contract, alleging the . . . negligent acts of the defendant as a breach of the contract, or he may proceed in tort, making the . . . negligence of the company the ground of his right of recovery." The allegation by the plaintiff of contractual relations with the defendant does not necessarily make the action one upon contract, for these matters are often properly pleaded by way of inducements preliminary to an allegation of facts constituting a tort. Nor is this rule peculiar to actions against carriers. Britt v. Pitts, 111 Ala. 401, 20 So. 484; Fordyce v. Nix, 58 Ark. 136, 23 S. W. 967; Leeds v. Richmond, 102 Ind. 372, 1 N. E. 711; Carter v. Glass, 44 Mich. 154, 38 Am. Rep. 240, 6 N. W. 200; Stanley v. Bircher, 78 Mo. 245; Ashmore v. Pennsylvania Steam Towing & Transp. Co. 28 N. J. L. 180; Dungan v. Read, 167 Pa. 393, 31 Atl. 639; Harvey v. Skipwith, 16 Gratt. 393; Nelson v. Harrington, 72 Wis. 591, 1 L. R. A. 719, 7 Am. St. Rep. 900, 40 N. W. 228. If, then, we may treat this action as one ex delicto, rather than ex contractu, it becomes important to note the enlarged scope of the claim for recoverable damages. In an action upon contract it is usually laid down that no damages can be recovered save those which may reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties as the probable result of a breach of the agreement, and this is the principle almost invariably appealed to or relied upon by the courts which deny the liability of telegraph companies for damages on account of mental suffering. Recovery in tort is not thus limited. The rule applicable to such cases is that a "party who commits a trespass or other wrongful act is liable for all the direct injury resulting from such act, although such resulting injury could not have been contemplated as a probable result of the act done." Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342, 41 Am. Rep. 51, 11 N. W. 356, 911; Keenan v. Cavanaugh, 44 Vt. 268; Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 109 Mass. 277, 12 Am. Rep. 689; Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251; 1 Sedgw. Damages, 130, note; Bowae v. Pioneer Tow Line Co. 2 Sawy. 21, Fed. Cas. No. 1,713. Under this rule it has often been held that damages for mental suffering may be recovered, and such allowance has not been strictly confined to wrongs involving bodily injury. The Minnesota court, which, as we note in the Francis Case, 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 59 N. W. 1078, denies the right of such recovery against a telegraph company on the theory that the action is ex contractu, has not hesitated to allow damages of this nature in certain actions in tort. Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L. R. A. 85, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 50 N. W. 238. In the cited case, plaintiff alleged the wrongful dissection by the defendant of the dead body of her husband, and asked for damages on account of mental suffering alone. The court, after noting the confusion which has arisen in the cases "as to when, if ever, mental suffering, as a distinct element of damages, is a subject for compensation," says: "But where the wrongful act constitutes an infringement on a legal right, mental suffering may be recovered for, if it is the direct, proximate, and natural result of the wrongful act. . . . That mental suffering . . . would be ordinarily the natural and proximate result of knowledge that the remains of a deceased husband had been mutilated is too plain to admit of argument." The decisions which recognize the right to recover damages for mental pain and anxiety caused by negligence of a telegraph company in transmitting messages involving matters of life and death need no better justification than is found in the principles here so clearly stated. The thought urged upon our attention, that claims of this nature should be disallowed because of the impossibility of providing any exact standard or measure of compensation for injured feelings, and that recognition of such right of recovery will be followed by an enormous increase of litigation, does not impress us as a persuasive consideration. It is no more difficult to fix a compensation for mental anguish in cases like the one at bar than in cases of mental suffering arising from physical injury, and very few persons, we think, will be found ready to say the latter, when wrongfully occasioned, should not afford a ground of recovery. As to the prospect of vastly increased litigation, the fears expressed by the appellant find little foundation in the judicial history of the state. The Mentzer Case was decided ten years ago, and the present is the first occasion we have had in that decade to again consider the precise question there presented. This showing is a pretty fair indication that the doctrine there affirmed has not proved, and is not likely to prove, the opening of a Pandora's box of evil for the vexation or destruction of legitimate business.

2. It is finally insisted that plaintiff's petition does not state a cause of action, because, while it alleges the negligence of defendant, it does not allege the absence of contributory negligence on her own part. We think the rule contended for is not applicable in this case. Our statute provides (Code, § 2164) that a telegraph company is liable for all mistakes or delay in transmitting or receiving messages over its lines, and that, in actions brought to recover damages thus caused, the burden is upon the company to prove that the mistake or delay is not due to its own negligence. This, we think, relieves the plaintiff from the necessity of alleging that she did not contribute to her own injury.

Rehearing denied.

v.

CONSOLIDATED ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY of Maine.

(98 Me. 353.)

1. The jury may disregard testimony as to the condition of appliances by the breaking of which a servant is injured, where, if it is reliable, it is utterly incomprehensible how the accident can have happened.
2. The master, and not the servant for whose use it is furnished, is bound, in the absence of special circumstances changing

NOTE.—As to master's duty to inspect appliances and place of work, and the assignability of such duty, see also note to Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines, 41 L. R. A. 74, 109, and the later case of Smith v. Erie R. Co. 59 L. R. A. 302.

ing the rule, to inspect and repair a ladder furnished for the use of the servant, which is of such length that a defect in it will imperil the servant's life or limb.

3. The master cannot, by delegating to a servant the duty of inspecting long ladders furnished for the use of employees, and replacing rotten rounds, escape liability for injuries caused by neglect of the duty, on the ground that the neglect was that of a fellow servant of the one injured by a fall caused by the breaking of a rotten round.
4. One employing servants whose duties require the use of long ladders cannot relieve himself from liability for injuries to a servant through the breaking of a rotten round, by showing that he had a foreman who had general oversight of all the appliances used in the business, with the general duty of seeing that repairs were made when necessary.
5. The court will not interfere with an award of $3,000 as damages for injuries to a competent lineman of an electric light company earning at the time of injury $60 per month, where he had been able to do but little work prior to the trial, which occurred about a year after the injury, and there was evidence which would justify a conclusion that he had not at that time recovered from the effect of the accident.

(December 21, 1903.)

MOTION by defendant for a new trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which was tried in Cumberland County and resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The injuries were received January 1, 1902, and the case came on for trial at the January term of court, 1903. The facts upon which the action is founded sufficiently appear in the opinion.

The defendant moved for new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was against the law and the charge of the court, that it was manifestly against the weight of evidence, and that the damages were excessive.

Messrs. Bird & Bradley, for defendant:

If the master provides suitable appliances and competent persons to attend to them, he has done his duty.

Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. 135 Mass. 209, 46 Am. Rep. 458; Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. 144 Mass. 203, 59 Am. Rep. 68, 11 N. E. 77; Rice v. King Philip Mills, 144 Mass. 229, 59 Am. Rep. 80, 11 N. E. 101.

There is no duty resting on the master to inspect those common tools and appliances with which everyone is conversant.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, Master & Servant.

Nor is the master to be held for his negligence when the tool is a common one, of the fitness of which the servant is as competent to judge as the master.

Wachsmuth v. Shaw Electric Crane Co. 118 Mich. 275, 76 N. W. 497; Miller v. Erie R. Co. 21 App. Div. 45, 47 N. Y. Supp. 285.

A new trial should be ordered because the verdict of the jury was against the evidence in the case, and manifestly against the weight of the evidence therein.

Pellerin v. International Paper Co. 96 Me. 388, 52 Atl. 842.

The damages are excessive. To entitle the plaintiff to recover damages for apprehended future consequences, there must be such a degree of probability of their occurring as amounts to a reasonable certainty that they will result from the original injury.

Mr. William Lyons, for plaintiff:

Plaintiff is not a manufacturer of, neither does he know, or pretend to know, anything 64 L. R. A.

about, ladders, and it was not his duty, and the circumstances did not afford him an opportunity, to examine the ladder before ascending it.

Buzzell v. Laconia Mfg. Co. 48 Me. 116, 77 Am. Dec. 212.

If the employer knowingly makes use of defective and unsafe machinery, when an injury is done to a servant ignorant of its condition, and in the exercise of ordinary care, he should compensate the person thus injured through his neglect.

The damages are not excessive. The evidence was ample to warrant the jury in finding that plaintiff would not be able to resume the same occupation, or to engage in any other hard labor, for a long time subsequent to the trial, if, indeed, he would ever be able.

Hunter v. Stewart, 47 Me. 421; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 229, 36 Am. Rep. 303; Blackman v. Gardiner & P. Bridge, 75 Me. 216; Murdock v. New York & B. Despatch Exp. Co. 167 Mass. 549, 46 N. Plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the jury, and not of the court, upon the question of his damages.

Savage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Case by servant against master to recover damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff was employed upon a ladder about 25 feet from the ground, and, in reaching for a rope with one hand, nearly his whole weight was suspended from a round in the ladder which he held with the other hand. The round broke, and he fell to the ground, sustaining injuries. No complaint is made that the plaintiff himself was not in the exercise of due care. But after a verdict for the plaintiff the defendant now contends, upon a motion for a new trial, that the case shows no want of due care on its own part.

The ladder in question was a 40-foot extension ladder, and was extended at the time of the accident to the plaintiff. There was evidence that an examination of the round after the accident showed it to be dozy on the outside, and rotten. The ladder had been in use somewhat more than three years. It seems that the defendant company had no regular rules governing the inspection of appliances. Such inspection and repairs consequent upon it were usually reserved for rainy weather, when the men could not work out of doors. The foreman of construction had general oversight over the appliances, and was under the duty of keeping them in repair. A man was especially delegated to make general repairs, but it does not appear that it was his duty to make inspections. It is true that the testimony of the defendant tended to show that the rounds of the ladder were of white ash, and sound; that an examination of the round after the accident showed it to be well seasoned and sound; that it broke off at both ends by the sides of the ladder, showing fresh breaks, and leaving alivers or "burrs" on the edges of the holes through which the ends of the round had passed; and the defendant's evidence tended further to show that the ladder had been inspected only a few days before it broke, and was found to be all right. And in respect to this testimony we may add that, if it be reliable, it is utterly incomprehensible how the accident could have happened. The jury certainly were warranted in finding, as they undoubtedly did, that this testimony was not reliable, and that the round was not sound and reasonably safe. And we think it was fairly open to the jury to find that the defective condition of the round might have been discovered had it been suitably inspected; not, perhaps, by such an inspection as would naturally be given to it by the workman upon it, whose duty it was to work, not to inspect, and who might lawfully rely upon the presumption that the master had performed its duty, but by such an inspection on the part of the master as reasonably would be necessary to make sure that an appliance upon which the servant was to risk his life or limb every time he used it was reasonably safe.

The plaintiff testified that the round looked all right as he worked upon the ladder. But even that fact does not show that it was all right, or that the unsafe condition might not have been discovered by suitable inspection, such as was incumbent upon the master, unless in some way relieved from the duty.

But it is contended, as a matter of law, that the defendant is not liable upon the evidence. It is urged that there is no duty resting on the master to inspect, during their use, those common tools and appliances with which everyone is conversant; that, if they wear out and become defective, the employer may rely upon the presumption that those using them will first detect the defect; and that the employer is not to be held for negligence when the tool is a common one, of the fitness of which the servant is as competent to judge as the master. And the defendant cites authorities in support of these propositions. But it seems to us that a 40-foot extension ladder is not a common tool or appliance within the meaning of these rules. A defect in a ladder, arising from age or decay, might not be discoverable by such inspection as a workman is expected to make, and might be upon more careful inspection. To replace a dozy round of a ladder is not, we think, such "ordinary repairs" as a workman using it is usually expected to make, and certainly not unless the defect is brought to the knowledge of the servant. Of course, a master may furnish suitable materials for such renovations, and the circumstances in a given case may show that the workman is expected to make his own repairs. And in such case the master is not responsible for the neglect of the workman. But that is not this case. This plaintiff was under no special duty to inspect or repair this ladder, except as rainy-day work in common with his fellow laborers, when he might be directed specially to do so.

But the defendant further says that it provided proper persons to see that the ladder was kept in proper condition and to make ordinary repairs and renewals, and that such persons were fellow servants of the plaintiff; and from this the defendant contends that if, by the negligence of any of these persons, the ladder was not suitably inspected and properly repaired, it was the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servants, for which the defendant is not responsible.

While it is generally the duty of the master to use reasonable care in seeing that appliances furnished are reasonably safe, and by repairs are kept reasonably safe, doubtless there are some duties respecting the repair of appliances which the master may so delegate to a servant as to escape responsibility for the negligence of the servant in performing them, and doubtless there are some duties which the master may not thus delegate. The line between these classes of duties must necessarily be shadowy, and any rule stating them must be indefinite. Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. 144 Mass. 198, 59 Am. Rep. 68, 11 N. E. 77. As was said in Rice v. King Philip Mills, 144 Mass. 229, 235, 59 Am. Rep. 80, 11 N. E. 101, 104. "It is the duty of the master to exercise due care in employing competent servants, in providing suitable machines, and in keeping them in proper repair; and the master cannot wholly escape responsibility by delegating these duties to a servant. If this could be done, a master might escape all responsibility by employing a competent superintendent to perform all these duties. But there are defects in machinery which are of such a character that the master has been held to perform his duty if he furnishes suitable materials, and employs competent servants, and instructs them to keep the machinery in repair, although the servants neglect to make the repairs, or make them in an improper manner. The master must exercise a reasonable supervision over the manner in which his business is done; but the repairs which machines properly constructed require to keep them in running order may be intrusted to competent servants. They are regarded as incidental to the use of the machines, because they are such as machines in substantially good repair must from time to time need." This case is cited and relied upon by the defendant here. But we think the distinction is obvious. If the test be as suggested in the last sentence quoted, it is that ordinarily, at least, the repairs which the master may delegate are those arising incidentally from the use of properly constructed appliances, such ordinary repairs as they must naturally require from time to time by reason of their use. To replace a rotten round of a ladder is not, as we have said, such an ordinary repair. The rottenness, such as is complained of here, is not incidental to the use of a well-constructed ladder.

Besides, we think the jury were warranted in finding that the master had not delegated his duties with respect to the inspection and repair of this ladder. It had a man to make repairs; so does every master using machinery. But this man had no duty of inspection. It had a foreman of construction of its lines, and this foreman had general oversight over all the appliances, as we have already stated, and the making of repairs when needed. So it is in the case of every corporate master using appliances and employing men. To say that a master can escape the consequences of the breaking of a rotten round in a ladder by merely showing that he had a foreman, and that that foreman had the general oversight of all appliances, with the general duty, among others, of seeing that repairs were made, when necessary, would excuse practically all masters from responsibility in respect of keeping appliances in sound or safe condition. We do not think this is the law. The jury, therefore, upon the whole, were warranted in finding the defendant liable.

The defendant contends that the verdict for $3,000 was too large, and that it should be set aside on that account. The plaintiff was a competent lineman, earning $60 a month at the time of his injury. There was testimony that between the time of the accident and the time of the trial he had been able to do but comparatively little work. His present condition and his probable future condition were also matters for the jury to take into consideration. The defendant says that the medical testimony shows that he had virtually recovered. The jury, however, were not confined to the medical testimony, and they evidently thought he had not recovered. We cannot say that the evidence did not justify them in their conclusion. And, while the verdict seems large, it is not clearly shown to be so extravagant as to justify the interference of the court.

Motion overruled.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Re ESTATE OF Mrs. M. A. WILLARD, Deceased.

(139 Cal. 501.)

1. A decree of a probate court allowing compensation to a broker for services to an estate may be amended so as primarily to make the allowance to the administrator under a motion to strike the item altogether from the account.

2. A motion for new trial is not the sole remedy to cure an error in the amendment of a decree of a probate court allowing compensation to a broker who had rendered services to an estate, so as to make the allowance to the administrator, but the question is open upon appeal from a decree

NOTE.—Liability of estate for commissions of broker or agent who sells property.

I. When employment of broker or agent is permitted by the will, 554.

II. Statutes.

a. In general, 555.

b. Effect of allowance for brokerage upon executor's commissions, 555.

III. Right at common law to employ broker, 556.

IV. Right at common law to employ auctioneer, 557.

I. When employment of broker or agent is permitted by the will.

The right of an executor or administrator to employ a broker or agent to sell the property of the estate seems to be clear if authority so to do is directly or indirectly given by will, notwithstanding the existence of an otherwise controlling statute to a contrary effect.

Thus, the contract by an executor to pay brokerage was held valid, even in the face of a statute prescribing the fees an executor might receive for the sale of real estate, in Ingham v.

settling the account and ordering distribution of the estate.

3. An administrator may, in the discretion of the probate court, be allowed a reasonable amount to compensate for the services of a real-estate broker who succeeded in securing for the property belonging to the estate a materially greater amount than was bid for it at the attempted auction sale.

(July 3, 1903.)

A PPEAL by the heirs of Mrs. M. A. Willard, deceased, from a judgment of the Superior Court for Mendocino County making an allowance to the administrator for services of a broker in the disposition of the estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Ryan (Colo. App.) 71 Pac. 899, where the testator had, by his will, authorized the sale of real estate of which he might die seised at such times and prices as might seem wise to his executor. The court said that such a contract, even though in excess of the statutory rate, was within the power conferred by the will, and that, upon default in its performance, the executor could be sued thereon.

Clear and unequivocal language on the part of the testator does not seem necessary to obtain a construction of the will by the court permitting the employment of brokers by the personal representative, as a mere power to sell land, with the provision that it be sold as soon as practicable for cash and at a fair price, seems to be considered sufficient in O'Brien v. Gilleland, 79 Tex. 602, 15 S. W. 681, an action brought by real-estate agents against executors to recover commissions for the sale of land. The question arose upon demurrer to the petition, as to its sufficiency in regard to the power of the executors to employ brokers; but the court held that the power given by the will to sell the land of the estate, and hence to make the contract with the agents to sell, was alleged with sufficient definiteness.

The will in McWhorter v. Benson, Hopk. Ch. 28, authorized the executor to appoint an agent to take charge of and manage the estate, and an agent was therefore appointed for that purpose, and to sell parcels of the land. The court, upon final accounting, held that the executor was liable to the agent for a reasonable compensation, and entitled to reimbursement out of the estate.

II. Statutes

a. In general.

If governing statutes exist, the personal representative may exercise the privilege of employing a broker or agent only in harmony with them, in the absence of some power given in the will under which he may claim the right.

In view of a statute which pointed out the only manner in which the real property of a decedent's estate could be sold, and provided that all the money derived from its sale became the assets of the estate and subject to disposition only in accordance with law, it was held, in Danielwitz v. Sheppard, 62 Cal. 339, that the administratrix or heir had no power to dispose of the proceeds of sale in any other way, and 64 L. R. A.

Mr. Robert Duncan, for appellants:

The administrator had no authority or power to bind the estate by any contract whatever.

If the paper signed by the administrator in this case bound anybody at all, it bound the administrator personally, and not the estate.

Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 495, 51 Pac. 695.

The purported contract made between the administrator and F. B. Mulgrew is against public policy and absolutely void.

Danielwitz v. Sheppard, 62 Cal. 339; Re Page, 57 Cal. 238; Jones v. Hanna, 81 Cal. 509, 22 Pac. 883.

That part of the original decree of distritherefore that a written agreement whereby the administratrix and the heir of an estate promised to pay a broker all the money in excess of a certain sum which had been bid for real estate directed by the probate court to be sold, as a commission for obtaining a purchaser for the property, was unauthorized by statute, and contrary to the policy of the law.

Upon the authority of the above decision, Danielwitz v. Sheppard, 62 Cal. 342, in which the facts were the same, was decided without opinion.

But, under a statute providing that executors and administrators may be allowed all reasonable charges incurred in the administration of the estate of the person deceased, it was held, in Shepard v. Shepard, 19 Fla. 300, that an allowance for a sum paid an auctioneer for selling the personal property was a proper credit to the administrator. The court says: "It is a reasonable charge and disbursement for the benefit of the estate. Sale of the personal property by an experienced auctioneer will result, generally, in great benefit to the estate."

The commissions paid the auctioneer, however, must not be at a higher rate than allowed by statute, as, in Re Dunn, 8 N. Y. S. R. 766, it was held that the compensation paid by administrators to auctioneers for making sale of decedent's stock of goods should have been limited to the amount allowed by statute, which was 2½ per cent of the amount of the sales.

b. Effect of allowance for brokerage upon executor's commissions.

Where a statute provided that the 5-per cent commission allowed executors and administrators should be as full compensation for their services and trouble, it was held, in Jacobs v. Jacobs, 99 Mo. 427, 12 S. W. 457, that the statute was the measure of the executrix's compensation for the discharge of her duties, whether they were discharged by her or her agents; and, therefore, that credit for commissions paid agents for effecting sales of real estate should not have been allowed her in addition to the statutory commission of 5 per cent.

And, partly in view of the fact that brokers' commissions for the sale of personal property had been paid out of the estate, the executors' commissions were cut down from 5 per cent on the amount of the estate which came into their hands to be administered to 3¼ per cent, in Pomeroy v. Mills, 35 N. J. Eq. 442, and, upon bution directing the administrator to pay to Mulgrew, who was a stranger to the record, the sum of $1,000 was void.

Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 37, 16 Pac. 345; Re Ogier, 101 Cal. 385, 40 Am. St. Rep. 61, 35 Pac. 900; Re Levinson, 108 Cal. 454, 41 Pac. 483; Re Brignole, 133 Cal. 164, 65 Pac. 294.

A judgment void upon its face, or shown to be void by an inspection of the judgment roll, may be set aside at any time.

People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 5 Am. St. Rep. 448, 16 Pac. 197; People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 574, 36 Pac. 9; 1 Black, Judgm. § 307.

That part of the decree ordering $1,000 to be paid to Mulgrew is shown to be void by a mere inspection of the judgment roll in this case, and the court should have set that portion of it aside on motion of the heirs.

Re Page, 57 Cal. 239; Re Levinson, 108 Cal. 454, 41 Pac. 483.

The superior court had no authority or power to set aside the whole of the first decreed of distribution on the ground of the mistake and inadvertence of the court.

Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899; Moore v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 495, 25 Pac. 22.

An administrator cannot bind an estate at all by any contract, though the contract made by him be for the benefit of the estate.

Johnson v. Leman, 131 Ill. 609, 7 L. R. A. 656, 19 Am. St. Rep. 67, 23 N. E. 435; Schlicker v. Hemenway, 110 Cal. 579, 52 Am. St. Rep. 119, 42 Pac. 1063; Schouler, Exrs. & Admsrs. §§ 256, 257.

A court cannot set aside its judgments or decrees on account of error or mistake as to what the law is.

1 Black, Judgm. § 329; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 Pac. 174.

Clerical misprisions in a judgment or decree may be corrected at any time, but judicial errors can be remedied only by a motion for a new trial or appeal.

Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22; San Joaquin Land & W. Co. v. West, 99 Cal. 345, 33 Pac. 928.

the subsequent hearing (37 N. J. Eq. 578), were further reduced to 2 per cent on the aggregate of the estate.

In Sloan's Estate, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 377, it appearing that an agent, employed with the consent of all the parties in interest, made a sale of real property belonging to the estate, and was paid therefor, a claim of the executor for commissions on the same sale was disallowed on the ground that he had done nothing more than the rest of the heirs in regard to the sale, for which he should be allowed commissions.

III. Right at common law to employ broker.

In the absence of controlling statutes or power given by the will, the few cases reported seem to favor the right of a personal representative to avail himself of the services of a broker under proper circumstances.

In Dey v. Codman, 89 N. J. Eq. 258, the court declared that there was no good ground for disallowing administrators the sum of $300, which they had paid to one who was their attorney and counsel, and who, having interested himself to secure a purchaser for the estate's property for the executors and having secured one at $1,500, had demanded $300 as brokerage, which was paid to him accordingly.

The court, in declining to enter upon a consideration of the question of an executor's right to employ a broker to sell land, in Armstrong v. O'Brien, 83 Tex. 635, 19 S. W. 268, which was a subsequent hearing of O'Brien v. Gilleland, 79 Tex. 602, 15 S. W. 681, supra, I., upon the ground that the question had been previously disposed of, said: "The executors would be allowed all reasonable expenses necessarily incurred by them in the preservation, safe-keeping, and management of the estate, and all reasonable attorneys' fees that may be necessarily incurred by them in the course of the administration."

Upon the authority of Armstrong v. O'Brien, 83 Tex. 635, 19 S. W. 268, and O'Brien v. Gilleland, 79 Tex. 602, 15 S. W. 681, the court 64 L. R. A.

says, arguendo, in McCown v. Terrell, 9 Tex. Civ. App. at page 74, 29 S. W. 484, that it has been held that independent executors may lawfully employ agents to negotiate sales of lands for them.

It was contended in Lewis v. Reed, 11 Ind. 289, that a contract of purchase of a title bond upon which the action turned, made with an agent of an administrator, was void, because an administrator could not appoint an agent for the sale of property, but the court, in refusing to sustain this contention, declared that there was no doubt an administrator might appoint an agent to do particular acts; that if he was authorized by the court to sell property at private sale he could appoint an agent to negotiate the sale within the limits fixed by the court.

But, according to 11 U. S. Dig. N. S. 355, it is held, in Ballentine's Estate, Myrick, Prob. (Cal.) 86, that "an executrix has no authority to bargain with brokers to give them all they may receive above a certain sum on their sale of realty. The court determines their compensation."

This decision is in harmony with RE WILLARD'S ESTATE, where the court says that it is within the discretion of the judge to make an allowance to the administrator for an agent employed to assist in making sale of the estate property.

In order to charge the estate there must be no doubt of the liability of the executor, or the fact that the services were actually rendered. Thus, in Tucker v. Tucker, 29 N. J. Eq. 286, the fact that a judgment was recovered by a broker against an executor, not in his representative capacity, however, for commissions for the exchange of real property belonging to the estate, was held not to constitute a good reason for charging the estate with the payment thereof, when the executor swore it was for compensation which he never agreed to pay, and for services which were never rendered.

On petition for rehearing in banc.

The superior court could not set aside, annul, and vacate its original decree of distribution upon the ground of "inadvertence and mistake of court."

Mr. Arthur J. Thatcher, for respondent F. B. Mulgrew:

An administrator may employ an agent or broker for the performance of services requiring appliances or a degree of skill not within the command of ordinary persons, and the reasonable expenses of such agents are a proper charge against the estate.

IV. Right at common law to employ auctioneer.

In England, where, at common law, the office of executor or administrator is regarded as honorary, and its duties are performed without compensation, no decisions have been found discussing the right to employ brokers or agents to sell the estate property. The only instance discovered in which the point is touched upon, even incidentally, is Edmonds v. Peake, 7 Beav. 239, 13 L. J. Ch. N. S. 18, where executors were held not personally liable for a loss caused to the estate by reason of the insolvency of an auctioneer employed by them to sell leaseholds at auction, it not appearing that the money was lost by any want of diligence on their part. The master of the rolls remarks that the executors, in the discharge of their duties, were under the necessity of employing an auctioneer.

In the United States, where the rights and duties of executors and administrators are governed very largely by statutes, and their reasonable compensation for services incurred in the management of the estate is expressly provided for in almost every state, the employment of auctioneers to aid in the necessary disposition of the estate's property is a most ordinary practice, unquestioned by the courts, except where the sales were not made bona fide, or were, for some other reason, irregular.

Thus, it appearing in Garrett v. Garrett, 2 Strobh. Eq. 272, that the amount paid an auctioneer for selling personal property was not unreasonable, the court held that it should be allowed the executor, and stated that it was the custom to allow such charges for the benefit of the estate, it not being expected that executors and administrators were to perform such services, few trustees being qualified to so act.

And the administratrix, in Henderson v. Simmons, 33 Ala. 291, 70 Am. Dec. 590, was allowed a credit of $5, paid an auctioneer. The court stated that for extraordinary services, and for such as in their nature require a degree of skill or appliance not within the command of ordinary persons, the administrator might employ agencies; and that reasonable expenses incurred in this way for the benefit of the estate are a proper charge against it.

Also, in Pinckard v. Pinckard, 24 Ala. 250, an administrator was allowed the expense of two days' services of a crier at a sale of cotton belonging to the estate.

And it is stated, arguendo, in Lewis v. Reed, 11 Ind. 239, that, if an administrator is authorized by the court to sell goods at public sale, he may appoint an auctioneer to sell them.

The expenses incident to the sale of real estate, including auctioneer's charges, were held not to be "costs of administration" in the sense of being chargeable, in the first instance, upon the personalty, but were declared to be the costs of raising a fund which fell upon the fund itself, upon the ground that the duty to apply for an order of sale implies the right to employ all the agencies necessary to obtain the order and to carry it into execution. Teaf's Estate, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 463.

The only instances where the amounts paid for auctioneers' services have been disallowed, were where it appeared that the sale and proceedings had thereunder were not conducted in entire good faith on the part of the personal representative.

In Re Quin, 1 Connolly, 381, 5 N. Y. Supp. 261, the amount paid an auctioneer for offering real property for sale at a time at which it was bid in by the executors was disallowed, it not appearing that a price offered for the property at a prior sale was not a full and fair one.

And, in Navarro's Succession, 24 La. Ann. 105, the fees of an auctioneer, who had sold real estate under an order obtained by the curator on the ground that the succession was vacant, were upon its appearing that the succession was not in fact vacant, held improperly charged to the estate, and the auctioneer was directed to look to the curator individually for compensation.

Dec. (Cal.) 103.

Assuming that the vacating and setting aside of the first order and decree were not invited by the appellants, still the court below had ample power, independent of statutory provisions, to annul and vacate said, or any, order, judgment, or decree inadvertently made.

Messrs. White & Thomas for respondent administrator.

Per Curiam:

Appeal by the heirs at law of deceased from the amended decree of settlement of account and final distribution in so far as the account allows the sum of $1,000 to the administrator for the services of one F. B. Mulgrew in effecting a sale of the real estate of said estate. The administrator presented his final account and petition for distribution on May 1, 1902. The account showed, among other sources of the money sought to be distributed, an item of $20,000 for sale of real estate; and in his petition for allowance of the account the administrator stated "that F. B. Mulgrew rendered valuable assistance in effecting a sale of the real estate in securing Burns & Waterhouse as purchasers of said land, and he would ask that your petitioner be allowed a reasonable compensation to be paid to said F. B. Mulgrew for his services in said matter." The heirs at law filed objections to the allowance of any sum for the services of said Mulgrew. Upon the hearing the court, on May 12, 1902, made its decree allowing the account and ordering distribution, and on May 17th the decree was filed. In an amended decree, from which this appeal is taken, it is recited: "And said objecting heirs, through their said attorney, having on the 20th day of May, 1902, filed in this court a notice of motion (three days after the first decree was filed) to vacate and set aside said order settling said final account and the aforesaid decree of distribution, together with certain affidavits in support thereof, and said motion coming on regularly to be heard on the 26th day of May, 1902, . . . and it appearing to his court that by mistake and inadvertence of this court the said order settling the final account of said administrator in the said decree of distribution did not express the true intent and meaning of the court, and was not and is not such order as should have been made, it is therefore ordered," etc.

1. It is urged that the part of the original decree ordering $1,000 to be paid Mulgrew was void, and the court should have set aside that portion on motion of the heirs; whereas the court amended the decree in that regard, but did not disallow that item. Furthermore, it is claimed that the court had no authority to set aside the original decree on the ground of inadvertence and mistake of the court. The only substantial difference between the two decrees is that in the first one the court ordered that the sum of $1,000 be paid by the administrator, out of the funds of the estate, to Mulgrew, as a commission for services rendered to the administrator in securing a purchaser; while in the second or amended decree, after reciting the services of Mulgrew, the court ordered that the administrator be allowed (in addition to the items of expenditure set out in his account) the sum of $1,000 in compensation for the said services of said F. B. Mulgrew in effecting said sale. Presumably the court made the change in the decree because this court has held that the court could not allow for such services directly to the person rendering them, but could only, in a proper case, make the allowance to the administrator as expenses incurred by him. At the hearing of the motion the same evidence was before the court respecting Mulgrew's services as when the original decree was entered. Instead of allowing to the administrator the amount found to be reasonable for such services, the court made the allowance to Mulgrew, and in so doing made an order in such form as showed on its face that it was unauthorized, and that it was not in accordance with the prayer of the petitioner. The objecting heirs made the motion for the purpose, no doubt, of having the court reconsider the matter and deny the allowance in any form. But the court, thinking it a just expenditure, instead of striking out this provision from the decree, so amended the decree as to make it accomplish what the court intended, holding, of course, that the expenditure was a proper one to be allowed. The amendment simply amounted to changing the allowance from Mulgrew to the administrator, or from the wrong person to the right one. The intention of the court to make the allowance appears on the face of the decree, and the amendment does no more than to effectuate that intention, which the original decree had failed to do. In Leviston v. Swan, 33 Cal. 480, the judgment was defective in not designating the defendants who were personally liable for the debt in a foreclosure case. The court held that "inasmuch as the record shows who they were, the court had the power to amend the judgment at any time by adding a clause designating the defendants who were personally liable." In Re Schroeder, 46 Cal. 304, a personal judgment was entered against the administrator, and it appeared on the record that it should have been made payable in due course of administration. It was held that, even after the adjournment of the term, the court could direct an amendment of the judgment so as to make it correct. In the case here the court made an order which was a nullity, and which, therefore, failed to dispose of the issue presented by the petition. The attention of the court having been called to it by the motion, we think the court could so amend this judgment or order as to correctly dispose of the issue presented by the petition. And this the court could do, although the purpose of the motion was to have the item stricken out altogether. The contestants are still in position to test the correctness of the item, and whether it should have been allowed at all. We do not think the amendment was such a judicial error as could be remedied only by motion for new trial, as was the case in Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 27 Pac. 22. See the subject considered in Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646.

2. It appears from the evidence that the property was sold at public auction, and was struck off to one Vassar for $15,500, that being the highest and best bid. Return of sale was made, stating, among other things, that the sum bid was not disproportionate to the value of the property sold, and that a sum exceeding such bid at least 10 per cent, exclusive of expenses of sale, could not be obtained; that the administrator did not think he could get an increased bid of 10 per cent. After the sale the administrator met Mulgrew, and told him of the bid, and was informed by Mulgrew that he thought he could find a purchaser at an increased bid of 20 per cent, and asked the administrator if he would agree to pay him all in excess of that amount, or $18,600 net to the estate. The administrator replied that he did not know what authority he had to make such a contract, but would agree to this in so far as he could so act, and would agree to call attention of the probate court to all the circumstances, and ask the court to ratify what he had agreed to do in the interest of the estate. Thereupon a contract was signed by the administrator reciting the sale and the assurance of Mulgrew that he could obtain a purchaser who would pay $18,600, and further providing as follows: "Now, therefore, I agree that, if said F. B. Mulgrew procures said increased bid, that I will deem he has earned a commission of all of such sum in excess of $18,600, namely, $1,400, so procured, and to that end shall ask said new bidders $20,000 for said property, and, if obtained, I shall ask the judge of said probate court, in fairness to said F. B. Mulgrew, to make an order to pay to him the said sum of $1,400, or 5 per cent on amount of sale." It appears that Mulgrew then took the matter up with Burns & Waterhouse, who were looking elsewhere for a certain kind of property. Burns went personally, as a result of these efforts of Mulgrew, to examine the Mendocino property, and, being pleased with it, appeared at the confirmation, and, after some competition by others, bid in the property at $20,000, and the sale was confirmed to Burns & Waterhouse. The contestants of the account offered no evidence, and there is no evidence tending to impeach the good faith of the administrator. There was evidence justifying the court in finding that the sale to Burns & Waterhouse was the result of Mulgrew's efforts. Re Page, 57 Cal. 238, and Danielwitz v. Shepard, 62 Cal. 339, are cited by appellants as decisive of the question in favor of their contention. In the first of these cases the agreement was to pay a contingent fee to an attorney of one third of the rents and one third of the real property recovered to the estate by means of his services. The administrator embodied these agreements in his account, and asked the court to allow the amounts therein agreed to be paid. It was held that the administrator could not dispose of the property of the estate in this manner. But it was not decided that the administrator could not be allowed anything as expenses of administration by way of fees of an attorney fixed by the court. On the contrary, it was said that the law authorized this to be done. In the other case cited the action was on a contract not unlike the one now here, except that it was made by defendants as heirs, and not in any representative capacity, as found by the lower court. It was signed by the administratrix as such, and by another heir. The action was against them as heirs of the estate. The agreement was held to be invalid, even if the agreement should be treated as the individual contract of the signers thereto. In the case before us the administrator agreed to bring the matter to the attention of the court, and ask the judge, in fairness to Mulgrew, to pay him the amount agreed on. The court, in a decree, found that certain services were rendered by Mulgrew at the request of the administrator, "and that said services were such as required unusual exertion and extraordinary skill, experience, and ability," and that the agreement was that the administrator "would request this court, in the settlement of his accounts, to allow a reasonable sum and amount as compensation for said services," and the court found "that said services were and are of the reasonable value of $1,000." The court did not attempt to enforce the contract, but awarded to the administrator what it deemed a fair compensation to the broker or agent. The fact that the award happened to concur in part with the terms of the contract does not necessarily imply an enforcement of the contract. Mr. Woerner states it as a general rule "that executors and administrators are allowed, as proper credits in their accounts, all disbursements made in good faith for any liability of the estate, either arising in the course of the administration, or existing against the deceased at the time of his death, and paid in the manner prescribed by law;" giving numerous illustrations. 2 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, § 514. Where the expenditure is for the benefit of the estate, and is necessary, and is for services which it is the duty of the administrator to perform, but which he cannot himself perform, it is within the discretion of the judge to make an allowance to the administrator for such expenditure. No rule can be laid down which shall catalogue the various kinds of these expenditures or classify them. Much will depend upon the nature of the estate and upon the character of the services for which the charge is made. For example, it was said in Re Moore, 72 Cal. 335, 13 Pac. 880: "We cannot lay down as a universal rule that in no case should an administrator be allowed to employ a bookkeeper. This may properly be left to the probate judge." Nor can we lay down as a universal rule that an administrator may not employ an agent to assist him in the sale of estate property. In a sense an auctioneer is such an agent, and compensation for services of an auctioneer has often been allowed. Money paid by the administrator to expert accountants for examining the books of a partnership was held a proper expenditure. Re Levinson, 108 Cal. 450, 41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479. So of attorney's fees; they cannot be allowed to the attorney, but the probate judge may allow in the account of the administrator a reasonable amount to compensate for the necessary services of an attorney.

A. W. BENSON, Receiver of First National Bank of Emporia.

(.....Kan.....)

- *1. The constitutional exemption of a homestead from forced sale under process of law may survive to the family of its owner after his death.
2. If a husband and wife occupy a tract of land belonging to him as a homestead, she is the family of the owner, within the meaning of the Constitution and his death does not deprive her of the right to continue to be so designated, in order to maintain the homestead, to which she takes title, and which she continues to occupy, free from forced sale under process of law for the payment of his debts.

3. The purpose of the statute of descents and distributions is to provide for the transmission of title at death in case of intestacy, and to regulate the division of estates among heirs; it is not primarily an exemption or homestead law; and, though it may enlarge the right to an exemption of real estate from appropriation to the payment of debts, it cannot restrict the constitutional guaranty.
4. Upon the death of her husband, a wife may elect to take title under his will to their homestead, which she continues to occupy, without subjecting it to the payment of his debts.
5. The use of merely formal phrases will not make a devise of a homestead subject to the payment of the testator's debts. To do so, the language employed must be unequivocal and imperative.

NOTE.—As to rights of child or children in homestead of parent, see, in this series, Battery v. Barker, 56 L. R. A. 83, and note.

8. A trust deed examined, and held not to be testamentary in character.

7. A minor child, who resides with her grandparents under such circumstances that she becomes in fact dependent upon them, and they become morally responsible for her nurture, becomes a member of their family, within the meaning of the homestead provision of the Constitution, without formal adoption; and this is true even though her father, who is divorced from her mother, still lives, and has a decree of court awarding her custody to him.

ERROR to the District Court for Lyon County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to subject property claimed to be exempt as a homestead to the payment of the debts of H. C. Cross, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kellogg & Madden and Lambert & Huggins, for plaintiffs in error:

The homestead exemption laws are to be liberally construed, and creditors are not to lend their money, or otherwise extend credit, with the expectation of having the same paid out of the homestead.

Morris v. Ward, 5 Kan. 239; Monroe v. May, 9 Kan. 475; Vandiver v. Vandiver, 20 Kan. 505; Mallory v. Berry, 16 Kan. 293.

The exemption of homesteads for the benefit of the family is not limited in its operation to the lifetime of the owner.

The provision in the will that the just and lawful debts of the testator should first be paid out of the estate is limited to property not exempt by law from the payment of debts.

The conveyance of the property in controversy by Mrs. Cross during her lifetime, and while she and Mary were occupying the same as a residence, and while the homestead character still pertained to the property, to F. C. Newman, as trustee for Mary Cross, conveyed a good and perfect title, freed from the right to subject the same to the payment of the debts of H. C. Cross.

Messrs. Graves & Hamer and Rosington, Smith, & Histed, for defendant in error:

The children that are sought to be protected by the homestead law, or some of them, at least, must be minor children to obtain the benefits of the exemption act.

If Charles S. Cross had been a minor occupying the homestead at the time of his father's death, and afterwards reached the age of an adult, the property would have been subject to partition and distribution, subject to the debts of the deceased owner.

Dayton v. Donart, 22 Kan. 256; Batley v. Barker, 62 Kan. 520, 56 L. R. A. 33, 64 Pac. 79.

The homestead must have an inception, and such inception, to protect this property from the claims of creditors, must be at the very instant of the death of the intestate. It cannot subsequently accrue or be created. The fact that Mrs. Sue S. Cross continued to occupy this property, and sought to adopt a minor child, cannot throw the axis of homestead protection over it for her benefit, or for the benefit of her heirs.

Mrs. Sue S. Cross abrogated her homestead right, if she had any, by taking under the will.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 4th day of September, 1894, H. C. Cross, of the city of Emporia, died testate, leaving as his heirs at law his widow, Sue S. Cross, and an adult son, Charles S. Cross. At the time of his death he was the owner of certain contiguous lots of ground within the limits of the city, which in their entirety were less than 1 acre in extent, and which were occupied as a residence by himself and wife. Their infant granddaughter, Mary, the child of Charles S. Cross, lived with them. Charles S. Cross had been divorced from Mary's mother. The decree dissolving their marriage awarded the legal custody of the child to her father, but, by an understanding of the parties, it was arranged that Mary should make her home with her grandparents. Thenceforth they assumed the care and the responsibility of her nurture, and she was treated as their child. The will of H. C. Cross expressed the desire that his debts and funeral expenses be first paid, and devised the homestead to his wife. Upon its probate the widow elected to take under the will. After the death of her husband Mrs. Cross and Mary continued to reside upon the homestead property. Mrs. Cross continued to sustain the same cherishing relation toward Mary as before, and ultimately adopted her by formal proceedings in the probate court. Charles S. Cross survived his father little more than a year. Upon February 5, 1902, Sue S. Cross died, leaving a will, which was afterward properly probated, in which the homestead was devised to F. C. Newman, as executor, to be sold, however, and the proceeds to be invested in interest-bearing securities, which with the income to accrue from them, were to be the property of Mary. On the day following that of the execution of the will, Mrs. Cross executed a deed purporting to convey in fee the homestead, with full covenants of warranty, to F. C. Newman, as trustee, for the benefit of Mary; reserving to herself, however, a life estate, and providing that after her death the property should be sold, and the proceeds devoted to the same uses as the will prescribed. A subsequent codicil to the will annulled a specific request, and changed the beneficiaries of the residual portion of the estate, but did not disturb the devise of the homestead, upon which Mary continued to abide alone.

Creditors of the estate of H. C. Cross have secured a judgment subjecting this property to the payment of their claims, and the question for determination is whether that judgment is authorized by our Constitution and laws. In support of the judgment, the following claims are made:

"(1) The constitutional exemption does not survive the death of the owner of the homestead. Any extension of the homestead estate beyond the death of the owner must be found, if at all, in the statute of descents and distributions.

"(2) Under the statute of descents and distributions, a homestead estate does not survive for the benefit of a widow and child or children who have reached the age of majority, there being no minor heirs.

"(3) After the death of the homestead owner, who dies testate, leaving children who have attained the age of majority, and without minor heirs, his widow may elect to take under the statute of descents and distributions, or under the will. If she elects to take under the will, she thereby abrogates her right to claim any homestead exemption against the debts of her husband.

"Applying the foregoing propositions of law to the case at bar, our position may be summarized:

"(a) At the time of the death of H. C. Cross, he leaving a widow and one son, who had attained the years of majority, the homestead character of the property ceased and determined, and his widow and son, if he had died intestate, would have been entitled each to a moiety of the property under the statute of descents and distributions. Inasmuch as the only living adult son could not claim the integrity and protection of the homestead, neither could the widow.

"(b) But H. C. Cross died testate, and, in his will, devised the whole of the property in question to his widow; and, she electing to take thereunder, it follows that she thereby took the same subject to the ante mortem debts of her husband, the payment of which was expressly directed by his will.

"(4) Assuming, however, but merely for the purpose of argument, that Sue S. Cross did acquire a homestead under the will, exempt from the debts of her husband, such homestead, affected by such exemption, could continue only during her life; and while she might sell or convey the property in her lifetime, free from the obligations of her husband, she could not devise it, nor could her heirs inherit it, exempt from the payment of her husband's debts.

"(5) The trust deed to F. C. Newman, of March 2, 1901, was not a conveyance, but amounted merely to a testamentary disposition of her property in accordance with the terms of the will already made, and this is made conclusively apparent by her subsequent change in the disposition of her property by the codicil of November 21st."

The principal question here proposed for determination is one of constitutional interpretation.

Out of the womb of history there has come to us an institution known as the "family." Its establishment has been believed to be by the ordinance of Divinity itself. "God setteth the solitary in families." The pagan Plato understood its fundamental importance. "Whatever is most excellent in the state must always begin at the fireside." And when the modern critical method of inquiry made it the subject of investigation, and the sciences of biology and anthropology and sociology, and the rest, had summed up and compared the results of their exhaustive researches, they concurred in proclaiming that, aside from its efficiency as an economic arrangement for the promotion of race and individual progress, the moral virtues which constitute the bright, consummate flower of our humanity all had their origin, received their nurture, and attained their perfection within and through the family. Therefore the present age, with its keener insight and its ampler understanding, regards the family with an enthusiasm and respect more tender, more intense, and more profound than ever before; and the courts will abate none of their jealousy to see that laws intended for its conservation and protection are administered in a spirit as beneficial and as kind as the language of the instrument will bear.

A consideration of the origin and purpose of the homestead right, and of its establishment in the Constitution of this state, will show that the provisions made in that document were intended to be complete, and that all legislative action in attaining the desired end was intended to be dispensed with. With a higher appreciation of the function and importance of the family came more liberal sentiments towards its submerged element, the wife, and her elevation, through an amelioration of the law. The word "family" has its root in the Oscan word famul, which signifies a slave. Much of this primary meaning was applicable to the status of married women at the common law with reference to property. Marriage amounted to a spoliation of the woman, and an investiture of the man with property in her personality, and the possession and enjoyment of her realty, and her individuality of management and control of whatever was hers at marriage was completely merged in that of her husband. Under the same common law the creditor could seize and appropriate to the satisfaction of his debt the goods and the estates of his debtor, without distinction as to whether they were held by virtue of his marital right, or by other methods of acquisition and ownership. As a result, wives found themselves stripped of their possessions by the folly or misconduct of spendthrift husbands, reduced to penury without any fault of their own, and rendered powerless to retrieve their fortunes by the incapacity which the law imposed. To eradicate these evils, hoary with the sanction of centuries, two remedial measures were proposed,—the married woman's separate estate, and the homestead right; the one seeking to restore to women their just share in the management and control of their own property, and the other seeking to guard against the sufferings of women and children, who, through ill conduct or misadventure, were deprived of support, by segregating a modicum of property for undisturbed occupation as a home, entirely exempt from the ordinary incidents of ownership,—the right of free alienation by the owner, and the liability to seizure and sale for his debts. Article 15 of the Constitution contains provisions upon both these subjects. But the saving of a home to the family, free from alienation without joint consent, and beyond the reach of process of the law, was of overshadowing importance. Therefore, while § 6 directs the legislature to provide for the protection of the rights of women in acquiring and possessing property, real, personal, and mixed, separate and apart from the husbands, § 9 itself creates, limits, and defines the homestead right. The difference in treatment of the two subjects is strikingly shown by bringing the sections of the Constitution relating to them in juxtaposition:

"Sec. 6. The legislature shall provide for the protection of the rights of women, in 64 L. R. A.

acquiring and possessing property, real, personal and mixed, separate and apart from the husband; and shall also provide for their equal rights in the possession of their children."

"Sec. 9. A homestead to the extent of 160 acres of farming land, or of 1 acre within the limits of an incorporated town or city, occupied as a residence by the family of the owner, together with all the improvements on the same, shall be exempted from forced sale under any process of law, and shall not be alienated without the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation exists; but no property shall be exempt from sale for taxes, or for the payment of obligations contracted for the purchase of said premises, or for the erection of improvements thereon: Provided, the provisions of this section shall not apply to any process of law obtained by virtue of a lien given by the consent of both husband and wife."

Sections 6, 9, art. 15, State Const.

Upon the matter of homestead not only is legislative aid dispensed with, but legislative interference is foreclosed. Without any statute upon the subject, no forced sale of any homestead occupied in the manner prescribed could be lawful, and no conditions may be imposed by statute upon the enjoyment of the right. Since this is true, it is not apparent why the framers of the Constitution, with all their admirable solicitude for the poverty and pain of the innocent victims of weakness and folly and unpropitious fate, should forget the desolation and disaster which follow in the wake of death; why a wife and children should be so zealously screened so long as a husband and father lives to beat up the stream of the world's unkindness with them, but that a widow and orphans should be left to the whim and caprice of inconstant legislation. Indeed, it would seem to be something of an imputation to assert that the constitutional convention stopped short in its labors, and left the most delicate and the most urgent portion of its work unguarded to the legislature. The language of the Constitution itself forbids such an interpretation. By its terms the area and appurtenances of the homestead are expressly limited; the beneficiary of the right is expressly limited; the manner of its enjoyment is expressly limited; the method of transferring the estate in the land it covers is expressly limited; the charges which may be made against it are expressly limited, and the character of process upon which it may be sold is expressly limited; but the time during which occupation by the family of the owner shall be a barrier to its appropriation for the payment of debts is not limited. There is no time appointed beyond which it shall not endure.

To satisfy the creditors who press this suit, it is necessary to ingraft upon the words of the Constitution, "shall be exempted from forced sale under any process of law," the alien phrase, "during the lifetime of the owner whose family occupies it." The Constitution itself forbears to express any such limitation. Such an interpretation can scarcely be made in a document which enumerates its own exceptions and prescribes its own limitations, and much less should it be undertaken when the result would be to abridge the scope and curtail the benignant power of a remedial charter.

Whenever, therefore, a homestead is once established, it will endure as long as the enumerated elements essential to its existence continue to co-ordinate. The homestead may be voluntarily abandoned by those entitled to its privileges, it may be conveyed away, and the family itself may be dissolved, until there is no one left to invoke the constitutional protection, as in Ellinger v. Thomas, 64 Kan. 180, 67 Pac. 529; but, so long as family occupation as a residence persists, no creditor may obtrude upon the sanctity of the homestead demesne.

Applying these propositions to the case at bar, and, for the purpose of the application, excluding Mary Cross from the family of her grandfather, it may be observed that, before the death of H. C. Cross, his wife, Sue S. Cross, constituted his family. That he had an adult son living apart from him in no way disparaged that fact. She was "the family of the owner" of the lots. Because she was his family, and occupied the lots as a residence, it was exempt from the payment of his debts. When her husband died, the conditions in respect of which the Constitution gave her a home were not improved. The gaunt gray wolf of debt, that had been skulking in the shadows of her habitation and crouching at its door, could ravage still. She continued, as before, to be the constituent element of the family of H. C. Cross; she continued in the rightful occupation of the homestead as her residence; and it would turn into mockery the constitutional provision prepared against the days of her adversity to say that her husband's creditors might enter as soon as his hearse had left the door.

It is said, however, that, in the light of the statute of descents and distributions, the homestead must be regarded as ceasing at the death of H. C. Cross. The statute of descents and distributions can shed no light upon the subject. The Constitution creates the homestead. This court is the final interpreter of that instrument, and no 64 L. R. A. legislative misconception of its scope, if any such should become manifest, can be permitted to diminish the field of its operation. However, the purpose of the statute of descents and distributions must be taken to be what its name imports,—a statute providing for the transmission of title at death in cases of intestacy, and regulating the division of estates among heirs. It is not an exemption or homestead law. Upon the death of the owner, the title to his land must vest anew, or escheat to the state. If there be no will, the law alone accomplishes the transfer, and names the persons who take. With this devolution of title the Constitution has nothing to do. Property descending to heirs must be distributed, to be properly enjoyed. With this distribution the Constitution has nothing to do. These are matters left by the Constitution to the legislature. But homestead interests are disturbed by them no more than the division of the title and the division of the land necessarily require, and the rights of creditors are enlarged no further than these circumstances necessarily compel. Neither descent nor distribution can make subject to execution for payment of debts any portion of the homestead inherited and occupied by a person who is not by death or by subsequent circumstances taken from the category of the family of the owner. If in this case there had been no will, upon the death of H. C. Cross the title to the homestead would have descended to Sue S. Cross, the widow, and the adult son, Charles S. Cross. It may be granted, for the purpose of the illustration, that, because the latter was of mature age, partition could have been compelled. But, because Sue S. Cross was the beneficiary of a homestead right in the property, her share upon a division would have retained its homestead character so long as she chose to observe the requirements making it such. The primary function of the statute of descents and distributions, therefore, is the transfer of title and the partition of the estate among its inheritors; and, while it may enlarge the privilege of freedom from appropriation to the payment of debts, it cannot restrict the constitutional guaranty. If it be said that this construction of the Constitution is not in harmony with those provisions of the statute of descents and distributions which seem to permit no homestead privilege to a widow when adult children also survive the owner's death, it can only be replied that the Constitution is the paramount law, and its mandates must be obeyed.

It is further claimed that the taking of title under the will of a homestead owner necessarily abrogates the homestead right, because a person must devise his lands

"subject, nevertheless, to the rights of creditors." § 7937, Gen. Stat. 1901. This proposition ignores the persistence of the exemption from forced sale, independent of changes in the title already illustrated in the case of descent. In this case Sue S. Cross occupied the lots in question as a residence, and as the family of the owner, H. C. Cross. By the will of the owner the title was devised to her, and she elected to take under the will. But there was no hiatus in her occupation of the premises as a residence and as the family of H. C. Cross. The homestead privilege was no more disturbed than it would have been, had H. C. Cross deeded the lots to his wife in his lifetime, and while she was occupying them as a homestead. She continued in the enjoyment of precisely the same right to immunity from the loss of her hearthstone at the suit of her husband's creditors as before his death. And since the lots in question were continually impressed with the homestead interest of Sue S. Cross in the lifetime of her husband, at the date of his death, and during the following years, until her own demise, creditors enjoyed no rights to which such lots were subject, or to which the making of a will of them was subject.

It is asserted that since Sue S. Cross elected to take the property in question under the terms of a will, in which a request that the testator's debts and funeral expenses be first paid was expressed, she held it subject to the payment of such charges. In England the validity of the rule that a general direction for the payment of debts creates a charge upon real estate is now doubted. "Such, then, is the long line of cases in which it has been held that a general direction by a testator that his debts shall be paid charges them upon his real estate. Though certainly in some of the wills there were expressions which might fairly be considered to sustain the construction independently of any such doctrine, it seems to be generally admitted that the courts have allowed their anxiety to prevent moral injustice by the exclusion of creditors, 'and that men should not sin in their graves,' to carry them beyond the limits prescribed by established general principles of construction." Jarman, Wills, § 1397. In Bigelow on Wills, 317, it is said: "Indeed, as a new question, there would be ground for question whether a direction to pay debts and legacies should be deemed a charge upon land devised." In Re Rochester, 110 N. Y. 159, 17 N. E. 740, it is said: "Payment of debts will not be charged upon a devise of real estate without clear evidence of such an intent in the will. The intention may not be presumed merely from the use of formal words, or the presence of commonly employed phrases." Other American cases are to the same effect. Starks v. Wilson, 65 Ala. 576; Ooock v. Ooock, 5 Houst. (Del.) 540, 1 Am. St. Rep. 161; Re Bingham, 127 N. Y. 296, 27 N. E. 1055; Re Powers, 124 N. Y. 361, 26 N. E. 940. Much more imperative and unequivocal must be the language of a will which would subject to the payment of debts that property toward which the eye of the creditor need never be turned.

Finally, it is said that, even though Sue S. Cross might have the right to enjoy the property in question free from her husband's debts during her lifetime, and might have the right to convey it disencumbered of such obligations, yet the Newman trust deed was insufficient for such purpose, because it was testamentary in character. A policy to be followed in the construction of doubtful instruments of the character under consideration was adopted in Love v. Blauw, 61 Kan. 496, 48 L. R. A. 257, 78 Am. St. Rep. 334, 59 Pac. 1059, and applied in Durand v. Higgins, 67 Kan. 110, 72 Pac. 567. It will not now be departed from. The codicil to the will, executed after the relations of the parties to the deed had become fixed, could not alter their rights.

The constitutional question discussed above is a new one. Because of the diversity of their provisions, and the contrariety of view of the courts construing them, little assistance has been derived from the Constitutions and laws of other states. No previous decision of this court has been made with the interpretation of the Constitution here adopted in mind. Many expressions of opinion to be found in earlier cases point the way. Some affirmations by way of argument and illustration appear to be opposed to the view here taken. But upon a careful discrimination of the precise points determined, it will appear that no former decision need now be overturned. The case of Batley v. Barker, 62 Kan. 517, 56 L. R. A. 33, 64 Pac. 79, is most in conflict. The doctrine there applied is the strict one upon which Ellinger v. Thomas, 64 Kan. 180, 67 Pac. 529, is based. In the latter case it was held that a sole adult remnant could not himself constitute his own family, so as to preserve land exempt from the payment of his own debts. Thus, it might be argued that, after the death of H. C. Cross, Sue S. Cross could not herself be her own family, as against the claims of her creditors. If, however, this be admitted, a single individual, Sue S. Cross, was sufficient to constitute the family of H. C. Cross, and, because of her sole existence, the precincts of her home were inviolable by his creditors. H. C. Cross and Sue S. Cross alone exhibited the clear distinction of the Constitution between an owner, whose property is liable for his debts, and his family, who would be unhoused if the liability were enforced; and his death could not deprive her of the right to continue to be designated the family of H. C. Cross, as against the claims of those same creditors.

In order that the ground of this decision might not be misunderstood, the relation of Mary Cross to this homestead has been excluded from consideration. If, however, a plurality of persons were required to form the family of H. C. Cross, the condition was fulfilled. Even though her father was alive, and held a court decree for her custody, by the conduct of the parties Mary Cross became a member of the family of H. C. Cross, within the meaning of the homestead provision of the Constitution. Formal adoption was not necessary. The fact of her actual dependence upon her grandparents, and their consequent moral responsibility for her nurture, was sufficient. "It is also well settled that it is not necessary that the relation of husband and wife, nor that of parent and child, should exist, in order to constitute a family. Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 S. C. N. S. 226; Garaty v. Du Bose, 5 S. C. N. S. 493; Moore v. Parker, 13 S. C. 486; Rollings v. Evans, 23 S. C. 316. . . . Nor do we think that it is necessary that there should be any legal obligation on the part of one claiming to be the head of a family to support the members thereof, but a moral duty, arising from ties of blood, or possibility other similar relations, will be sufficient. As is said in 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 804, note 2, 'the test of a legal duty has been rarely applied, and unquestionably a moral duty to support the members of a family is sufficient to constitute one its head;' citing Thomp. Homesteads & Exemptions, § 45. Accordingly we find that it has been held in Arnold v. Waltz, 53 Iowa, 706, 36 Am. Rep. 248, 6 N. W. 40, that an unmarried woman, keeping house, and there bringing up two children of her deceased sister, is the head of a family, though she has taken no steps to adopt said children under the statute of that state; in Wade v. Jones, 20 Mo. 75, 61 Am. Dec. 584, that a brother living with his widowed sister and her four small children, and providing for them, is the head of a family; in Bailey v. Comings, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 382, Fed. Cas. No. 733, that a bachelor who supports a widowed sister, who keeps house for him, may be the head of a family. We are inclined to agree with what is said by Anderson, J., in Calhoun v. Williams, 32 Gratt. 18, 34 Am. 64 L. R. A.

Rep. 759: "The whole theory and policy of the homestead [law] is founded upon the principle that there is a natural and moral obligation on the head of a family to provide for the support of his wife and children, and other persons dependent on him, towards whom he stands almost in loco parentis, which is, if not paramount, equal, to his obligation to pay his debts. . . . The family may consist of a wife and children, or of other persons who may stand in a state of dependence in the family relation, or it may consist of persons standing in either of these relations, whether the father or mother, or a brother or a sister, or other relation, is the head; but they must be persons who are dependent in some measure on the head for support, and who have an interest in his holding his property, and would be prejudiced by its seizure and sale under execution or other process, and who would be benefited by its exemption." Moyer v. Drummond, 32 S. C. 165, 168, 7 L. R. A. 747, 17 Am. St. Rep. 850, 10 S. E. 952. "While there was no legal obligation on the part of this widow to support the minor children of her husband, yet we think that, inasmuch as she undertook to keep them together, and to care for and support them, as the evidence shows she did, they all remained members of the testator's family, . . . and, under the laws of this state, she was entitled to a homestead, as the head of a family. See Capek v. Kropik, 129 Ill. 509, 21 N. E. 836, where it was held that, on the death of his wife, a widower, together with his minor stepchildren, was entitled to a homestead in an entire lot of land which he had held in common with his wife. Moreover, when Mrs. Holloway took the minor children under her care and custody, she stood in the relation of a parent to them, and took upon herself that obligation. She then was under a moral obligation to support and maintain these children, and the authorities hold that such a moral obligation is sufficient to entitle her to have a homestead set apart for the benefit of herself and the minor children." Holloway v. Holloway, 86 Ga. 576, 578, 11 L. R. A. 518, 22 Am. St. Rep. 484, 12 S. E. 943.

From all this it follows that the judgment of the District Court must be reversed, with direction to that tribunal to enter judgment upon the agreed facts in favor of the defendants, and it is so ordered.

All the Justices concur.

v.

John H. ELWARD et al.

(.....Kan.....)

An indorsee of a negotiable note taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, there being no extension of time of payment or other new consideration, except such as may be deemed to arise from the acceptance of the paper, is a holder for value and in due course of business; and, in the absence of any circumstances charging him with notice, is protected against a claim of payment made to the original payee.

(January 9, 1904.)

ERROR to the District Court for Reno County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carr W. Taylor and J. U. Brown, for plaintiff in error:

If the defendants in error believed that the note had been stolen by Gilliam, the payee thereof, and pledged as collateral security by him to plaintiff in error, and that plaintiff in error had knowledge of Gilliam's mala fides, it was their duty to allege the facts supporting their belief.

Halbert v. Ellwood, 1 Kan. App. 95, 41 Pac. 67; Jones, Pledges & Collateral Securities, 2d ed. § 104; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343, 15 L. ed. 934; Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 46 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620.

The transfer of negotiable paper before maturity raises the presumption of the want of notice of any defense to it; and this presumption prevails until overcome by proof.

Carpenter v. Longan, 16 Wall. 271, 21 L. ed. 313.

The evidence proved, conclusively, that the plaintiff in error was the owner of said collateral note and mortgage; that he acquired the same in good faith, for full value, in the usual course of business, before maturity, and without notice of any circumstance that would impeach its validity.

Mann v. Second Nat. Bank, 34 Kan. 746, 10 Pac. 150.

The holder of a note transferred as collateral security for a loan made prior to its transfer is a holder for value.

Messrs. George A. Vanderveer and F. L. Martin for defendants in error.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John H. Elward and William A. R. Elward on September 25, 1894, executed to George T. Gilliam a negotiable note due in five years, and William A. R. Elward executed as security for the note a mortgage on real estate in Reno county. On June 24, 1901, John Charles Birket sued the Elwards upon the note and mortgage, claiming to have acquired them by indorsement and under such circumstances as to make him an innocent purchaser. The defendants answered with a general denial, which put in issue the question whether plaintiff was a bona fide holder, and an allegation that the note had been fully paid to Gilliam by the makers without knowledge or notice of any transfer to plaintiff. A reply was filed, consisting of a general denial. Upon the trial plaintiff testified that he acquired the note April 28, 1896, at the time of making a loan of $2,000 to Gilliam, as collateral security for such loan. The evidence of defendants showed that on May 25, 1896, the Elwards executed a new note and mortgage to Gilliam in consideration of the satisfaction of the old debt and an additional loan of $500; that the old papers were surrendered to John H. Elward, who placed them in a box, which he left in the custody of Gilliam; that on June 25, 1896, a release of the first mortgage, executed and acknowledged by Gilliam, was filed for record with the register of deeds. The amount due plaintiff from Gilliam was shown to be $814. The court instructed the jury that the only question for their determination was the date at which plaintiff acquired the note; that if he acquired it before June 25, 1896 (the date of the record of the satisfaction of the mortgage), he should recover; that otherwise the verdict should be for defendants. The jury found specially that plaintiff acquired the note after that date, and judgment followed for the defendants, which plaintiff now seeks to reverse.

The theory upon which the trial court held the date of the recording of the mortgage release to be important is not discussed in the briefs, and is not material, since the instruction and judgment are now defended on the ground that, if plaintiff took the note as collateral security for Gilliam's debt at any time after such debt was created (namely, April 28, 1896), he took it subject to any defense that could be made against the original payee. It is obvious that plaintiff could only recover on the theory that he was an innocent purchaser, and the sole question here involved, therefore, is whether one who takes commercial paper as collateral security for an existing debt, without an agreement for an extension of time or other new consideration, is ever entitled to protection as a bona fide holder. If so, the judgment must be reversed; otherwise it must be affirmed.

The rule in the Federal courts, as well as in those of England and Canada, is that the holder of a negotiable note taken as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is a holder for value in due course of business, and as such is protected against all latent equities of third parties. The state courts that have passed upon the question are in irreconcilable conflict. The cases are collected in 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 290-293, and in 7 Cyc. 932-935. The lists there given indicate with substantial but not absolute correctness the line of cleavage. It is to be noted that in each of them Kansas is wrongly placed among the states that are committed to the rule stated, upon the strength, respectively, of the cases of National Bank v. Dakin, 54 Kan. 656, 45 Am. St. Rep. 299, 39 Pac. 180, and Best v. Crall, 23 Kan. 482, 33 Am. Rep. 185. While these cases have a tendency in that direction, they do not go the full length indicated. In National Bank v. Dakin the note involved was transferred as collateral security for a debt created at the time of, and in reliance upon, such transfer, which was therefore supported by a new consideration, sufficient upon any theory of the law. In the opinion a number of cases are cited as supporting the proposition that even a pre-existing debt would afford a sufficient consideration for the purpose, and among them was included Best v. Crall. In that case the collateral note was in fact transferred as security for a debt that already existed; but this was done pursuant to a promise made when such original debt was created, so that the effect was the same as though the transfer had actually been made at that time. A careful examination of the cases cited in the lists referred to discloses that in the following states the rule of the Federal court has been adopted: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Vermont, and West Virginia. In California and Nevada the matter is affected by statutory provisions that the acceptance of the security forfeits a right to attach. Nebraska is also now committed to this doctrine. Lashmett v. Prall (Neb.) 96 N. W. 152. Such citations further show that in the following states the rule has been denied: Alabama, Arkansas, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, Wisconsin. North Carolina also should now be placed in this list, but there, as well as in Tennessee and Virginia, the legislature has lately changed the rule by statute. See Brooks v. Sullivan, 129 N. C. 190, 39 S. E. 822; Bank of Charleston v. Johnson, 105 Tenn. 521, 59 S. W. 131; Norfolk County v. Cox, 98 Va. 270, 36 S. E. 380. In New York, in 1897, in a revision of the law of negotiable instruments, it was enacted that "value is any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. An antecedent or pre-existing debt constitutes value." It was held in Brewster v. Shrader, 26 Misc. 480, 57 N. Y. Supp. 606, that this statute changed the law 64 L. R. A.

as formerly administered in that state, and that under it an indorsee of a note taken as collateral to a pre-existing indebtedness is a holder for value, unaffected by equities between the original parties. But in Sutherland v. Mead, 80 App. Div. 103, 80 N. Y. Supp. 504, this was denied, and it was said that the new statute was purely declaratory. We do not discover that the New York court of appeals has passed upon the effect of this legislation. What may fairly be called the minority doctrine originated in New York in Bay v. Coddington, 5 Johns. Ch. 54, 9 Am. Dec. 268, the opinion being written by Chancellor Kent. The leading case in this country on the majority side is Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865, the opinion being written by Justice Story. It was there declared that one who took negotiable paper in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt was a holder for value and in due course of business, and the argument was made in support of that express proposition. But the reference to paper taken as security was not required by the facts of the case, and Justice Catron dissented on this ground. In Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61, the same reasoning was adopted and applied in a case where the transfer was made merely to secure an antecedent debt. The note there involved had several indorsers, and the obligation assumed by the last holder to give them notice of nonpayment was treated as a part of the consideration of the transfer; but the decision did not turn upon this treatment. And in American File Co. v. Garrett, 110 U. S. 288, 28 L. ed. 149, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 90, the principle was applied where there were no prior indorsers. In the opinion in Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank, it was noted (citing 3 Kent's Commentaries, p. 81, note b) that Chancellor Kent, after the decision in Swift v. Tyson, indicated that he was inclined to concur in it, as the plainer and better doctrine. The Bay-Coddington Case and the Swift-Tyson Case are cited in almost every opinion in which the merits of the question under consideration are discussed, and the state courts have ordinarily taken sides upon the matter as the arguments of the one decision or the other have appealed to them with the greater force. In the former case it is said: "It is the credit given to the paper, and the consideration bona fide paid on receiving it, that entitles the holder, on grounds of commercial policy, to such extraordinary protection, even in cases of the most palpable fraud. It is an exception to the general rule of law, and ought not to be carried beyond the necessity that created it." In the latter case it is said: "Receiving it [a negotiable instrument] in payment of, or as security for, a pre-existing debt is according to the known usual course of trade and business. And why, upon principle, should not a pre-existing debt be deemed such a valuable consideration? It is for the benefit and convenience of the commercial world to give as wide an extent as practicable to the credit and circulation of negotiable paper, that it may pass, not only as security for new purchases and advances, made upon the transfer thereof, but also in payment of, and as security for, pre-existing debts. The creditor is thereby enabled to realize or to secure his debt, and thus may safely give a prolonged credit, or forbear from taking any legal steps to enforce his rights. The debtor also has the advantage of making his negotiable securities of equivalent value to cash. But establish the opposite conclusion, that negotiable paper cannot be applied in payment of, or as security for, pre-existing debts, without letting in all the equities between the original and antecedent parties, and the value and circulation of such securities must be essentially diminished, and the debtor driven to the embarrassment of making a sale thereof, often at a ruinous discount, to some third person, and then by circuitry to apply the proceeds to the payment of his debts."

Among other arguments advanced in behalf of the majority view are, that the question is really one of the law merchant,—the custom of merchants,—and that a "transfer by a debtor to his creditor of a negotiable instrument, to pay or only to secure a prior debt, makes the creditor a holder for value, by the custom" (Bigelow, Bills, Notes, & Checks, 247); that the creditor, in accepting a negotiable note, whether or not there are parties to be charged by notice, does undertake to exercise some degree of diligence (2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 804), thereby affording a new consideration, or, at all events, that he "is naturally lulled into security and inactivity by crediting the face of the note, and he should not be made to suffer by the maker for confidence which his own promise created" (1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 831a); that the true consideration for the transfer is the debt due from the indorser to the indorsee, and the obligation to pay or secure said debt; that such transfer is a sufficient consideration, because "security for the payment of a debt actually owing is a good consideration, and sufficient to support a transfer of property" (separate opinion of Justice Bradley in Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61). That the policy of the law is to facilitate the transfer of negotiable paper free of equities is illustrated by the fact that it is almost universally held that one who acquires it in payment of an antecedent debt is a bona fide holder (Draper v. Cowles, 27 Kan. 484; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 285), whereas the ordinary rule in reference to protection under recording acts is that one who accepts property in satisfaction of an existing debt is not an innocent purchaser (4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 490; Dolan v. Van Demark, 35 Kan. 304, 10 Pac. 848; Henderson v. Gibbs, 39 Kan. 680, 18 Pac. 926). Even where the New York doctrine is accepted, an exception is made against the plea of lack of consideration when made by an accommodation party to the paper transferred as security. (Grocers' Bank v. Penfield, 69 N. Y. 502, 25 Am. Rep. 231; Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620; Smith v. Wachob, 179 Pa. 260, 36 Atl. 221.

If the question were a new one, to be determined upon consideration of equitable principles, there would be strong reasons for holding that he who takes a note merely as security for an existing debt acquires no greater right than his debtor had. The reasons given in Mann v. Second Nat. Bank, 30 Kan. 412, 1 Pac. 579, for applying this rule to a bank that receives a note from a depositor, and adds the amount to his account, which is not overdrawn, would seem to apply to the case of one who receives the paper as collateral for an indebtedness already existing. He parts with nothing, and is in no worse situation than he was before. It requires no variation of usual procedure to save him from loss. But on the other hand, the same arguments would reach the case of him who takes commercial paper in payment of an existing unsecured debt. He likewise is in no way placed in any worse situation than he was before, since, while the original debt may be regarded as technically canceled, he at all events has his remedy upon the collateral against the person from whom he received it, whatever defense might be available to the maker. He still has a valid claim against his original debtor, and that is all he had in the first place. See Randolph on Commercial Paper, §§ 461-465. Yet, as has just been said, one acquiring commercial paper under such circumstances is held to be protected as an innocent purchaser.

But the question before us is peculiarly one in which great weight should be given to the authorities, and especially to the decisions of the courts of the national government, which do not recognize any local law in such matters. Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 239, 25 L. ed. 580. The question is one likely to arise frequently in transactions between inhabitants of different states. It is important that the law should be uniform in the different jurisdictions. It was doubtless in recognition of this consideration that the legislatures of North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and possibly New York, as already noted, have lately by statute brought their local law on the subject into harmony with the general law as administered by the Federal and by the greater number of the state courts. We prefer to hold, in accordance with the weight of authority, that an indorsee of negotiable paper taken as security for a pre-existing debt is a holder for value and in due course of business, and therefore, in the absence of any circumstances charging him with notice, is protected against a claim of payment made to the original payee.

It is to be noted that the petition in this case alleges that the note in question was indorsed by Gilliam to plaintiff. This statement was not denied under oath, and was therefore not put in issue. The record shows that the note, with all indorsements, was offered in evidence as a part of plaintiff's deposition, but the purported copy does not show any indorsement. In the state of the pleadings, this is not material; but, of course, if the note was not actually indorsed by Gilliam, plaintiff was not in fact a bona fide holder.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

All the Justices concur.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Wesley TWYMAN, Admr., etc., of James Twyman, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

Board of Councilmen of FRANKFORT.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A municipal corporation is not liable for the acts of its officers, who, in attempting to guard the public health, remove a smallpox patient to a pesthouse so overcrowded and illly adapted to its purpose that he dies from the consequent exposure.
2. Failure of a municipal corporation to appoint a board of health will not render it liable for injuries to private individuals through the efforts of its other officials to enforce its health ordinances.
3. That a municipal corporation has passed an ordinance directing the removal to a pest house of persons afflicted with smallpox does not render it liable for the negligent acts of its officials in enforcing the provisions of the ordinance.
4. A municipal corporation is not rendered liable for the result of acts undertaken for the preservation of the public health, by a statute providing that in case of death by wrongful act damages may be recovered from the corporation causing it.

in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Ray and B. G. Williams for appellant.

Mr. Ira Julian for appellee.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Wesley Twyman, as administrator of the estate of James Twyman, deceased, sued the appellee, city of Frankfort, in the Franklin circuit court, for $20,000 damages for the death of his intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of its police officers in wrongfully exposing the intestate to inclement weather while he had smallpox, by removing him from a comfortable home to the pesthouse used for smallpox patients, which was badly crowded, poorly ventilated, and wholly unfit for the purpose for which it was used. It was averred, in substance, in the petition, that the appellee, as a city of the third class, is empowered to enact ordinances to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases in its corporate limits, to adopt quarantine laws and enforce the same within 10 miles of its limits, establish hospitals, boards of health, and make all necessary regulations for the protection of the public health; that, in pursuance of the powers enumerated, the appellee has enacted many ordinances for the protection of the public health, and it has established a pesthouse for persons afflicted with contagious diseases, but has never appointed a board of health, for which reason it directed its mayor, other officers, and agents to enforce the ordinances, and to remove any and all persons afflicted with smallpox to its pesthouse, and such officers and agents acted under the authority thus conferred in doing the negligent acts complained of, whereby the intestate lost his life. A demurrer was filed to the petition by appellee, and, the same having been sustained by the lower court, the appellant refused to plead further. The petition was thereupon dismissed, and appellee given judgment for its costs.

The case is now before this court, and the only question presented upon the appeal is, Does the petition state a good cause of action?

If the acts complained of in the petition were done by the appellee in the effort to protect the public health, which is a duty that appertains to the city in its public, and not in its corporate or private, capacity, it would seem that there can be no liability upon its part, even though such duty was negligently performed by those to whom its performance was intrusted. "The power, or even duty, on part of a municipal corporation to make provision for the public health, and for the care of the sick and destitute, appertains to it in its public, and not corporate, or, as it is sometimes called, private, capacity; and, therefore, where a city, under its charter, and the general law of the state, enacted to prevent the spread of contagious diseases, establishes a hospital, it is not responsible to persons injured by reason of the misconduct of its agents and employees therein." Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 977, 989, 981, 982; Richmond v. Long, 17 Gratt. 375, 94 Am. Dec. 461; Sherbourne v. Yuba County, 21 Cal. 113, 81 Am. Dec. 151. Perhaps no better statement of the law on this subject can be made than is found in the following quotation from 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1141, viz.: "While the difficulties surrounding all attempts to state a rule embracing the torts for which a private action will lie against a municipal corporation have been often deplored, yet it is believed that the following formula is both accurate and complete: So far as municipal corporations of any class, and however incorporated, exercise powers conferred on them for purposes essentially public,—purposes pertaining to the administration of general laws, made to enforce the general policy of the state,—they should be deemed agencies of the state, and not subject to be sued for any act or omission occurring while in the exercise of such power, unless by statute the action be given. In reference to such matters, they should stand as does sovereignty whose agency they are, subject to be sued only when the state, by statute, declares they may be. In so far, however, as they exercise powers not of this character, voluntarily assumed,—powers intended for the private advantage and benefit of the locality and its inhabitants,—there seems to be no sufficient reason why they should be relieved from that liability to suit, and measure of actual damage, to which an individual or private corporation exercising the same powers for purposes essentially private, would be liable." We find the same principle announced in Taylor v. Owensboro, 98 Ky. 271, 56 Am. St. Rep. 361, 32 S. W. 948, wherein it is said by this court: "The municipal corporation in all these and the like cases represents the state or the public. The police officers are not the servants of the corporation, and hence the principle of respondeat superior does not apply, and the corporation is not liable unless by virtue of a statute expressly creating the liability." In the same case it is further said: "The [above] principle . . . is sustained by almost an unbroken line of decisions of the courts of this country, and by this court in the cases of Pollock v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 221, 26 Am. Rep. 260; Jolly v. Hawesville, 89 Ky. 279, 12 S. W. 313; Prather v. Lexington, 13 B. Mon. 559, 56 Am. Dec. 585."

We do not regard the cases of Clayton v. Henderson, 103 Ky. 228, 44 L. R. A. 474, 44 S. W. 667; Paducah v. Allen, 111 Ky. 361, 63 S. W. 981, and McGraw v. Marion, 98 Ky. 673, 47 L. R. A. 593, 34 S. W. 18, cited by counsel for appellant, as authorities in point. The two cases first mentioned involved the illegal action of the boards of councilmen of the cities of Henderson and Paducah in improperly locating pesthouses in violation of the statute, thereby creating nuisances, to the injury of the property rights of contiguous residents, and endangering the lives of their families; and towns and cities can always be held liable for nuisances created or maintained by them. And in the case last mentioned, though the city of Marion was held liable in damages for the arrest and prosecution of McGraw for peddling without license, the arrest was made under a void ordinance, which was enacted for municipal revenue, of which the city of Marion was the sole beneficiary. It is well settled that a city may be held liable for an act resulting in injury to another, where the city derives some special benefit from such act. Counsel for appellant relies upon Aaron v. Broiles, 64 Tex. 318, 53 Am. Rep. 764, and Dallas v. Allen (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 324. The former was an action against the board of health, mayor, and marshal of Ft. Worth, and not against the city; and, upon the state of facts presented, it was held that the persons sued were liable. We have been unable to find or examine the case of Dallas v. Allen (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 324; but, conceding that the Texas doctrine is as conceded by counsel for appellant, it has not been accepted in this state, and is, we think, against the weight of authority outside of it.

We are unable to see how the failure of the appellee city to appoint a board of health can affect the question under consideration. A board of health would be but an instrumentality or agency in the hands of the municipal government to be employed in protecting and maintaining the public health. Any other means to the same end that would prove as effective as a board of health might be employed by the city, and still the duties to be performed would be such as grow out of the exercise of powers purely governmental.

It is insisted for the appellant that the appellee city participated in the alleged negligent acts of its officers in the manner of removing the intestate to the pesthouse, because it directed the removal. It is not, however, contended that the city council gave any special direction to remove the intestate to the pesthouse, though it is conceded that it adopted proper ordinances under which to care for the public health. It cannot be denied that it is the duty of the city authorities to enforce these ordinances by removing those who are afflicted with contagious diseases to the place provided for them. We fail to see, therefore, how, in performing these duties, the city can become a participant in the negligent acts of those who simply have in hand the removal to the pesthouse of persons thus afflicted. At most, only the officers or agents guilty of such negligence may be held liable therefor. Taking all that is alleged in the petition to be true,—and it must be so considered for the purposes of the demurrer,—it shows beyond question that the acts complained of were such as appertained or were incidental to appellee's duty to the public, and were done for the protection of the public health. The power exercised was therefore solely for the public good.

Finally, it is insisted for appellant that in any event this action was authorized by § 6, Ky. Stat. 1903, which provides that "whenever the death of a person shall result from an injury inflicted by negligence or wrongful act, then in every such case damages may be recovered for such death from the person or persons, company or companies, corporation or corporations, their agents or servants, causing the same." The statute was enacted to conform to § 241 of our present Constitution, which confers the same right. We cannot believe that the statute and provision of the Constitution supra were intended to give a right of action against a municipal corporation for the death of a person occurring as the result of the act done, as in this case, in the performance of a duty which the municipality owed to the public, and the doing of which was but the exercise of power purely governmental. It seems to us that to hold otherwise would practically do away with municipal authority in the matter of preserving the public health, which would result in consequences disastrous to the public welfare, and ruinous to every city in the state.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

LOUISVILLE & EVANSVILLE MAIL COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

John T. BARNES, Admr., etc., of Clara R.
Barnes, Deceased.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A peremptory instruction to find for defendant cannot be given in an action for wrongful death, where the testimony tends to show that, while deceased was attempting to pass from a barge to a wharf boat, defendant made an unusual, unsafe, and dangerous landing at the wharf boat with its steamer in such a way as to cause the barge to separate from the boat and precipitate deceased into the water.
2. Failure to give proper instructions as to contributory negligence, in an action to recover damages for wrongful death, is not reversible error, where there was no evidence upon which to base any instruction upon the subject.
3. That the death of a person drowned by falling into the water while attempting to disembark from a barge in charge of a steamboat was caused partly by the negligence of the steamer whose passenger he was does not preclude a recovery for the death from another steamboat company whose negligence was also responsible for such death.
4. The receipt from one joint tortfeasor of a sum in part satisfaction of the demand, and his release from further liability, do not operate to release the other from liability for the residue of the damages inflicted.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Daviess County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Taylor, with Messrs. Powers & Anderson, for appellant:

The petition does not state a cause of action against appellant. There is nothing in the petition to show that appellee's intestate was stepping towards, or onto, or standing on, the wharf boat which appellee alleges was struck with great force by appellant: To say that the boat landed at the wharf boat for the purpose of discharging its passengers does not necessarily mean that the passengers were discharged on to, or were stepping towards, the wharf boat.

Appellee's intestate was a trespasser. She was attempting to disembark onto the wharf boat at an unusual, an unsafe, and an unprovided place, and appellant was under no duty to keep a lookout for her, or to anticipate her presence on the forward end of the wharf boat.

The proximate cause of the accident was the failure of the Marsden Company to provide gang planks or stages for its passengers to walk upon from the barges to the wharf boat.

If the promise to pay was accepted by appellee, it was a present satisfaction, and such a promise that the appellee, by suit, could have compelled the Marsden Company to fulfil.

Ellis v. Bitzer, 2 Ohio, 89, 15 Am. Dec. 534.

There can be but one satisfaction for the same injury, and the acceptance of the promise made by the Marsden Company, to pay appellee $1,000, was a present satisfaction, which, when followed by the dismissal of the suit as to the Marsden Company, was a release as to the Marsden Company, and therefore a release as to appellant.

Even if the offer and promise of the Marsden Company to pay $1,000 was not accepted at the time the suit was dismissed as to it, the payment and acceptance of the $1,000, while a motion for a new trial was pending against appellant, was an election by appellee to accept the $1,000 in settlement of the damages to the estate of his intestate, and was a cancellation and satisfaction of the judgment rendered against appellant.

A tort is an entire thing, and indivisible. Where two commit a tort, as is alleged in the petition in this case, by their joint and concurring negligence, one is as liable as the other. The Marsden Company was liable for the tort, and the appellant was liable for the same tort; they might have been sued separately, or sued jointly as they were.

The appellee could not have made a separate estimate of the injury committed by each, and then have obtained judgment accordingly; he must sue jointly for his whole damages or he may sue separately for his whole damages. There can be but one satisfaction. This satisfaction was made, so 64 L. R. A.

far as the Marsden Company was concerned, by the payment of the $1,000. Appellant was not a party to this agreement and compromise; it never agreed that the damages to the estate of appellees intestate were more than $1,000.

The $1,000 having been paid and accepted, and the Marsden Company having been fully released from any and all damages it had brought on appellee's intestate, it could never be made to pay further damages; the dismissal and release as to it were a release of appellee's cause of action.

A plaintiff may maintain separate actions and recover separate judgments against joint trespassers, and may elect to take the largest sum assessed, or to proceed against the solvent defendants; or, where no one of them is able, or can be compelled, to pay the whole of the judgment rendered against him, may accept part satisfaction from one, and still look to the others for such balance as may be necessary to give him full legal compensation for the wrong suffered.

Numm, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal is from a judgment of the Daviess circuit court, rendered at its October term, 1902, against the appellant, Louisville & Evansville Mail Company, and in favor of John T. Barnes, administrator of Clara R. Barnes, deceased. The judgment was for $2,000.

The facts of the case, as they appear of record, are, in substance, as follows: About 11:30 o'clock on the night of the 12th of July, 1901, Clara R. Barnes lost her life by drowning in the Ohio river at Owensboro, Kentucky. The young lady, together with about 400 other persons, embarked early in the night on an excursion boat of the Marsden Company called the "Fawn," with two barges attached, for a pleasure trip up the Ohio river to Rockport, Indiana, and return. On the return, and for the purpose of disembarking its passengers, this steamer landed at Owensboro, Kentucky, at the upper end of appellant's wharf boat, the barges lying "head on" at the forward end of the wharf boat. The proof of appellee showed that the barges were properly and securely fastened to the wharf boat with a rope attaching the Fawn to the bank or shore to keep her from swinging out into the stream. In this situation there was no space between the barges and the wharf boat. The passengers left the barges by stepping down 15 or 16 inches onto the front of the wharf boat. About 50 of the passengers had disembarked, when the deceased, Clara Barnes, in attempting to make this step from the barge to the wharf boat, fell between them, and was drowned. According to appellee's proof, this separation was caused by one of the boats of appellant coming in to the wharf boat "head on," striking the wharf boat at the upper end, thereby forcing the separation at the place and the time she made her step; that this was an improper and negligent landing of the appellant's boat; that those in charge of it saw the situation of the boat and barges of the Marsden Company and the disembarkation of its passengers. On the other hand, appellant claims that it did not make its landing in that manner; that it made a proper, easy, and safe landing, and did not cause the separation of the barges and the wharf boat; that the separation was produced from some other cause; that in fact the deceased fell between the two and lost her life before appellant's boat made its landing, or even touched the wharf boat; that the deceased lost her life by reason of the negligence of the Marsden Company in making an improper landing at the wharf boat, by failure of the Marsden Company to use a stage plank for the use of the passengers to pass from the barge to the boat, or by the contributory negligence of the deceased herself in not using ordinary care for her own safety. Appellee sued both companies, charging joint and concurring negligence, but just before the trial dismissed, without prejudice, his petition against the Marsden Company, and proceeded with the trial against the appellant.

The appellant complains that the court erred in overruling its motion for a peremptory instruction to the jury at the conclusion of the evidence. In this the appellant is mistaken. There was proof introduced by many witnesses that the landing made by the appellant with its boat was a very unusual, unsafe, and dangerous one, and that the force with which it struck the upper end of the wharf boat forced the separation of the boat and barge just at the moment the deceased was making her step from the one to the other, and caused her death.

The appellant complains that the court failed to give a proper instruction on the question of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. There is not anything in the record showing the slightest neglect or want of care on the part of the deceased by which she lost her life, and, if the court had failed to give any instruction on this point, it would not have been prejudicial to appellant, as there was no evidence upon which to base it. Appellant also complains of the following words in the first instruction: "And if they shall further believe that said drowning was caused by the negligence in whole or in part of the defendant Louisville & Evansville Mail Company's officers or servants," etc. In the case of Louisville & C. Packet Co. v. Mulligan (Ky.) 77 S. W. 704, the court, in discussing an instruction with similar words embodied in it, said: "Appellee, being a passenger on the White Dove, and having no control over the boat, may recover of the Cincinnati, although those in charge of the White Dove were more negligent than those in charge of the Cincinnati. For the negligence of a carrier is not imputed to a passenger who is injured by the concurrent negligence of the carrier and another, and he may recover against both. Danville, L. & N. Turnp. Road Co. v. Stewart, 2 Met. (Ky.) 119; Louisville, O. & L. R. Co. v. Case, 9 Bush, 728; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 446, and cases cited. The court, by his instructions, told the jury that both boats were governed by the same rules and regulations. . . . Also that appellant was not liable to appellee unless the plaintiff was injured by reason of the negligence, in whole or in part, of the officers in charge of the Cincinnati." The court in that case approved this instruction.

The most serious question involved in this case grows out of an issue made by an amended answer which was filed during the trial in the lower court, in which it was, in substance, alleged that the appellee had, in consideration of $1,000 paid to him by the Marsden Company, dismissed his action against the Marsden Company, this appellant's joint tortfeasor, and had accepted the $1,000 in satisfaction of his cause of action; that he had no further right to prosecute his action against this appellant. This was traversed by the appellee, and the proof introduced upon this question showed the following state of facts: The president of the Marsden Company, prior to the convening of the court when the trial was had, desired to avoid further litigation of the matter, and authorized the attorneys for the Marsden Company to endeavor to bring about a settlement and compromise of the litigation in so far as it was concerned, and authorized them to pay as much as $1,000, if it took that much, to effect a compromise, and placed this money in a bank subject to the order of its attorneys. These attorneys approached the attorneys for appellee, and made a proposition for a compromise, and eventually offered the $1,000. The attorneys for the appellee refused, stating that, while they believed that the Marsden Company was, possibly, not liable for any negligence,—at least they believed its negligence was not as great as that of appellant company's,—yet they were afraid, if they accepted this compromise settlement, appellee's right to prosecute the action against the appellant, their joint tortfeasor, would be barred. Thus matters stood until six or seven days after verdict and judgment against appellant, when the attorneys for the Marsden Company paid the attorneys for the appellee this money, and they immediately entered a credit upon the judgment against the appellant for this amount of $1,000. We are convinced from all the proof in the case that there was an understanding between the attorneys for the Marsden Company and the appellee's attorneys prior to the trial, that this amount was to be offered and accepted, and the Marsden Company was to be released, and the case dismissed against it, and that the dismissal was in conformity with this understanding. The question to be determined is whether this operated as a release of the appellant, it being a joint tortfeasor.

Our opinion is that, if the appellee had accepted this $1,000 in satisfaction of his cause of action or claim for damages, then it would have operated as a release and a bar to any other proceeding against appellant on account thereof. But it is shown by the proof, without contradiction, that it was accepted as only part satisfaction, and a release of the Marsden Company, but not in satisfaction of his cause of action and claim for damages. It is a universal rule of law that joint tort feors are jointly and severally liable to the injured party. He may sue anyone or all, at his election; but when he once receives satisfaction for the injury done him from one or more of the tort feors, he is barred from proceeding against the other joint tort feors. This is upon the idea that he is only entitled to one satisfaction, and to avoid his getting more than one compensation for his injury. There are authorities in many states which hold that any satisfaction from and a release of one joint tort feor releases all. But on a close investigation of these cases,—or at least the most of them,—it will be found that they were cases where the proof showed that the injured parties had received full satisfaction for their injuries or cause of action. Such are the cases of Dulaney v. Buffum, 173 Mo. 1, 73 S. W. 125; Hubbard v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 173 Mo. 249, 72 S. W. 1073; Brown v. Cambridge, 3 Allen, 474; Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 270; Donaldson v. Carmichael, 102 Ga. 40, 29 S. E. 135; and other cases cited in these opinions. The sole reason given in these opinions for the rule as stated is that it is to prevent the injured party from receiving more than one compensation or satisfaction for his injury. We are unable to understand why a part satisfaction and release of one tort feor can be considered as complete satisfaction of his claim for damages, and operate as a bar to his cause of action against the other tort feors. There can be no good reason for this. The collection of part satisfaction from one tort feor is a benefit to the others. Under the law there is no right of contribution existing between tort feors. The law does not look with favor upon wrongdoers, and they are unlike obligors in an ordinary contract, where the right of contribution is given. The law ought not to be that a release of one tort feor, by his making a partial satisfaction for the wrong done, should operate as a release of the other wrongdoers. The law looks with favor upon compromises and settlements. It is not the intention of the law to force people into litigation and prevent settlements out of court. To uphold the rule contended for by appellant, such a result would follow. If ten persons commit a joint tort, and injure a person to the extent of $1,000, and if nine of them recognize that fact, and are willing to pay $100 each for the purpose of remunerating the injured party and to avoid the expense and annoyance of litigation, and the tenth man refuses to pay his $100, according to appellant the injured party cannot accept the $900 in part satisfaction and sue the stubborn tenth man. He would plead the settlement as a satisfaction and a bar. Such a construction of the law would be unreasonable and unjust. All that such a person should be allowed to take advantage of would be to require that in any judgment that should be rendered against him it should be rendered for one satisfaction of the claim for damages, less any sums that might have been paid by his joint tort feors as a partial satisfaction.

In the case of Ellis v. Eason, 50 Wis. 152, 36 Am. Rep. 830, 6 N. W. 523, the court said: "The contract set up in this case shows that the plaintiff did not receive the $200 from Comstock in satisfaction or as full compensation for the injury he had sustained by the trespass, and that it was not the intention to release the other joint trespassers from liability for the trespass. The plaintiff's agreement not to sue Comstock for the trespass, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case, does not, therefore, discharge the other joint trespassers, except pro tanto. The court below properly rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the damages he had sustained by reason of the trespass, less the sum of $200 received of Comstock. This rule is, we think, supported by the great weight of authority, as will be seen by an examination of the large number of authorities cited. . . . Snow v. Chandler, 10 N. H. 92, 34 Am. Dec. 140; McCrillis v. Hawes, 38 Me. 568; Spencer v. Williams, 2 Vt. 209, 19 Am. Dec. 711; Chamberlin v. Murphy, 41 Vt. 110; Sloan v. Herrick, 49 Vt. 328; Matthews v. Chicopee Mfg. Co. 3 Robt. 712; Bloss v. Plymale, 3 W. Va. 393, 100 Am. Dec. 752; Shaw v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 307; Pond v. Williams, 1 Gray, 630-636; Bank of Catskill v. Messenger, 9 Cow. 37; Line v. Nelson, 38 N. J. L. 358; Irvine v. Milbank, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 378; Solly v. Forbes, 2 Brod. & B. 38, 4 J. B. Moore, 448, 22 Revised Rep. 641; Thompson v. Lack, 3 C. B. 540, 16 L. J. C. P. N. S. 75; Merchants' Bank v. Curtiss, 37 Barb. 319; and Gunther v. Lee, 45 Md. 60, 24 Am. Rep. 504." Again, in the same case, the court said: "Certainly the receipt of a partial satisfaction from one of two joint tort feors is no injury to the other who is afterwards sued for the trespass. On the other hand, it is to his benefit, as he has the advantage of what was paid by his associate in the wrong in reducing the judgment against him. The party injured is under no duty to the joint wrongdoer to proceed at all against his associate, and his refusal to proceed against him is no ground of defense. As it is wholly optional with the injured party to proceed against one or two joint wrongdoers for the whole of his damages, there is no equity in holding that, because he has received a part satisfaction for his injury from the one not proceeded against, upon an agreement not to sue him for the wrong, the other may set up such receipt as a complete defense to the action. He is benefited and not injured, by such proceeding."

The case of Snow v. Chandler, 10 N. H. 92, 34 Am. Dec. 140, was one where Chandler and one George Holt committed an assault and battery upon Snow. Holt, being a minor, applied to one White to procure a settlement with Snow for the injury he had received. Snow accepted $20 as part satisfaction of his cause of action and injury, and agreed to look to Chandler for the balance of his compensation. Snow sued Chandler, and this settlement with Holt was pleaded in bar of the prosecution of the action, claiming that the release of Holt released him. The court said: "The evidence is that at the time of receiving the money from Holt the plaintiff declared that he would not settle with Chandler for $500. The substance of the arrangement betwixt the plaintiff and Holt seems to have been this: That the plaintiff was willing to receive a small portion of the damage from Holt, either for the reason that he conceived him to be less to blame than the defendant, or that he was less able to pay his proportion of the damage; and on condition of receiving this sum the plaintiff engaged to pursue the defendant for the remainder of his claim. It is clear that the sum paid was not received in satisfaction of the damage, but only in part satisfaction; and the fact that it was coupled with the engagement not to sue Holt does not alter the case. It is still but a part satisfaction of the damage, and the plaintiff may sue or omit to sue whom he pleases, by contract or otherwise. The other trespasser has no equitable or legal claim to prevent such an arrangement. He remains liable for the whole damage until satisfaction is made. If the individual receiving the injury sees fit to visit the penalty upon any one guilty individual rather than another, such individual has no right to complain. It is part of the necessary liability that he incurs in committing the trespass, and should serve 64 L. R. A.

to deter him from such wrongful acts. At the same time any partial payment by a cotrespasser avails so far for his benefit. Such was the ruling in this case. To this extent the defendant can avail himself of plaintiff's arrangement with his cotrespasser, but there was nothing in that contract which constitutes a bar to this suit."

The case of Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 17, 18 L. ed. 134, was one in which Murray had recovered judgment on a claim for damages for several thousand dollars, and had received $800 thereon. He then sued the other joint wrongdoers, Lovejoy, etc., and they pleaded the judgment and Murray's acceptance of $800 thereon in bar of his right to prosecute the action against them. The case was appealed to the supreme court of the United States. In an opinion by Justice Miller the court said: "But in all such cases, what has the defendant in such second suit done to discharge himself from the obligation which the law imposes upon him to make compensation? His liability must remain, in morals and on principle, until he does this. The judgment against his cotrespasser does not affect him so as to release him on any equitable consideration. It may be said that neither does the satisfaction by his cotrespasser, or a release to his cotrespasser, do this; and that is true. But when the plaintiff has accepted satisfaction in full for the injury done him, from whatever source it may come, he is so far affected in equity and good conscience that the law will not permit him to recover again for the same damages. But it is not easy to see how he is so affected until he has received full satisfaction, or that which the law must consider as such. We are therefore of opinion that nothing short of satisfaction, or its equivalent, can make good a plea of former judgment in trespass, offered as a bar in an action against another joint trespasser, who was not party to the first judgment."

In the case of Bloss v. Plymale, 3 W. Va. 409, 100 Am. Dec. 752, the court said: "As the cause of action is against all the joint trespassers, the plaintiff may sue all or either of them, at his election; and he is entitled to full satisfaction, but he is entitled to but one satisfaction. So, where there are different findings in the same verdict when all the trespassers are sued, the successful party must choose de melioribus damnis. He cannot claim to collect all. It follows, then, if the damages are satisfied in part by payment or compromise with some of the defendants, the plaintiff may still proceed against those who remain in the record. And in such case it was but right and proper that the jury should deduct in their finding whatever sum the plaintiff had already received on account of the alleged trespasses from any of the joint parties who were afterwards dismissed. This would be the just application of the rule that there cannot be a double remuneration for the same wrong."

We have been unable to find where the precise question before us has been considered or passed upon by this court, but the trend of the cases seems to support the conclusion at which we have arrived. The two cases of Bullock v. Beemiss, 1 A. K. Marsh. 433, and Oalmes v. Ament, 1 A. K. Marsh. 459, in effect decide that in suits on tort, where several are liable, nothing short of a full satisfaction from one will be a bar to further proceedings against the other joint tortfeasors. In the case of the United Society of Shakers v. Underwood, 11 Bush, 272, 21 Am. Rep. 214, this court quoted with approval the quotation above from Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 17, 18 L. ed. 134, and then said: "It thus appears that, while the plaintiff may maintain separate actions and recover separate judgments against joint trespassers, and may elect to take the largest sum assessed, or to proceed against the solvent defendant, or, in case no one of them is able or can be compelled to pay the whole of the judgment rendered against him, may accept part satisfaction from one and still look to the others for such balance as may be necessary to give him full legal compensation for the wrong suffered, yet ordinarily, when he has made his election, he will be concluded by it. The collection of one judgment extinguishes the entire claim for damages." In the case of Sellards v. Zomes, 5 Bush, 91, the court said: "The liability of joint trespassers is several, and any one or all of them may be sued for the entire wrong. Consequently, since our statute of 1836, authorizing several judgments, a dismissal or release of one or more who are sued cannot per se release the others."

In view of the fact that the $1,000 received from the Marsden Company was received only as part satisfaction of appellee's cause of action, and not in full satisfaction thereof, the appellee was not barred from proceeding further against appellant.

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with damages.

Petition for rehearing denied.

The Code provision requiring actions to be brought by the "real party in interest" was intended to change the rule of common-law pleading requiring an action to be brought by the party holding the legal title. It was not intended to give a new cause of action where none existed, but to allow the beneficial owner of the claim sued upon to maintain the action. Its tendency was simplicity, uniformity, and clearness. This result has, in a large measure, been attained in most of the states adopting this provision. At common law the assignee of a chose in action could only sue in the name of his assignor. This is changed by the Code rule. In some of the states there is a separate provision authorizing the assignee to sue in his own name. When the new form of pleading in regard to the real party in interest came to be applied, it was found that there was already an exception ingrafted on the common-law rule, in that the holder and indorsee of commercial paper was recognized by the law merchant as the legal holder, although he was not the holder of the legal title. So before any Code provision it was already recognized in the courts that the indorsee of commercial paper could maintain an action thereon. Then, when actions were brought under the Code, the question arose whether or not this rule as to commercial paper was altered by the Code, and it was insisted that the holder of commercial paper could not sue if he was not entitled to the proceeds, and that the action must be brought by the beneficiary. Some cases held that either party could sue, and that the Code did not intend to change the rule at commercial law. On this there is quite a conflict. The early New York cases held that the equitable owner only could sue, but afterwards held that either could sue. This is now the weight of authority, and it has been applied in cases of assignments of choses in action without noting the distinction between that class of cases and negotiable instruments. But only 64 L. R. A.

Hutchison v. Myers, 52 Kan. 290, 34 Pac. 742.

There must be some beneficial interest in the subject of action to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

Williams v. Norton, 3 Kan. 295.

Mr. Chris Ritter for defendant in error.

Greene, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, C. E. Price, commenced this action before a justice of the peace in Allen county against D. W. Stewart, doing business under the firm name of the People's Telephone Company, to recover on two causes of action. The first was on an a small proportion of the cases relating to insurance, carriers, principal and agent, and actions by a person for whose benefit a promise is made, refer to the Code provision, as in the bulk of these cases the question as to who may maintain the action is confounded with the question as to whether plaintiff has a cause of action, although the fact that a cause of action exists necessarily implies that there is a particular person in whom the right to sue also rests. These cases generally apply the common-law rules with their many and varied exceptions, to which reference should be had by the pleader, as this note is not intended to include cases which do not discuss the Code provision. In some of the cases the reason for allowing the assignee, and also the equitable owner, to maintain the action is that the latter can maintain the action as the "real party in interest" and the former under a statutory exception providing for actions by a "trustee of an express trust;" but this distinction is not noticed in many cases. This note is not intended to include the cases arising under the statutory exceptions. The recent negotiable-instrument law allows an action on commercial paper by the holder thereof.

There is some conflict of authority as to whether the holders of negotiable instruments could sue thereon in their own name, in the absence of such provision as is found in the negotiable instrument law. In Rock County Nat. Bank v. Hollister, 21 Minn. 385, where the indorsement was to the "Rock County National Bank, Janesville, Wisconsin, for collection, Goodsell Bros.," it was held, under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 66, § 26, providing that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, that such holder was not vested with such a title as to make him a proper party plaintiff in an action on this note.

I. Transfers to be paid for if collected.

In STEWART v. PRICE it was held that one holding by written assignment a verified, itemized account is not the real party in interest, and cannot maintain an action thereon in his own name, where it is shown that by a contemporaneous oral agreement he has agreed to pay the full amount thereof, when collected, to his assignor; and this was held notwithstanding the assignor testified that the defendant in the action did not owe her anything, and that the account due from Stewart to himself. The second was on an account due from Stewart to Mrs. A. Thompson. The latter account was itemized, verified, and assigned in writing to Price. The assignment was regular and admitted. To this second cause of action the plaintiff in error answered that Price was not the owner of the account, and therefore not the real party in interest. There was no defense to the account; nor was there any claim that it had been assigned for the purpose of acquiring or giving the court jurisdiction over the defendant, when otherwise it could not have acquired such jurisdiction. The Thompson account was assigned to Price that he might join it with his own in an action he contemplated bringing against Stewart, and when collected he was to pay Mrs. Thompson the entire proceeds thereof. Mrs. Thompson testified that all money due on said account belonged to her; that Stewart did not owe her anything; that it was due from Price. The plaintiff in error demurred to the evidence as to the second cause of action on the ground that it showed the plaintiff was not the owner of the account, and therefore not the real party in interest. The demurrer was overruled, and judgment rendered in favor of Price on both causes of action.

The only question presented for our consideration is whether Price could maintain this action in his own name on the second whole amount was due her from the plaintiff, and that he was to pay her provided he recovered in the action. In this case three of the judges dissented, and Greene, J., in his dissenting opinion has followed the rule of law laid down by the weight of authority. This case in effect overrules Krapp v. Eldridge, 33 Kan. 106, 5 Pac. 372, "in so far as it expresses a doctrine contrary hereto," which case held that where an account was transferred in writing it was immaterial to the debtor whether the assignor had given or sold it to his assignee, and after such transfer the assignee was the only person entitled to maintain an action thereon. This case also overruled Linney v. Thompson, 3 Kan. App. 718, 45 Pac. 456, which held that the indorsee and holder of a note was the real party in interest, and it was immaterial what were the equities between the indorsee and his indorser as to the proceeds. All that the case of Millis v. Murry, 1 Neb. 327, cited in the prevailing opinion, holds, is that the assignee of a chose in action is the party in interest. There are cases in Nebraska, infra, showing that the law is not settled on the question of assignments for creditors. In the case of Swift v. Ellsworth, 10 Ind. 205, 71 Am. Dec. 316, the answer set up that the assignment to the plaintiff was to secure $250 which the assignor owed plaintiff; that the defendant paid the plaintiff that sum, and that the balance of that note belonged to the assignor. This was held to be a good answer. It is true that the weight of authority in Indiana now is as held in the STEWART CASE. But the case of Eaton v. Alger, 57 Barb. 179, relied upon in the prevailing opinion in the STEWART CASE, has been overruled in 47 N. Y. 345.

It appears that it is generally held to be no defense in an action on commercial paper to show that the plaintiff holds it without consideration, or subject to equities between him and his assignor, or colorable. It is sufficient to make the plaintiff the real party in interest if he has the legal title either by transfer or delivery; but to be entitled to sue he must have the right of possession, and be ordinarily the legal owner. Such ownership may be as equitable trustee. It may be acquired without adequate consideration, but must be sufficient to protect the defendant, upon a recovery against him, from a subsequent action by the assignor.

Indorsers of a corporation note paid the same after protest, and it was delivered to them, and they assigned the same to the plaintiff, who was authorized to collect the same against the maker of the note "(but not against us, indorsers thereof) for his sole use and benefit." In an action by the assignee against other stockholders it was held that the plaintiff was the real party in interest. Herman v. Hecht, 116 Cal. 553, 48 Pac. 611. In this case a note of $40,000 was assigned for the consideration of $500. The assignors testified that they "had no legal or absolute right to get anything [of the collection], but would be disappointed if they did not; or that they hoped to get something out of it, but that there was no understanding that they were to get anything." The court said: "The writing imports a consideration sufficient to sustain the assignment, and, as the defendants do not show that they have some equity or defense against plaintiff's assignors which they do not have against the plaintiff, or show that a judgment against them in favor of the plaintiff would not protect them, they are not concerned with what the plaintiff may do with the fruits of such judgment."

And an assignee of an open account was held to be the real party in interest. Gomer v. Stockdale, 5 Colo. App. 489, 39 Pac. 355. In this case there was annexed to the transfer the condition that when the sum was collected the whole or some part of it was to be paid to the assignor.

So, where a note was delivered to plaintiff upon his agreement to collect the same at his own expense, and to pay the indorser a certain amount on collection, it was held that the plaintiff was the real party in interest. Eaton v. Alger, 47 N. Y. 345, Overruling 57 Barb. 179. In this case the court said: "The note is transferred and delivered to the plaintiff under that contract; and in fulfillment of that contract he proceeds to its collection. The plaintiff is thus made the party in interest within the meaning of the Code, so as to enable him to maintain this action." The case, as reported in Barbour, is relied upon in the case of STEWART V. PRICE. In Eaton v. Alger, 57 Barb. 179, the court reversed the trial court, and granted a new trial because of the refusal to allow proof that the payee of the note delivered it to the plaintiff upon his undertaking to collect it at his own expense, and to pay the payee upon its collection the original amount of the note prior to its renewal. There was no appeal from this case to the court of appeals, as is erroneously stated in the citation tables, and in the footnote in cause of action. Can the assignee of a verified itemized account, assigned in writing, where the assignment is regular and admitted, maintain an action thereon in his own name, when by a previous arrangement he had agreed to pay the proceeds collected to his assignor? Section 26 of the Civil Code (Gen. Stat. 901, § 4454) provides: "Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest except as otherwise provided in § 28." It is not contended by either party that the case falls within any of the exceptions. It must therefore be considered solely with reference to the meaning of § 26. In examining this provision it will be observed that it does not say that it is the person in whose name the right of action stands, or the person who holds the legal title thereof, that may prosecute the action, but that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest." If Price failed to recover from Stewart, he would not be liable to Mrs. Thompson. The loss would be wholly that of Mrs. Thompson. Is the real party in interest the person who is to be benefited or injured, or the person who holds the legal title to the thing in action? This section is plain and unambiguous, and seems incapable of misunderstanding. By its terms it excludes the idea that any person other than the one benefited or injured by the result of the litigation can be intended. To hold otherwise would appear to be doing violence to language. This question was before the supreme court of Indiana, as early

Eaton v. Alger, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 5. But after the third trial the case went up to the court of appeals (47 N. Y. 345), which held that this evidence established the fact that the plaintiff was the real party in interest.

An assignment of a claim for tort provided that the assignee was to retain $50 for his advances, and all moneys used in the prosecution of the claim, and next to pay the attorneys' fees, and the balance to be paid to the assignor. It was held that the assignee was the real party in interest. Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 513, 17 N. W. 31, 21 N. W. 9. In this case, on a motion to require the assignor to be made a party, he filed a paper disclaiming any interest in the prosecution, and stating that he had assigned the claim to the plaintiff.

This case followed and approved Knadler v. Sharp, 38 Iowa, 232, where an amount due on a breach of covenant of warranty was assigned, and the assignee paid nothing for the assignment, but agreed to pay the assignor the amount collected, less costs and expenses. It was held that the assignee was the real party in interest. The court said: "It is also provided by Revision, § 2757: 'Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as provided in the next section.' This language was first construed as found in the Code of 1851, § 1676, to mean the party having the legal title or interest. Farwell v. Tyler, 5 Iowa, 535. But, afterward, it was held to mean the party having the beneficial interest, as contradistinguished from the mere holder of the legal title. Conyngham v. Smith, 18 Iowa, 471. And subsequently it was held that the party holding the legal title of a note or instrument may sue on it though he be an agent or trustee, and liable to account to another for the proceeds of the recovery; but he is open in such cases to any defense which exists against the party beneficially interested; or the party beneficially interested, though he may not have the legal title, may sue in his own name. Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 481. The same doctrine was again affirmed in Rice v. Savery, 22 Iowa, 470. It follows, therefore, that the court did not err in holding that the plaintiff might recover upon all the claims as the proper party to the action."

So the plaintiff, as assignee of a note and account sued upon, was held to be the real party in interest, even though the consideration of the assignment was to be a payment to be made after recovery in a suit by the assignee. Bassett v. Inman, 7 Colo. 270, 3 Pac. 383.

So, where a note was indorsed, and the consideration was not to be paid until the note should be collected, it was held that the indorsee was the real party in interest. Cummings v. Morris, 25 N. Y. 625. In this case the court said: "The consideration was ample, and it does not affect the transaction that it was not to be paid until the notes should be collected; and it may be its payment was conditional, depending upon that contingency."

But where the holder of a note payable to the payee or bearer, not wishing to sue the maker, delivered the same to another party, taking from the latter his note for the amount, on the understanding that, if he should not succeed in collecting the note transferred, he was not to pay the consideration, it was held that the holder of the note so transferred could not maintain an action against the maker, and that he was not the real party in interest. Killmore v. Culver, 24 Barb. 656. In this case the court said: "Is, then, this plaintiff the real party in interest? It seems to me from the evidence given by himself and Tanner, from which I have made the preceding statement, that he is not. He is not at all interested in the event of the suit, for, should he recover, the money must go to Tanner, and should he fail the loss would not be his, but would fall upon Tanner. The engagement of Tanner is not by way of guaranty that the plaintiff should recover the amount of the note; because then the recovery, if had, would be for the plaintiff's benefit, but the money was to be recovered or lost simply for, or by, Tanner. The evidence shows that the note was delivered to the plaintiff, and the suit was instituted by him, because, as Tanner declared to his counsel, he did not want to sue the note in his own name."

And where a set-off was pleaded by an assignee it was held that he was not the real party in interest where the assignment was colorable only, and the assignor was to refund the consideration in case the claim could not be collected by set-off. Claflin v. Dawson, 58 Ind. 408. The court said: "Under the evidence of Perry, the appellant could not have maintained an independent action on the account assigned to him. Perry was, and the appellant was not, 'the real party in interest' in said account. It would be a strange perversion, as as 1858, in the case of Swift v. Ellsworth, 10 Ind. 205, 71 Am. Dec. 316, where it was ruled that the assignee of a promissory note, who was not entitled to the proceeds when collected, was not the real party in interest, and could not maintain an action thereon. Again, the same court, in Bostwick v. Bryant, 113 Ind. 448, 459, 16 N. E. 378, 383, where the answer pleaded that the note sued on was transferred and assigned to plaintiff by Anna S. Bloomer, the owner, without consideration, and solely for the purpose of suing on and collecting the same for the use and benefit of the real owner, said: "The answer shows clearly that Anna S. Bloomer is the owner of the note, and the real party in interest. The plain provisions of the statute cannot be avoided. The plea must be held good." Without exception, this is the settled rule of interpretation of this provision of our Code in Indiana. The same rule has been followed in Nebraska in the case of Mills v. Murry, 1 Neb. 327, and reaffirmed in the case of Hoagland v. Van Eiten, 22 Neb. 681, 684, 35 N. W. 869, 870, in which case the chief justice said: "If a party having no interest in the subject-matter of the suit, who holds simply as assignee, and is to deliver to his assignor the proceeds of the action, may maintain an action on such an assignment, then § 29 has no meaning whatever. We do not care to enter into a discussion of the propriety or impropriety of requiring actions to be brought in the name of the real party in interest. The statute contains a plain pro-it seems to us, of the equitable grounds in which the law of set-off had its origin, to give judicial sanction to the appellant's claim in this case to set off the Perry account against the appellee's cause of action. The appellant never 'held' the account assigned to him by Perry as the actual and unqualified owner thereof."

Where two cotenants had conveyed their interest in land by separate deeds, and subsequently one of them conveyed the same land to his cotenant for the purpose of bringing an action to set aside the first two deeds, it was held that the latter was not the proper party in interest, as the contract was against public policy, where the last deed provided for a reconveyance in case of recovery, and payment of damages recovered. Gruber v. Baker, 20 Nev. 453, 9 L. R. A. 802, 23 Pac. 858.

In Nebraska it seems there is a conflict of authority. In the early case of McWilliams v. Bridges, 7 Neb. 419, where a note was made payable to bearer, and the defense was that it was transferred to plaintiff merely to bring suit thereon for the benefit of another party, and it was claimed that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, it was held that this was no defense to the note. The court said: "Holding, as we do, that these improvements, either alone, or together with the abandonment of the land to McWilliams, were a good and valid consideration for the promissory note, there only remains for consideration the single question of the right of the defendant in error to bring action upon it, on which some reliance seems to be placed by counsel as ground for reversal. But on this point we see no difficulty. That Bridges was the lawful bearer of the note from the payee named therein was not denied by the answer; it was merely alleged 'that he gave to said Bishop no value or consideration whatever for the assigning and delivery of said note to him, . . . and that he took the assignment and delivery for the express purpose of bringing suit upon the same in his own name, with the understanding and agreement . . . that, if he recovers upon said note, and collects the same, then in that case he is to pay something to said Bishop for said note; but if he does not recover, then he is to pay nothing to said Bishop for the same.' Had the principal defense, the want of a valid consideration for the note, been sustained, these facts would have become important as showing that Bridges was not entitled to the protection which the law affords to an innocent holder for value of negotiable paper. But, that defense failing, they become wholly immaterial, for the reason that, under the facts of this case, the consideration for which Bishop saw fit to dispose of his interest in the note was a matter in which the makers could have no possible interest, and entirely within his own discretion." This case does not appear ever to have been cited, except in Lincoln Nat. Bank v. Virgin, 36 Neb. 735, 38 Am. St. Rep. 747, 55 N. W. 218, to the effect that, there being no defense against the alleged real party in interest, it followed that the question of the good faith of the assignment to the plaintiff was not material.

II. Transfers for collection and suit.

In Colorado, North Dakota, Iowa, Missouri, Nevada, Ohio, Utah, and Washington, it seems that an agent or assignee for collection, holding the legal title to the claim sued upon, will be regarded as the real party in interest. This also seems to be the weight of authority in New York. In Indiana and Nebraska there seems to be some conflict with the weight of authority against the right of a collecting agent to sue. In Minnesota if the collecting agent holds the legal title it seems that he may maintain an action thereon. The effect of some of the decisions is that the legal-title holder may sue, and so may the beneficial holder,—the latter suing as the real party in interest, and the party holding the legal title suing as the trustee of an express trust, where the exception in the statute so provides. This appears to be the correct solution.

Where the payee of a draft sent it to the drawee, who had agreed that when he should receive the money he would remit the amount as directed, and the money was paid to him, and he was directed by the payee to transmit it to another bank, but he died before remitting the same, it was held that the payee was the party in interest to maintain an action for the amount collected, against the party who had taken charge of the assets of the drawee. Firat Nat. Bank v. Hummel, 14 Colo. 259, 8 L. R. A. 788, 20 Am. St. Rep. 257, 23 Pac. 986. In this case the drawer refused to sue.

And, where a business firm indorsed and deposited notes in a bank of another state for collection, which bank transferred the same to vision, which this court has no authority to disregard. We hold, therefore, that an assignee having no interest in the result of the suit, and not entitled to any portion of the proceeds thereof, is not entitled, under § 29, to maintain an action as the real party in interest." This same case was again before the court on a motion for a rehearing, and upon reargument the court adhered to its former decision. 23 Neb. 462, 36 N. W. 755. Perhaps the fullest and most able presentation of this question, while not the law of that state, is found in Eaton v. Alger, 57 Barb. 179, 189. Defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not the owner of the note, and not the real party in interest. The court said: "It would therefore seem very clear that a defendant, on such an issue made by the pleadings, would have the right to show that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, particularly if he had pleaded a defense in the action good as against such pretended real party. The plaintiffs, however, insist that, notwithstanding this provision of the Code [§ 111], the indorsee of a note, or the holder of a note payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, may maintain an action upon it, although not in fact the owner, nor, as between himself and the owner, entitled to the proceeds when collected. That such was the rule before the Code is conceded, and the argument is that it was abolished by the Code; that the codifiers and legislature so intended. In their report to the legislature the codifiers said: 'The rules respecting a bank in Dakota, and the latter was so negligent in the collection as to cause a loss of the same, and the liability was fixed on the agent, by the North Dakota statutes, for negligence,—it was held that the indorsee for collection could maintain an action against its subagent in its own name. Commercial Bank v. Red River Valley Nat. Bank, 8 N. D. 382, 79 N. W. 859.

The right to maintain the action was also controlled by N. D. Rev. Code, § 4133, providing that a mere agent of an agent has no responsibility, as such, to the principal of the latter. The case shows that the payee and owner "indorsed the notes in blank, and delivered them to the plaintiff for collection only," and the chief question was whether such a holder could maintain this action.

And an assignment of a judgment merely for the purpose of enabling the assignee to enforce its collection was held to constitute him the real party in interest. Searing v. Berry, 58 Iowa, 20, 11 N. W. 708.

So, a party holding a note indorsed to him for collection was held to be the proper party, and might maintain an action thereon. Abell Note Brokerage & Bond Co. v. Hurd, 85 Iowa, 559, 52 N. W. 488.

The court cited Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 485, holding that a party, having the legal title to a judgment, may sue on it, though another may be the beneficial owner.

And an assignee of a note for collection was held to be the party in interest, under Mo. act regulating "Practice in Courts of Justice," art. 3, § 1, providing that every civil action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and § 2, providing that a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue in his own name, and § 3, providing that, in case of an assignment of a thing in action, the action by the assignee shall be without prejudice to an off-set, and the bonds and notes act (Rev. Code 1845, p. 190), providing that all bonds and notes for money or property shall be assignable by indorsement on such bonds or notes, and the assignee may maintain an action thereon in his own name. Webb v. Morgan, 14 Mo. 428. In this case the court said: "Whenever the evidence shows the indorsement in assignment of the note or bill of exchange or bond to the plaintiff, that assignment makes such plaintiff the party in legal interest, and authorizes the action in his name."

And where demands against a railroad company were assigned in order that suit might be brought thereon, and the assignee was to receive 25 per cent of the amount collected for his services, it was held that the assignee could sue in his own name on these accounts. Peters v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 24 Mo. 586.

In Young v. Hudson, 99 Mo. 102, 12 S. W. 632, it was contended that the assignee of notes and an account, holding the same for the purpose of collection, was not the real party in interest; but it was held that an indorsement by the plaintiff as cashier of the bank (payee), and, in its name, to himself, individually, authorized him to maintain an action in his own name. The court said: "He certainly has ample power to indorse such paper for collection, and a holder for collection has sufficient title to maintain an action."

In Buddington v. Mastbrook, 17 Mo. App. 577, the court said: "Now, a person who holds a chattel belonging to another, upon an agreement made with that other to keep it, or to do something with it or to it for that other, is undoubtedly the trustee of an express trust within the meaning of this section. It is upon this ground that our supreme court has placed the right of one who holds a promissory note belonging to another for collection merely, to maintain an action thereon in his own name (Beattie v. Lett, 28 Mo. 596), though an earlier decision of the same court placed it upon the ground that he was 'the real party in interest' within the meaning of the preceding section;" citing Webb v. Morgan, 14 Mo. 428.

And where certain lands were granted to a party for the purpose of instituting an action to determine water rights, and the grantee made an oral agreement that, after the termination of the suit, he would reconvey, it was held that he was a proper party to maintain the action, under Nev. Comp. Laws, § 1067, requiring every action to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. Smith v. Logan, 18 Nev. 149, 1 Pac. 678. In this case it was held, under Nev. Comp. Laws, § 283, concerning conveyances, requiring a trust to be established by writing, that the plaintiff had the legal title.

A bank held a note, and assigned in writing, without consideration, to the cashier, all its right, title, and interest in the same. It parties in the courts of law differ from those in the courts of equity. The blending of the jurisdiction makes it necessary to revise those rules to some extent. In doing so, we have had a threefold purpose in view: (1) To do away with the artificial distinctions existing in the courts of law, and to require the real party in interest to appear in court as such; (2) to require the presence of such parties as are necessary to make an end to the controversy; and (3) to allow otherwise great latitude in respect to the number of parties who may be brought in. . . . The true rule undoubtedly is that which prevails in the courts of equity,—that he who has the right is the person to pursue the remedy. We have adopted that rule.' This section (now 111) was adopted by the legislature precisely as submitted by the codifiers, showing that they approved the reasons given by the codifiers for its adoption. It is therefore quite immaterial what was the rule previous to the Code, if thereby the legislature intended to and did change the rule by express enactment. That they did so we think clear, from the language of the statute and the reasons for its adoption. In their reasoning the codifiers alluded to the existing rules and the necessity for a revision; one purpose of the proposed change being to require the real person in interest to appear in court as such, followed by an act providing that 'every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.' This reasoning and this enactment seem too plain for misconception. The was held that he was the real party in interest. White v. Stanley, 29 Ohio St. 423. In this case the court said: "Here the payees, who were the absolute owners of the note, transferred to the plaintiff, by the indorsement and delivery, all their title and interest, legal and equitable. So that the property in the note was absolute in the indorsee, notwithstanding he might, in equity, be accountable to the bank for its proceeds when collected."

And where an assignment was made solely for the purpose of bringing an action for negligently killing stock, and by such assignment it was agreed that the assignee would turn over to the assignor all that was recovered in the action, after deducting his proportion of the expenses of the suit, it was held that the assignee was the real party in interest. Wines v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 9 Utah, 228, 33 Pac. 1042.

It was also held to be immaterial whether or not any consideration was actually paid for the assignment, or whether or not the assignment was merely for the purpose of the suit, if it was in fact so made. Ibid.

The assignee of notes transferred to him for the purpose of suit was held to be the real party in interest, and could maintain an action thereon. In McDaniel v. Pressler, 3 Wash. 636, 29 Pac. 209. In this case the court said that "an assignment for the purpose of collection is an assignment for a valuable consideration."

In Crouch v. Wagner, 63 App. Div. 526, 71 N. Y. Supp. 607, a collecting agent induced his client to satisfy a judgment by taking notes for a less amount, and induced the creditor to give new notes to him for the face of the debt, which notes he indorsed, and the indorsee brought suit. The court held that there was no fraud on the debtor, and that the plaintiff could recover in his own right; and further held that, if the notes belonged to the creditor, the plaintiff could recover as trustee of an express trust. It was further held that the agent had a personal interest in the notes as they included his costs and commissions; and that he had transferred his interest to the plaintiff.

Where several parties had claims against an agent for conversion of claims intrusted to him, and they made an assignment of their claims to the plaintiff, of which assignment nothing was paid, and one of the assignors agreed with the plaintiff to take care of the case, and, if plaintiff got beat, it would not trouble or cost him anything, it was held that the plaintiff was the real party in interest. Allen v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 228. In this case the court said: "In a case like the present, the whole title passes to the assignee, and he is legally the real party in interest, although others may have a claim upon him for a portion of the proceeds. The specific claim, and all of it, belongs to him. Even if he be liable to another as a debtor upon his contract for the collection he may thus make, it does not alter the case. The title to the specific claim is his."

An action was brought by an assignee of a claim. It was held that the plaintiff, under an absolute assignment in writing to him, was the legal holder of the claim and the real party in interest, although two of the assignors testified that they expected to receive the amount recovered in the action. Meeker v. Claghorn, 44 N. Y. 349.

And where an action was brought for work and labor, and, pending the action, the claim was assigned in writing, and the assignee was substituted as plaintiff, it was held that the assignee was the real party in interest whether the transfer was bona fide or not. Sheridan v. New York, 68 N. Y. 30. In this case the court said: "A plaintiff is the real party in interest under the Code, if he has a valid transfer as against the assignor, and holds the legal title to the demand. The defendant has no legal interest to inquire further. A payment to, or recovery by, an assignee occupying this position, is a protection to the defendant against any claim that can be made by the assignor. In this case, from the undisputed facts, the defendant would be protected if it paid to the assignee, or if a recovery was had against it by him. No question was made, and none submitted to the jury, as to the execution or delivery of the assignment; and, conceding that the circumstances were such as to justify the jury in finding that it was colorable as between the parties, yet that would constitute no defense on the ground that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest."

A bank was the owner of a judgment, and assigned it to the cashier of the bank as a more convenient way to get the relief desired, and the cashier brought a suit on the judgment. It was held that he was the party in interest. Brown v. Powers, 53 App. Div. 251, 65 N. Y. Supp. 783. In this case the court said: "The act is emphatic. It uses the Saxon word 'must' (a verb which has not yet been twisted by judicial construction, like the words 'may' and 'shall,' into meaning something else) to place beyond doubt or cavil what it intended."

We heartily coincide with the reasoning and in the conclusion reached in the foregoing cases. We believe this is the true meaning of this section, as applied to actions on assigned accounts, and that the language is so obviously plain as to admit of no other interpretation or construction. Therefore the decision of Krapp v. Eldridge, 33 Kan. 106, 5 Pac. 372, in so far as it expresses a doctrine contrary hereto, is overruled.

This cause is reversed and remanded, with judgment which the bank held had, by an assignment in writing, been duly assigned to the plaintiff, and at the commencement of the action and at the time of the trial he had a valid transfer of it, and as such had the legal right to maintain the action upon it. He was the legal owner of it, and, therefore, was the real party in interest within the meaning of § 449 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A payment to, or recovery by, him of the judgment would protect the defendant against any claim which might be made against him by the bank or any other person by reason of the judgment. What the consideration may have been as between the plaintiff and the bank, as the cause or basis of the assignment, did not concern the defendant. The bank had the right, so far as the defendant was concerned, to give the judgment to the plaintiff,—to sell it to him for any consideration that it saw fit,—or to place him in a position where he could collect it for the bank. All that affected the defendant—and this was the extent of his right of inquiry—was that the legal title to the judgment was in the plaintiff, so that a payment to, or satisfaction by, him would be a full and complete satisfaction as to all others who theretofore had, or might thereafter claim, an interest in it."

In an action brought by an assignee on an account for work and labor, it was held that evidence showing there was no consideration for the assignment, offered for the purpose of proving that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, was properly excluded. Burnett v. Gwynne, 2 Abb. Pr. 79. The court said: "We think that where the object is to prove that the alleged assignment to the plaintiff is a mere sham, and that, although an assignment in form has been executed, it was executed under an arrangement that recovery should be for the benefit of the alleged assignor, and that the form of an assignment was gone through with for the mere purpose of securing a recovery by means of the assignor's own testimony, while he was to receive and enjoy the fruits of the recovery, then proof that there was no consideration for the assignment may, in connection with other evidence tending to those conclusions, be competent; but the mere fact that there was no consideration does not, alone, amount to anything."

And where a note was indorsed specially and for the purpose of collecting and remitting the proceeds to the payee, it was held that the in-instructions to sustain the demurrer to the evidence of the plaintiff in proof of the second cause of action.

Smith and Ellis, JJ., concur.

Pollock, J., concurring:

In concurring with the majority in this case, I do so, not because of the belief that the decision is supported by the larger number of adjudicated cases, but for the reason that I believe it to be so commanded by the lawmaking power of the state, and in such clear and unmistakable language as to leave no escape therefrom, and to render the result reached inevitable. Other courts of high standing and authority, by the same process of reasoning employed by my dis-dorse was the real party in interest, and could maintain an action on the same. Freeman v. Falconer, 12 Jones & S. 182. The court said: "He is, in such case, the real party in interest, under the Code, and can maintain the action, even though, as between the parties thereto, it appears that the transfer is merely colorable."

In Hays v. Hathorn, 74 N. Y. 486, where the answer denied that the note in suit was ever transferred to plaintiff, or that he was the legal owner or holder, and denied that he was the real party in interest, and alleged that the Saratoga County Bank was the real party in interest and the owner and holder of the note, and that the note was duly transferred to it instead of to the plaintiff, the court of appeals held that evidence to sustain the answer should have been allowed, and further said: "It is ordinarily no defense to the party sued upon commercial paper to show that the transfer under which the plaintiff holds it is without consideration, or subject to equities between him and his assignor, or colorable, and merely for the purpose of collection, or to secure a debt contracted by an agent without sufficient authority."

Some of the early New York cases went much further, and held that the holder for collection could not sue, although he held the legal title; but this does not seem to be the rule now in this state. In Lewando v. Dunham, 1 Hill 114, it was held that where an assignment was made of a claim for lost baggage, and the assignee was to have one half of the judgment, the assignee was not the real party in interest, and could not prosecute an action in his name.

And where an agent held commercial paper for collection only, it was held that he was not the real party in interest, and could not maintain an action thereon in his own name. Iselin v. Rowlands, 30 Hun, 488.

A foreign corporation sent a bill of exchange to its agents to institute a suit, and the agents brought an action in their own name thereon. It was held that they were not the real parties in interest. Bell v. Tilden, 16 Hun, 346. In this case the court said: "To enable an agent to maintain an action in his own name there must be something more than the mere powers of a naked agent. It was clearly shown in this case that the plaintiffs had nothing but such powers. To sustain the ruling in this case would be to hold that all foreign corporations senting associates, have announced a different conclusion. The question, however, remains, Are such decisions correct in principle and sound in reason? For thousands of years had the courts of last resort been called upon to determine the form of the earth, it would have been solemnly decreed to be flat. The earth would have continued to be physically round, judicially flat. To my mind, the error arises in such decisions by reason of an attempt to construe a plain, positive provision of the Code, in its very nature, and by its express terms incapable of other construction than what it clearly says and plainly means, into the opposite of what it says and means. If I am correct in this view, one decision or a dozen decisions only result in what Jeremy Bentham was pleased to call "judge-made law." I agree perfectly with my dissenting associates that before the adoption of the Code an action at law could not be maintained upon an assigned account in the name of the assignee; that an indorsed promissory note could be declared upon in the name of the indorsee; that a suit in equity looking to substance, and not to form, was brought and prosecuted in the name of the assignee of a chose in action; and that while the rules of equity practice required all persons in interest to be made parties to the suit, that the decree rendered might be a final and complete determination of the interest of all parties in the subject-matter, the assignor of a chose in action, having parted with his title and interest, was not a neces-may maintain actions in this state in the name of mere naked agents, and thus evade the provisions of our statute requiring bonds for costs to be given by such foreign corporations; and, indeed, it would allow all actions upon negotiable contracts to be brought in the name of simple collecting agents."

And where a note was indorsed in blank for the accommodation of the maker, and was not to be used except in a contingency which never happened, it was held that the indorsees, having knowledge of this, could not maintain an action thereon. Prall v. Hinchman, 6 Duer, 351. In this case the court said: "The act of Young, Bonnell, and Sutphen, in placing the note in the hands of an attorney, to be sued in his name, when he had no title to the note, and had parted with no value therefor, and when they had no right of action thereon, did not prima facie, at least, make him the real party in interest."

In Alabama there seems to be some conflict of authority, the Federal court holding that the holder of a coupon of a bond transferable by delivery may maintain an action thereon, although the transfer was solely for the purpose of suit, while the state court holds that the payee of a note, who is only an agent for collection, cannot maintain an action thereon.

The holder of coupons, delivered to him for the purpose of enabling him to bring suit upon them, may maintain an action thereon. Kent v. Dana, 40 C. C. A. 281, 100 Fed. 56. The court said: "Doubtless it was competent for the defendant to show that the savings bank had the beneficial interest in the subject of the suit in order to let in any defense which it might have as against the bank; but it had no further interest in the matter."

But in Moses v. Ingram, 99 Ala. 483, 12 So. 374, it was held that the payee of non-negotiable rent notes, who was to collect and hold the same for the purchaser of the premises, and who brought suit on them as owner, had no such interest in the same as would entitle him to maintain an action thereon. The court said: "Not being the real owner, and the notes being, as the record shows, non-commercial, in their character, Ingram cannot maintain the action. It should have been brought in the name of Mrs. Cooper, the real owner."

In Indiana it is held to be a good defense to allege and show that the plaintiff is not the owner, and that he is attempting to collect the same for the use and benefit of his assignor. 64 L. R. A.

In an action on a note the answer was held to present a good defense where it avers that the note was transferred and assigned to the plaintiff herein, without consideration, and solely for the purpose of suing and collecting the same "for the benefit and use of said Anna S. Blommer, who is the real owner thereof." Bostwick v. Bryant, 113 Ind. 448, 16 N. E. 378.

In Gillisle v. Ft. Wayne & S. R. Co. 12 Ind. 398, the answer in an action on a note given for subscription of stock in a company alleged that the note had been delivered to one Jones, who was authorized to collect it and apply the proceeds upon a debt due from the company to him. This was held to be a good answer.

But in Hardin v. Helton, 50 Ind. 319, it was held, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, brought by the indorsee of a note, that an answer showing that the assignment was for the purpose, only, of enabling the plaintiff to collect the note, did not show that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest. In this case the court said: "It may be observed that the indorsement of the notes to the plaintiff transferred the title, though there was no consideration. An executed gift is valid. The title having vested in the indorsee, it is not material that the purpose was to enable her to collect the notes. No right remained in the indorser, either to the notes, or to the proceeds when collected. All that is alleged may be true and yet the plaintiff may be the real party in interest."

In Bostwick v. Bryant, 113 Ind. 448, 16 N. E. 378, it was said: "The answer here is different from that in the case of Hardin v. Helton, 50 Ind. 319. In that case it was not averred in the answer, as here, that the action was being prosecuted for the use and benefit of the payee, and that the payee was the owner of the note."

Under Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 29, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, it was held that an assignee of a lot of claims could not foreclose a mechanic's lien where he had no interest, and was to deliver to his assignor the proceeds of the action. Hoagland v. Van Etten, 22 Neb. 681, 35 N. W. 869, on Rehearing, 23 Neb. 462, 36 N. W. 755. On the first hearing the court said: "If a party having no interest in the subject-matter of the suit, who holds simply as assignee, and is to deliver to his assignor the proceeds of the action, may maintain an action on such an assignment, then § 29 has no meaning whatever. We do not care to enter sary party. This, however, only serves to show the distinction between the rules governing matters of practice in actions at law and suits in equity before the adoption of the Code. The purpose of the adoption of the Code was to simplify, not to mistify, the practice. By the adoption of the Code the nice distinctions and subtle refinements in the matters of practice existing between common-law and equity practice were expressly abolished. With this end in view, § 26 of the Code (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4454) was also adopted. This section reads as follows: "Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in § 28." It is worthy of note, as mentioned in Eaton v. Alger, 57 Barb. 179, 189, that this section contains the strong, well-defined, mandatory, Anglo-Saxon word "must," to characterize its imperative character. Evidently this was done with full knowledge of the tendency of the bench and the bar of the times, schooled in and imbued with the prior practice, to distort the meaning of this provision into harmony and compliance with their preconceived ideas of the proper practice, and with apprehension that a weaker word might not accomplish the purpose for which the Code was designed. The power to enact is not questioned. That the provision is emphatically mandatory in terms is acknowledged. That the purpose of the Code was to simplify the practice is admitted. Is not, then, the only possible remaining subject of inquiry in any given case not into a discussion of the propriety or impropriety of requiring actions to be brought in the name of the real party in interest. The statute contains a plain provision which this court has no authority to disregard. We hold, therefore, that an assignee having no interest in the result of the suit, and not entitled to any portion of the proceeds thereof, is not entitled, under § 29, to maintain an action as the real party in interest."

In Grimes v. Cannell, 23 Neb. 187, 36 N. W. 479, the court said: "In Hoagland v. Van Etten, 22 Neb. 681, 35 N. W. 869, it was held that under § 29 of the Code an action must be brought in the name of the real party in interest, and that the naked assignment of a claim to a plaintiff upon an agreement that he was to pay to the assignor the proceeds of such claim would not authorize such plaintiff to maintain the action; and we adhere to that decision." It was held in the Grimes Case that evidence showing that the consideration of the assignment to plaintiff was to be paid only in case of succeeding in the suit should have been allowed.

In Minnesota it seems that an assignee for collection may maintain an action on a note if he owns the legal title. But if the assignment is special "for collection," he cannot maintain an action thereon in his own name, as he would hold neither the legal, nor the equitable, title.

So, where an indorsement on a note was: "Pay to A. B. or order for collection," signed by the payee,—it was held that the indorsee was merely an agent to collect the note, and was not vested with such title as to make him a proper party plaintiff. Rock County Nat. Bank v. Hollister, 21 Minn. 385. In this case the court said: "It was held, in some cases, that the beneficial owner of a negotiable bill or note, payable to bearer or indorsed in blank, might institute suit on it in the name of anyone who would allow his name to be used for that purpose; and that, unless the maker had a defense to the note, good against the real owner, he could not be permitted to show that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest. Morton v. Rogers, 14 Wend. 575; Lovell v. Evertson, 11 Johns. 52; Conroy v. Warren, 3 Johns. Cas. 259, 264, 2 Am. Dec. 156. Although this rule might be correct at common law, it certainly is not good under the statute of this state, which provides that 'every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.' Gen. Stat. chap. 66, § 26. To this 64 L. R. A.

there are exceptions made by § 28; but the case of this indorsement would not come within them. Although this form of indorsement is, and probably has long been, in very common use, we find no case which decides its effect upon the title to the note. There are several cases, in England, of indorsements such as, 'Pay to A. for the account of the indorser, or, 'Pay to A, or order, for my use,'—in which cases it seems to be held that the note, and the money when paid on it, are the property of the indorser (Treuttel v. Barandon, 8 Taunt. 99; Sigourney v. Lloyd, 5 Barn. & C. 622, 3 Moody & R. 58, 7 L. J. K. B. 73, 32 Revised Rep. 504, Affirmed in 5 Bing. 525, 3 Moore & P. 229, 3 Younge & J. 220, 30 Revised Rep. 728); and this, we think, is the case with the indorsement under consideration. It is apparent from the language used that it was not the intention of the indorser to make the indorsee the owner of the note, or of the money after collection, but simply to give him authority on the note to collect it. The relation of the indorser and indorsee is that of principal and agent; the agent cannot be the 'real party in interest' in a suit brought on the note."

In a similar case, Third Nat. Bank v. Clark, 23 Minn. 263, the court held that the indorsement for collection did not prevent a good defence against the payee, and said: "The plaintiff being thus compelled to stand upon the terms of the indorsement under which it claims, the case falls within the doctrine of Rock County Nat. Bank v. Hollister, 21 Minn. 385, in which it was held that an indorsee claiming under an indorsement like that in this instance was not the owner of the note indorsed, and, therefore, not the real party in interest; for which reason he could not maintain an action upon the note."

And where the assignor intended to give the assignee the right to collect notes, and there was some question whether the assignor retained a contingent interest, it was held that suit was properly brought in the name of the assignee. Castner v. Austin, 2 Minn. 44, Gil. 32.

In an action by the payee against the acceptor or of bills of exchange an answer that there was no consideration between the drawers and the payee, that the bills were given to the payee for collection only, and that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, was held to con-falling within the excepted class, whether such case is in its nature such as before the adoption of the Code would have been denominated "an action at law" or "a suit in equity," manifestly this: Who is the real party in interest in the subject-matter of the action? Or, in other words of exact meaning, who is the party to be benefited or injured by the judgment in the case? Mr. Black, in his Law Dictionary, p. 997, defines the real party in interest, within the meaning of this statute, as follows: "In statutes requiring suits to be brought in the name of the 'real party in interest,' this term means the person who is actually and substantially interested in the subject-matter, as distinguished from one who has only a nominal, formal, or technical interest in it or connection with it." The author of 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 710, says: "The real party in interest, within the meaning of this provision of the Code, is the person who will be entitled to the benefits of the action if successful,—one who is actually and substantially interested in the subject-matter, as distinguished from one who has only a nominal, formal, or technical interest in or connection with it." Mr. Bliss, in his work on Code Pleading, 3d ed., note to § 45, says: "This raises the question, Who is the 'real party in interest?' The 'real party in interest' is the party who is to be benefited or injured by the judgment in the case. It will be observed that the rule provides the action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and, of course, stitute no defense. Vanstrum v. Liljengren, 37 Minn. 191, 33 N. W. 555. In this case the court said: "By the drawing of the bills in favor of the plaintiff, and delivering the same to him, and by the acceptance of the drawee, the plaintiff acquired the legal title to the bills and acceptance. More than this, by his acceptances the defendant obligated himself directly to the plaintiff to make payment to him, and upon that obligation this action is brought. Therefore, the action is maintainable by the plaintiff notwithstanding the fact sought to be shown."

But where an agreement was made between the payee and the drawer of a draft, that it was to be taken for collection and the proceeds to be applied in payment of a debt of the drawer to the payee, it was held that the payee was the real party in interest in an action thereon against the acceptor. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Helper, 49 Minn. 395, 52 N. W. 33.

It seems that officials to whom paper is payable or assigned, naming them "president" or "cashier," may maintain an action thereon in their own name. This is on the ground that they hold the legal title. It is also held that the bank may sue thereon. It was held that the cashier, having the legal title, was the party in interest to sue on a certificate of deposit assigned to a "cashier." In the latter case the point made was that the assignor was the real party in interest, and that the assignment was for collection only. Where a party has divested himself of the legal title to deposits, it is held that he is not the real party in interest in actions in regard to such deposits.

The mere fact that the word "president" was placed at the end of plaintiff's name on a note was held not to be sufficient to show that he was not the real party in interest, and suit was properly brought in his name. Ely v. Potter, 58 Mo. 158. In this case, in the mortgage securing the note the payee was described as president of the bank, and it was insisted, in a suit on the note, that the action should have been in the name of the bank and that it was the real party in interest.

And where a certificate of deposit was issued to G., was indorsed by him to B., cashier, and by him indorsed to S., cashier, it was held that the latter could maintain an action against the bank in his own name. Seybold v. Grand Forks Nat. Bank, 5 N. D. 460, 67 N. W. 682. In this case it was claimed that the assignments were for collection, and that the first assignor was the real party interested. The court said: "That one who has the naked legal title to a chose in action may maintain an action upon it, under a statute which provides that an action must be brought by the real party in interest, is a doctrine supported by the almost unanimous voice of authority."

Under this statute the assignee may sue in his own name, although he holds the legal title merely for the benefit of another. All that the debtor is interested in is protection against a second action on the same claim. If the beneficial owner has vested the legal title to the chose in action in a third person by assignment, the assignee can collect the claim, and the debtor will be protected; and, if the assignee sues upon the claim, a judgment in his favor will preclude a recovery on the same demand by the assignor."

But in Smith v. Westcott, 34 Fla. 430, 16 So. 332, a lot of duebills for work for a construction company in building a railroad were assigned to B., cashier of a partnership bank. It was held that the banking firm was the proper party to maintain an action as assignee of the original obligees of the claim sued on. In this case the cashier was a member of a banking firm doing business under the name of the Orange County Bank, and the action was brought in the firm name.

A deposit was made in a bank in the name of another party, to whom was given the bank and check books with authority to use them, and the holder of the bank book, disclaiming all interest, drew a check in favor of creditors of the depositor, who claimed the money as their own. It was held that the party giving such check could not maintain an action against the parties to whom he gave the check, and who received the money thereon. Williams v. Whitlock, 14 Mo. 552.

So, it was held that plaintiff was not the real party in interest where an action was brought by him to recover a sum alleged to have been deposited by him in defendant's bank, for his sole use and benefit; but the deposit was in the name of a third party, to be checked out by said third party. Tripler v. Mt. Pleasant Commercial & Sav. Bank, 21 Utah, 313, 61 Pac. 25. In this case the court said: "This is an action to recover a deposit of $2,000, with interest, alleged to have been deposited in defendant's bank for the use and benefit of plaintiff. The evidence shows that no such deposit if the defense can show that the plaintiff or plaintiffs are not the real parties in interest, the action must fail." The assignee of an account or chose in action is the real party in interest, and entitled to bring an action thereon, providing by such assignment the beneficial interest in or ownership of such chose in action is thereby transferred. But it is the interest or ownership, not the transfer, that gives the right of action. The owner would have the right of action without and independent of the formal assignment or transfer. Applying this rule to the case at bar, is defendant in error the real party in interest, and entitled to maintain an action on the Thompson account? Turning to the record, we find defendant in error did not purchase this account. It was not given to him. He did not become the owner thereof, nor was he entitled to demand and hold any beneficial interest therein. Mrs. Thompson did not sell this account, give it away, or part with any beneficial interest in it. She was the owner of it, and remained the owner. Loss of the account was her loss. Recovery upon the account was her recovery. All that was in fact done, as shown by the record, is this: A statement of the account, verified, was formally transferred to defendant in error, not for the purpose of vesting in him any ownership thereof, but for the purpose of enabling him to join it in an action on an account of his own. He did not intend to become the owner of the account, and did not. Mrs. Thompson did not intend to part was ever made, and that the plaintiff is not the real party interested in the alleged deposit. A recovery by plaintiff would not bar an action by Chapman, the real party in interest."

III. Equitable owner.

The general rule is that the equitable owner of the claim sued upon may sue as the real party in interest, under statutes requiring an action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest.

In suits upon notes assigned and transferred without indorsement it was held that the equitable owner could maintain an action thereon in his own name, and he was held to be the real party in interest. This was held in the following cases: Taylor v. Perry, 48 Ala. 240; Cobb v. Bryant, 86 Ala. 316, 5 So. 586; Heartman v. Franks, 36 Ark. 501; Hancock v. Ritchie, 11 Ind. 48; Allison v. Barrett, 16 Iowa, 278, 85 Am. Dec. 516; Younker v. Martin, 18 Iowa, 143; Pearson v. Cummings, 28 Iowa, 344; Warnock v. Richardson, 50 Iowa, 450; Pease v. Rush, 2 Minn. 107, Gil. 89; Boeka v. Nuella, 28 Mo. 180; Bennett v. Pound, 28 Mo. 598; Willard v. Moles, 30 Mo. 142; Billings v. Jane, 11 Barb. 620; Allgoever v. Edmunds, 66 Barb. 579; Savage v. Bevier, 12 How. Pr. 166; Andrews v. McDaniel, 68 N. C. 385; Kiff v. Weaver, 94 N. C. 274.

In Weinlick v. Bender, 33 Mo. 80, it was further held that an assignment to plaintiff after the institution of the suit did not affect his right.

So, where a daughter loaned money for her father, and took a note in her own name, and afterwards married, and after her death her husband transferred the note by indorsement to the father, it was held that the father was the real party in interest and could maintain 64 L. R. A.

an action thereon. McDowell v. Bartlett, 14 Iowa, 157.

A certificate of deposit was taken out in a husband's name for his wife's money, and he delivered the certificate to her. It was held that she was the party in interest, and could maintain an action thereon in her own name. Cassidy v. First Nat. Bank, 30 Minn. 86, 14 N. W. 363.

So, a wife who brought suit upon a note payable to her husband, given as purchase money for her statutory estate, was held to be the proper party plaintiff in an action on the note. Grantham v. Payne, 77 Ala. 584. In this case the court said: "The action was properly brought in the name of the wife alone, as 'the party really interested.' She is shown to have been the beneficial owner of the note sued on, and it was a part of the corpus of her statutory separate estate under the laws of Alabama. Although payable on its face to the husband, he held the legal title in trust for the wife as beneficiary, and his possession was hers."

In Hudson v. Weir, 29 Ala. 294, it was held that a party may use as a set-off a promissory note of which he is the equitable owner. The court said that "a sale of two specified promissory notes at a specified price not exceeding $200 may be so made as to invest the purchaser with the equitable title and ownership of them without writing, without delivery at the time of the sale, and without the payment of any part of the price at that time."

And under Ala. Code, § 3603, providing that all actions brought before justices of the peace, founded on any contract, express or implied, must be brought in the name of the party really interested, whether he have the legal title or not, it was held that an action for the purchase money of lands on a written covenant should be brought by the party owning the same under an oral assignment. Ryall v. Prince, 82 Ala. 264, 2 So. 319. In this case the court said: "This section is manifestly broader in its scope than the analogous one applicable to actions brought in the circuit court, which provided that contracts 'for the payment of money' only shall be prosecuted in the name of the party really interested." This action was properly brought under either section, as it was an action for the payment of money.

And where a bank brought an action on a draft payable to its cashier, and the complaint with her interest in and ownership of the account, and did not. At all times she remained the owner and party in interest. She at all times was and remained the real party in interest, and the only party entitled to bring and maintain an action for its recovery, without doing violence to the provision of the Code now under consideration. An extended review of the authorities pro and con upon this proposition (and they are many) would, to my mind, tend to the confusion of that which is and ever must remain plain, and would evince a lack of confidence in a proposition that is and must ever remain self-evident.

Doster, Ch. J., concurring:

I concur in the majority opinion, and approve the reasoning of Mr. Justice Pollock. It is legally impossible for one to transfer to another the mere right to bring a lawsuit,—that and nothing more,—and that was all that was attempted in this case.

Greene, J., dissenting:

I cannot agree with the opinion of the court. The conclusion reached is against the great weight of adjudicated cases and the opinions of Code writers, as well as a former decision of this court, and, in my judgment, it is based upon a misconception of the Code and the purpose intended to be accomplished by its adoption. If the majority opinion is correct, the Code has not only changed the equity rule of pleading in actions on contracts and other choses in alleged that it was delivered to him for the bank, it was held that the action was well brought. Camden Bank v. Rodgers, 4 How. Pr. 63. In this case the court said: "The assignee of a demand, whether negotiable or not, must be the plaintiff in the action. How, then, does the case stand? The draft is payable to the order of the plaintiff's cashier. It was delivered to him for the bank. The bank is the holder and the owner of the draft. These are the averments of the complaint, and taking them to be true, as we do upon demurrer, who but the plaintiff has such an interest in the draft, as would entitle him to maintain an action? The payee of the draft, instead of being 'the real party in interest,' has no interest at all in the draft."

A bank was the assignee of another bank of certain notes. The obligor renewed the notes by executing a note payable to the assignors, and delivered the same to the assignee, who held his paper, and who was the owner thereof. It was held that such assignee could maintain an action upon the renewal note, although not made payable to it. Seattle Nat. Bank v. Emmons, 16 Wash. 585, 48 Pac. 262.

And in a suit on a note payable to a bank, providing, "We hereby direct the proceeds of this note, when discounted, to be placed to the credit of ———,"—the plaintiff claimed that the bank refused to discount the same, but that plaintiff, for the price agreed upon, discounted the same. The note was not indorsed by the bank. It was held that plaintiff was the real party in interest. Rogge v. Cassidy, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 54, 13 S. W. 716. The court said: "The rule that, where the payee transfers a note by delivery merely, and not by indorsement, the legal title therefore remains in him, requiring him to be a party to an action upon it, does not apply in a case of this character. A rule of law is not to be applied when there is no ground or reason for its application."

An assignee of a note, the actual beneficiary and equitable holder thereof, was held to be a necessary party plaintiff in an action on the note by the payee. Carpenter v. Miles, 17 B. Mon. 598. The court said that the payee was a proper party.

The assignee of a bond assigned by parol was held to be a proper party plaintiff to maintain an action in his own name, in Conyngnam v. Smith, 16 Iowa, 471. In this case it was said 44 L. R. A.

that the real party in interest in a law forum was uniformly understood to mean legal interest, on the theory that the Code abrogated none of the rules of common law. "This construction of the Code and Constitution, announced in Claussen v. Lafrenz, 4 G. Greene, 224, Cooper v. Armstrong, 3 G. Greene, 120; and followed in Roberts v. Tallafarro, 7 Iowa, 110,—was adopted as indisputable, so far as relates to the question now before us; and, upon this assumption, and deductions regarded as necessarily resulting, it was held that only those having the legal interest in the cause of action could be heard at law. In other words, real interest was held to mean, at law, a legal interest, and hence, as in Farwell v. Tyler, 5 Iowa, 536, it was decided that the holder of a note not negotiable by delivery, nor assigned in writing, could not sue upon it in his own name. The construction above adverted to was, however, certainly much innovated upon, if not entirely overthrown, in the subsequent case of Shepard v. Ford, 10 Iowa, 502, decided by two members of the court as then constituted." And the court concludes that the party in interest is the same, now, in law and in equity.

A party to whom a coupon, payable to bearer, has passed by delivery was held entitled to maintain an action on the same, although the coupon contained words destroying its commercial character. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Cobb, 100 Ala. 228, 13 So. 938. The court said: "If the coupons passed by delivery, plaintiff became the owner of the legal title without an indorsement, and, conceding the contention of appellant for the argument, that there was a condition in the face of the coupons that destroyed their character as commercial paper, then, under § 2594 of the Code, the party really interested, or the beneficial owner, must sue, whether he has the legal title or not."

An assignment of a debt in writing, not accepted in writing, was held to be, not a bill of exchange, but an equitable assignment; and the assignee was held to be the real party in interest, and the party who should maintain an action thereon. Wheatley v. Strobe, 12 Cal. 92, 73 Am. Dec. 522.

And an assignment of notes without indorsement was held to constitute the assignee the real party in interest, and the assignor could not maintain an action thereon in his own name. Wilson v. Clark, 11 Ind. 385.

actions, but has also changed the law of commercial paper, for the reasoning applies with equal force to actions on negotiable promissory notes. At common law, promissory notes and other negotiable instruments were assignable, and the holder and indorsee thereof could prosecute an action thereon in his own name, not because of any rule of pleading, but because of the law of commercial paper; and in such actions the makers, acceptors, or indorsers could not question his title in any manner short of impeaching its good faith. Not so with personal contracts and other choses in action. These were not assignable so as to give the assignee a right of action at law in his own name. He was required to sue in the name of the assignor, or, if he were dead, in the name of his personal representative. This rule was based upon the doctrine that there was no mutuality or reciprocity of contract between the original promisor and the assignee. At all times, however, the person holding the legal title to a chose in action might prosecute the action in equity in his own name without joining with him the original obligee, or any of the persons to whom such original obligee had assigned the contract. What the Code intended to do by the provision in question was to abolish the common-law rule of pleading in actions on contracts and other choses in action, and adopt the equity rule as to parties. This rule is clearly stated by Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Code Remedies, 3d ed. § 249: "The fundamental

So, a verbal assignment of a note and mortgage was held sufficient to authorize an assignee to maintain an action of foreclosure. Barthol v. Blakin, 34 Iowa, 452.

A verbal assignment of a note and guaranty was held to transfer to plaintiff the property in the chose in action in which the instruments were the evidence; and the plaintiff thus became the real party in interest, and could maintain a suit in his own name to recover upon the guaranty. Green v. Marble, 37 Iowa, 95.

And where a note was made payable to an agent as trustee, it was held that the principal, being the real party in interest, could maintain a suit in her own name, although the note was not indorsed by the payee. Little v. Bradley, 43 Fla. 402, 31 So. 342.

In Caldwell v. Meshew, 44 Ark. 564, it was said that an agent, to whom notes and mortgages were transferred without indorsement, being the holder under such a transfer, might maintain an action thereon.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Camden Bank, 47 Ark. 541, 1 S. W. 704, it was said that a verbal assignment of certificates of indebtedness, if they were issued by a party authorized so to do, would authorize the assignee to sue thereon in his own name.

In Dixon v. Buell, 21 Ill. 203, the court said: "Equity treats the assignee of a contract, not assignable at law, as the party in interest, and affords him relief in a proceeding instituted by him in his own name; whilst courts of law require the proceeding to be in the name of the owner of the legal interest, unless it be in cases where the legal title vests in the purchaser by delivery."

The purchaser of certain lands directed the same to be conveyed to another as security for a debt. The land pointed out, and insured to be the tract conveyed, was not the same land that it was represented to be. It was held that the purchaser was the real party in interest, and that he could maintain an action for fraud and damages. Phillips v. Bush, 15 Iowa, 64. In this case the court said: "If it is true, as stated by the petitioner, that the title was taken in the name of E. E. Phillips, as security for a debt, then the plaintiff was the party to the contract. He is the one injured by the fraudulent representations of the vendor, as the land would revert to him after the debt secured thereby was paid. Again, if the land is valueless, the security is unavailing to the debtor. The defendant, by his demurrer, admits the allegations of the petition. If it is conceded that the land was deeded to E. E. Phillips at the request of plaintiff, and only for a special purpose, and it is admitted that the sale was to plaintiff, we are unable to see why he is not the proper party to the suit."

Parties to a subscription contract for the construction of a railroad agreed to pay any railroad company that "our agent may contract with," and provided for a delivery of the contract to the company. A delivery of the contract to the railroad company by the agent was held sufficient to authorize the company to sue thereon in its own name. Cedar Rapids & St. P. R. Co. v. Stewart, 25 Iowa, 115. In this case the court said: "It is urged that no assignment of the contract of the defendant and others is shown by the petition. None was necessary. By the express terms of the instrument, the agents were authorized to transfer it by delivery, and it was thus to become the property of the party receiving it."

A transferee by delivery of a bill of lading without indorsement was held to be the proper party to bring an action thereon in his own name against the carrier. Merchants' Bank v. Union R. & Transp. Co. 69 N. Y. 373.

And an equitable owner of a judgment was held to be the real party in interest. Kelley v. Love, 35 Ind. 106; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Pederson, 6 S. D. 140, 60 N. W. 747; Thomas v. Irwin, 90 Ind. 557.

But where the complaint stated that the payee indorsed the note sued upon and duly delivered it, but the manner of the indorsement was not stated, nor was it stated to whom it was delivered, it was held that the demurrer to the complaint was not frivolous. Parker v. Totten, 10 How. Pr. 283. In this case the court said: "Mere delivery is an immaterial ceremony, unless made by some person having power or authority to confer title. Delivery is often essential to perfect title. But in such cases it accompanies a sale, gift, or other disposition of property. It is the accessory, not the principal. And for what purpose was the note delivered to the plaintiffs? It is just as easy to infer that it was delivered to and received by them as agents or attorneys for collection, as owners. It is not even alleged that it was indorsed to the plaintiffs. And, even if it had been, such indorsement might have been, in legal effect, a mere direction, or ap-principle may be stated as follows: The plaintiff who institutes an equitable action must bring before the court all those persons who have such relations to the subject-matter of the controversy that, in order to prevent further litigation by them, they must be included in and bound by the present decree,—in other words, all those persons who are so related to the controversy and its subject-matter that, unless thus concluded by the decree, they might set up some future claim and commence some future litigation, growing out of or connected with the same subject-matter, against the defendant who is prosecuted in the present suit, and from whom the relief therein is actually obtained." In Walker v. Mauro, 18 Mo. 564, Mr. Chief Justice Gamble says:

pointment to pay the money due upon the note to the plaintiffs, for the use and benefit of the real party in interest. An indorsement for such a purpose is an ordinary business transaction. It takes place whenever a note is deposited with a bank for collection. And in such a case, if the note is not paid by the maker, no one, as the law now is, but the owner, or real party in interest, can prosecute an action upon it."

IV. On contracts for benefit of third parties.

It seems to have been a rule of law in the United States prior to the Code provision authorizing an action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, that where a promise is made to one directly for the benefit of a third party, the latter can maintain an action thereon. This seems to be the weight of authority. In addition to the Code provision requiring an action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, it is usually provided that, where a contract is made with one party for the benefit of another, the former may maintain an action thereon. This class of cases is an exception to the rule that every action must be prosecuted by the real party in interest, and is not intended to be included in this note. In some of the cases it was contended that this exception clause, authorizing the contracting party to sue, precluded the beneficiary from suing; but it is generally held that, notwithstanding the provision allowing the contracting parties to sue, the beneficiary may maintain an action thereon in his own name as the real party in interest. The note is intended only to include such cases as hold that such party is within the statute requiring an action to be brought by the real party in interest. Notwithstanding this provision, some cases hold and decide the case under the common-law rule, and reach the same conclusion.

So, where a contract was made between two persons for the benefit of a third person, it was held that the latter, though not one of the contracting parties, was a proper party to maintain an action for a breach of the contract. Plano Mfg. Co. v. Burrows, 40 Kan. 361, 19 Pac. 809.

And a party who paid the consideration on a contract was held to be the party beneficially 64 L. R. A.

"The effect of our new Code of Practice in abolishing the distinction between law and equity is to allow the assignee of a chose in action to bring suit in his own name in cases where by the common law no assignment would be recognized. In this respect the rules of equity are to prevail, and the assignee may sue in his own name."

In view of this rule, as stated by Mr. Pomeroy, and its purpose as stated by Chief Justice Gamble, it is difficult to understand why one holding by written assignment a verified, itemized account, may not sue in his own name. Does not such person represent all persons who are related to the controversy and its subject-matter? Would not a decree settle all future controversies growing out of, or connected with, the same interested, although the contract was taken in the name of another party. Tracy v. Gunn, 29 Kan. 508.

The Dorr Cattle Company owned a team of horses. John Dorr, its manager, sold the same, the value to be subsequently ascertained and to be credited on a note of said Dorr held by the purchaser. The note of Dorr was afterwards otherwise satisfied. It was held that the Dorr Cattle Company could maintain an action against the purchaser for the value of the team, under Iowa Code, § 3459, providing that every action shall be brought in the name of the real party in interest. Dorr Cattle Co. v. Jewett, 116 Iowa, 93, 89 N. W. 109. In this case the court said "that, under this provision, it has been held that the party for whose benefit a contract has been made may sue for breach thereof. There is no statutory provision which deprives the person to whom, on a consideration proceeding from himself, a promise is made to pay or deliver property to a third person, presumably for the ultimate benefit or advantage also of the party furnishing the consideration, of a right to maintain an action in his own name for damage resulting to him for a breach of the contract by the other party."

And under Iowa Rev. § 2757, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and § 2758, providing that a person in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another may sue in his own name, where a contract is made with an agent for the benefit of another who was the real party in interest, it was held that the latter could sue thereon in his own name. Rice v. Savery, 22 Iowa, 470. In this case the court said: "It is no longer absolutely necessary (§§ 2757, 2758) that the party to whom a promise is made shall be the plaintiff on the record, in an action to enforce it. That is to say, if the promise is made for the benefit of another who is the real party in interest, the latter may sue though the contract or promise be made to an agent or trustee."

A party to whom an indebtedness was due was held to be a proper party to maintain an action to foreclose a trust deed wherein another party was named trustee to secure this debt, in Hutchinson v. Myers, 52 Kan. 290, 34 Pac. 742. The court said that § 28, Kan. Code, authorizing a trustee to sue, did not prevent the maintenance of an action in the name of the real party in interest.

subject-matter? If these questions are answered in the affirmative, it will have to be conceded that the plaintiff is within the rule stated, and may therefore maintain this action. Could the assignor in this instance, after having appeared in court and assisting the assignee in the litigation, by testifying that the assignment was regular, and the defendant therein did not owe her anything, be heard to set up this claim as a cause of action against the defendant after the entry and satisfaction of a judgment? This provision intended to adopt the equity rule which permits the assignee holding the legal title to a chose in action to bring suit in his own name, instead of that of the original promisee or his personal representative, and without joining with him such original promisee. It cannot be said that this provision was adopted for the purpose of preventing persons who had no interest in a litigation from instituting suits. In the first place, no general complaint of that kind has been made; and, second, lawsuits carry with them sufficient penalties for such a practice ever to become obnoxious. The certainty of defeat is a sufficient preventative of any continued wrongs of this kind. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1181a, says: "Any holder of a bill or note who can trace a clear legal title to it is entitled to sue upon it in his own name, whether he possesses the beneficial interest in its contents or not." Mr. Pomeroy, after treating of the right of an assignee of a promissory note to maintain an action thereon, says: "Analogous to the

And where a bill was brought to enforce a trust deed, and was filed by the real beneficiary, who had loaned the money to the grantor, it was held that the plaintiff was the real party in interest. Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 604, 10 S. E. 884. The court said: "In equity the real party in interest must be the complainant, and all parties in interest must be before the court, either as plaintiffs or defendants; and it is immaterial that the interests of the defendants are in conflict with each other, or that some of their claims are identical with the claims of the plaintiffs. Equity deals with the real parties in interest."

And where two mining companies entered into a contract which, among other things, provided for the building of a furnace by one party, and was signed individually by the representatives of the different companies, the builder and two sureties, it was held that the builder, as the payee of the compensation to which he was entitled under the covenant for building the furnace, was the only party interested in the recovery. Craig v. Fry, 68 Cal. 363, 9 Pac. 550.

A subscription contract set out that, whereas it was the desire of the undersigned to have a railroad built between two points, and a development company proposed to construct a railroad when the right of way was secured and $20,000 put in bank to be paid to it on the completion of the road, in consideration whereof, "we, the undersigned, hereby agree to contribute and pay for carrying out the foregoing enterprise." It was held that the development company was the proper party plaintiff to maintain an action against a subscriber on his subscription. Western Development Co. v. Emery, 61 Cal. 611. The court said: "The contract sued on in this case was made for the benefit of plaintiff, and plaintiff was the real party in interest, as the money, when recovered, will belong to the company."

And in an action on an indemnifying bond taken by a railroad company from its lessee to protect against suits and damages, it was held that a beneficiary under such indemnity clause was a party for whose benefit a contract was made, and who thereby became the real party in interest, and could sue upon the contract; and that it made no difference that the contract was under seal. Hughes v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 11 Or. 437, 5 Pac. 206.

On a parol promise by one to pay the debt of another, it was held that an action may be maintained by the beneficiary of such promise. Mason v. Hall, 30 Ala. 599. The court said: "It is no objection to the maintenance of the suit by him for whose benefit the promise is made, that an action might also be brought by him to whom the promise was made."

So, where a debtor agreed with his creditor to pay the latter's debt to a third party, such third party was held to be the proper party plaintiff, and could maintain an action therefor in his own name, as such agreement made by all the parties was held to constitute him an equitable owner, and he was the real party in interest. Wiggins v. McDonald, 18 Cal. 126. In this case the court said: "We have but one form of action for the enforcement of private rights, and, with certain exceptions, the statute requires that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. Cases of assignment are not included in these exceptions, and in the form of the remedy no distinction exists between legal and equitable rights. In this respect the two classes of rights are placed precisely upon the same footing, and must undergo the same remedial process for their enforcement."

And where a father of an illegitimate child promised several persons that, if they would provide for and educate her, he would make a provision for the same in his will; and the child, after becoming of age, relying on such promises, agreed to pay the expenditures so incurred,—it was held that she could maintain an action against the estate upon the promise made by her father. Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181. 47 Am. Rep. 20. In this case the court said: "As she had the sole beneficial interest in the contract, it was, we think, properly brought in her name."

In Millani v. Tognini, 19 Nev. 133, 7 Pac. 279, which held that a party benefited by a contract to which he was not a party could maintain an action thereon, the court said: "Besides the statute which provides that 'every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest,' this court has held in three different cases that the beneficiary named in such a contract may maintain an action thereon in his own name. Ruhling v. Hackett, 1 Nev. 370; Alcalda v. Morales, 3 Nev. 137; Bishop v. Stewart, 13 Nev. 35." Although these cases hold as cited, they do not refer to the Code provisions.

subject discussed in the preceding paragraph is the question whether an assignee, to whom a thing in action has been transferred by an assignment which is absolute in its terms, so as to vest in him the entire legal title, but which by means of a contemporaneous and collateral agreement is in fact rendered conditional or partial, is the real party in interest. It is now settled by a great preponderance of authority, although there is some conflict, that if the assignment, whether written or verbal, of anything in action, is absolute in its terms, so that by virtue thereof the entire apparent legal title vests in the assignee, any contemporaneous collateral agreement by virtue of which he is to receive a part only of the proceeds, 'and is to account to the assignor or other person for the residue, or even is to thus account for the whole proceeds, or by virtue of which the absolute transfer is made conditional upon the fact of recovery, or by which his title is in any other similar manner partial or conditional,' does not render him any the less the real party in interest. He is entitled to sue in his own name, whatever collateral arrangements have been made between him and the assignor respecting the proceeds. The debtor is completely protected by the assignment, and cannot be exposed to a second action brought by any of the parties—either the assignor or other—to whom the assignee is bound to account. This is the settled doctrine in most of the states." Code Rem. § 132. This rule, as stated by the most sci-

And where a widow for a valuable consideration made an agreement with her father-in-law that on the final distribution of the latter's estate his grandchildren and her family were to share equally with others, it was held that the grandchildren could maintain an action on this contract after the death of their grand father. Smith v. Smith, 5 Bush, 625. The court said that Ky. Code Proc. § 33, authorizing a person in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another to bring suit without joining the beneficiary, would not interfere.

A citizen and taxpayer and injured party was held to be a proper party plaintiff in an action against a water-supply company for failure to comply with its contract with a city in keeping water pressure on, causing loss by fire to plaintiff's premises. Paducah Lumber Co. v. Paducah Water Supply Co. 89 Ky. 340, 7 L. R. A. 77, 25 Am. St. Rep. 536, 12 S. W. 554, 13 S. W. 249; Duncan v. Owensboro Water Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 35, 12 S. W. 557. In the Paducah Case the court said: "It is not, however, important whether this case either comes within what is elsewhere laid down as a general rule, or is an allowable exception to it, for this court has held the doctrine well settled, a party for whose benefit a contract is evidently made may sue thereon in his own name, though the engagement be not directly to or with him (Smith v. Lewis, 3 B. Mon. 229; Allen v. Thomas, 3 Met. [Ky.] 198, 77 Am. Dec. 169); which practice is not only in accordance with the rule found in Chitty on Pleading, but seems to be required by § 18, Civil Code, that in express terms provides, every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest."

In Filnt v. Cadenasso, 64 Cal. 83, 28 Pac. 62, it was held, where a grantor conveyed land in consideration of a grantee's contract to pay the grantor's note to a third person, which was secured by a mortgage on the land, that the grantor, having paid the note, could maintain an action against a subgrantee, who also made the same promise in consideration of his conveyance. In this case the Code was not cited, but it was held that their agreement was for plaintiff's benefit, and, upon their failure to perform, he had a right of action against them. It was contended that the plaintiff could not maintain the action under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 367, providing that every action must be brought by the real party in interest.

said that, if a subsequent grantee promised his grantor, as part of the consideration, to pay a third party, such third party could maintain an action upon such promise as the party beneficially interested.

But third parties who were not referred to in a contract, and were expressly excluded from all claims or benefits, were held not to be the proper parties to maintain an action thereon as the real parties in interest. Reynolds v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 143 Ind. 579, 40 N. E. 410. In this case the court said: "It is not denied that a third person, for whose declared benefit a contract was made, may sue to enforce the same. But it is only those whom the contract expressly declares are the beneficiaries and real parties in interest, as when the obligation runs to and is for the benefit of a designated third person or a class. In such cases the promisee is taken to be the mere agent or trustee of the designated actual beneficiary. This doctrine is without any sort of application to the facts of this case; for here the third parties (appellants) are not only not referred to in the remotest degree by any contract executed by appellee, but the construction contract and debt are expressly excluded from all claims or any benefits whatever. It is strictly a promise to pay to a trustee, conditioned upon the 'mutual and dependent obligations' of the immediate parties thereto. It is not contemplated by the immediate parties to the contract in suit that anything shall be paid except upon the performance of future obligations. That appellants may, therefore, have a right of action because they may anticipate some benefit from a contingent promise made to their promisor by another, has no support under the cases cited by appellants."

V. On claims and accounts for work and labor, and goods sold.

Assignees of book accounts, of claims for work and labor, and for goods sold, have been held to be the real parties in interest. So have assignees of claims due on contracts. But where an assignor had transferred his interest by sale or otherwise, it was held that he could not entific Code writer America has produced, is well understood by courts, and, with two exceptions, has been followed. The case of City Bank v. Perkins, 29 N. Y. 554, 568, 86 Am. Dec. 332, was an action on two bills of exchange, for $10,000 each, indorsed by the defendant, and two other bills of exchange, for $5,000 each, accepted by him. The defendant denied the indebtedness, and also denied that the plaintiffs were the legal holders and owners of said bills, and alleged that said bills belonged to the bank of Akron, Ohio. It appeared upon the trial that the defendant owed the amount of the bills in suit. The only question was whether the plaintiffs were the legitimate holders. The court said: "But as I understand the rule, nothing short of actual mala fides, or notice thereof, will enable a maker or indorser of such paper to defeat an action brought upon it by one who is apparently a regular indorser or holder,—especially where there is no defense as to the indebtedness. This rule is founded in the most obvious dictates of reason and sound policy, and should be inflexibly maintained. As to anything beyond the bona fides of the holder, the defendant, who owes the debt, has no interest." The case of Eaton v. Alger, 47 N. Y. 345, 349, cited in the majority opinion, was before the court of appeals on appeal from that decision, and was overruled. In the opinion the court said: "The evidence substantially established that the payee of the note [Clark] delivered it to the plaintiff upon his undertaking to collect it maintain an action for services, and could not maintain an action for goods sold.

An assignment of a claim due for goods sold was held to constitute the assignee the proper party to institute an action thereon, and he was the real party in interest. Garrison v. Clark, 11 Ind. 369. In this case the failure to deny the assignment was held to vest the right of action in the assignee without joining the assignor.

And an assignee of book accounts was held to be the real party in interest, and a proper party to sue thereon. Brumback v. Oldham, 1 Idaho, 709.

An assignment of a rent account by an order drawn on a tenant was held to constitute the assignee the party in interest, and to allow him to sue in his own name. Walker v. Mauro, 18 Mo. 584.

And where a party advanced money for the defendant upon his written request, and assigned his claim for the debt, it was held that the assignee was the real party in interest. Loug v. Heinrich, 46 Mo. 603.

And where claims were assigned to plaintiff, who brought suit upon the same, it was held to be immaterial whether third parties had furnished the funds to purchase the claim sued on. Jacobs v. Mitchell, 2 Colo. App. 456, 31 Pac. 235. The court said: "Conceding that Mr. Mackey furnished the money for the purpose of purchasing the claims, it does not follow that the plaintiff was not the bona fide purchaser, the legal assignee of the claims declared upon, and real party in interest."

An order on a cashier of a railroad company was held to be an assignment, and his assignee was the real party in interest, and was entitled to sue in his own name. Jackson v. Hamm, 14 Colo. 58, 23 Pac. 88.

And where a contractor engaged in constructing a pier was to be paid in instalments, and before completion he assigned all the payments due and to become due under the contract, authorizing the assignee to receipt for the same in his own name, and the assignee served notice of the assignment on the contracting party, it was held that the assignee was the real party in interest, and the proper party to maintain an action for an instalment. Sharp v. Edgar, 3 Sandf. 379.

So, a certificate stating that it was for money due, issued by a railroad company's chief engineer having authority, was held to be a contract for the payment of money, and an assignee of such certificate was held to be within the meaning of Ala. Code, § 2129, requiring an action on a contract for the payment of money to be brought in the name of the party really interested. Alabama & M. Rivers R. Co. v. Sanford, 36 Ala. 703.

A substituted contractor under a contract to build a house, acknowledged by the employer "as if he was the original contractor," was held to be a proper party to maintain an action thereon. Pensacola R. Co. v. Schaffer, 76 Ala. 233. The court said: "He was not only the transferee of the contract, which was one for the payment of money, but he possessed the exclusive right to collect and receipt for the money; so that payment to no other person would be valid without his order or assent."

A contractor with a city for public works obtained a judgment against another party requiring him to pay all claims arising out of the work. Subsequently the contractor obtained an assignment from the claimants for work done, and brought an action against such other party to compel the payment. The plaintiff was held to be the real party in interest. Root v. Moriarty, 39 Ind. 85. In this case the court held that, as the assignees, having been made parties defendant, did not controvert the assignment, there was no reason shown why the alleged debtor could be allowed to do so.

And where a physician, employed by a coroner to discover whether poison was the cause of death, agreed, in consideration of money received by an insurance company, to assign such a judgment as he might recover to such company, it was held that, as he had divested himself of all beneficial interest in the claim, and vested it in the company, the latter was the only proper plaintiff in an action against the county, and that the assignor was not the proper party plaintiff. Bartholomew County v. Jameson, 86 Ind. 154.

And where an action was brought by the vendor for railroad ties sold and delivered to defendant, and the defense was that the vendor had given a bill of sale for the ties in controversy, and authorized his vendee to collect what might be found due on said ties, it was held that this would be a complete defense, and the plaintiff would not be a proper party in interest. Buffington v. South Missouri Land Co. 25 Mo. App. 492.

at his own expense, and to pay to Clark upon its collection $600, which was the original amount of the note prior to its renewal. . . . The note is transferred and delivered to the plaintiff under that contract, and in fulfillment of that contract he proceeds to its collection. The plaintiff is thus made the party in interest, within the meaning of the Code, so as to enable him to maintain this action." In the case of Hays v. Hathorn, 74 N. Y. 486, the court reviewed all the decisions of the courts of New York upon this question, and summarized its conclusions as follows: "To entitle a party to maintain an action upon a promissory note, he must be the legal owner and have the right of possession of the instrument. Such ownership must be sufficient to protect the defendant, upon a recovery against him, from a subsequent action thereon." In Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 481, 485, the defendants pleaded that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and that they were not indebted to plaintiff in any manner, in the sum of $100 or any other sum. The court, on demurrer, held this answer sufficient. On appeal Judge Dillon said: "The course of decision in this state establishes this rule, viz., that the party holding the legal title of a note or instrument may sue on it, though he be an agent, or trustee, and liable to account to another for the proceeds of the recovery; but he is open in such case to any defense which exists against the party beneficially interested. . . . Holding, as the plaintiff did, the legal title to the

VI. On claims not arising on contracts for payment of money.

The weight of authority seems to be that an assignee of a claim not arising on a contract for the payment of money will be held to be the real party in interest if the claim is assignable. There are several cases in Alabama holding the other way, but the statutory provision in that state in regard to the real party in interest is limited to actions on contracts for the payment of money, except in courts of justices of the peace.

An assignee of a written contract for the delivery of property was held to be the real party in interest, under 2 Ind. Rev. Stat. p. 37, § 3, requiring the action to be brought by the real party in interest. But it was held that the assignor was also a proper party plaintiff under § 6, providing that where the contract is not assigned by indorsement in writing the assignor shall be made a party. Mewherter v. Price, 11 Ind. 199.

And where a note payable in work had been sold and delivered to a third party, it was held that he could maintain an action thereon in his own name. Schnier v. Fay, 12 Kan. 184.

And where a note was payable in oats, to a named payee or bearer, and transferred to the plaintiffs after due, and the payee agreed to put the note in judgment, or, in default thereof, to pay the plaintiffs $15, it was held that the plaintiffs were the parties in interest, and the action did not have to be brought by the payee. Combs v. Bateman, 10 Barb. 573.

The assignee of a claim for killing cattle was held to be the real party in interest. Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110.

See Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 513, 17 N. W. 31, 21 N. W. 9, supra, I.; Wines v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 9 Utah, 228, 33 Pac. 1042, and Lewando v. Dunham, 1 Hill. 114, supra, II.

But under a contract to sell and deliver ore at smelting works, by a firm, to be paid for on assay, it was held that the smelting firm could not assign its interest so as to allow its assignee to maintain an action. Arkansas Valley Smelting Co. v. Belden Min. Co. 127 U. S. 379, 32 L. ed. 246, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1308. In this case the court held that the contract was of such a personal nature as would prevent an assignee from maintaining an action thereon. The court said: "If the assignment to the plaintiff of the contract sued on was valid, the plaintiff is the real party in interest, and as such entitled, under the practice in Colorado, to maintain this action in its own name."

In Auerbach v. Pritchett, 58 Ala. 451, it was held that a promise to pay in cotton was not a contract provided for under Ala. Code, § 2890, providing that actions on promissory notes, bonds, or other contracts, express or implied, for the payment of money, must be prosecuted in the name of the party really interested, whether he has the legal title or not. It was held that on the death of the obligee the action should be in the name of the administratrix.

So, a written promise to return or account for a certain note to A., indorsed in blank, was held not to be within the terms of Ala. Code, § 2129, where suit was brought by B., the holder of the same, who received the writing by delivery, as it was not a "promissory note, or other contract, express or implied, for the payment of money." Henley v. Bush, 33 Ala. 636.

So, an action for breach of warranty of the soundness of a slave is not upon "a promissory note, bond, or other contract, express or implied, for the payment of money," under Ala. Code, § 2129. Newson v. Huey, 36 Ala. 37. In this case the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest. The court held that the statute did not apply to this class of actions.

VII. Bills, notes, and bonds.

At common law, where a payee assigned a note, an action thereon was required to be brought by the assignor for the benefit of the assignee. This rule of law was changed by the commercial law authorizing the party who is the legal holder of commercial paper to maintain an action thereon in his own name. In most of the states the statutes require an action to be brought by the real party in interest. The statutes also generally provide that a trustee of an express trust may maintain an action in his own name. This latter statute is an exception to the provision requiring an action to be brought by the real party in interest. In attempting to establish rules of pleading, a great many cases simply followed the commercial law, without reference to the statute requiring an action to be brought by the real party judgment by assignment, he could sue upon it; and his right to recover could not be defeated by simply showing that Cluff was the party beneficially interested in the action. This alone would not constitute a defense." The case of Cassidy v. Woodward, 77 Iowa, 357, 42 N. W. 319, 320, was an action involving the title and ownership of 80 acres of land. The objection was that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest. In passing upon this question the court said: "It has uniformly been held by this court that under this provision of the Code the party holding the legal title to a cause of action, though he be a mere agent or trustee, with no beneficial interest therein, may sue thereon in his own name." Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 481; Rice v. Savery, 22 Iowa, 470; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 514, 17 N. W. 31, 21 N. W. 9. In Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. v. Heipier, 49 Minn. 395, 396, 52 N. W. 33 it is said: "By the terms of the order or draft sued on, the drawer directed the defendant to pay the plaintiff a certain sum. The defendant accepted the draft, expressly agreeing to pay the plaintiff the sum named. Clearly, the plaintiff held the legal title to the demand, and was the real party in interest. It did not concern the defendant that there was an agreement between the drawer and the plaintiff that the latter took the order only for collection; the proceeds, when collected, to be applied on the indebtedness of the former to the latter. No exceptions were taken on the trial of the cause which in interest. These cases are not included in the note. When the point was made that the Code controlled, there was quite a struggle in the courts to adhere to the commercial law and at the same time follow the statute. This appears in subdivision II., Transfers for collection and suit, and is also apparent in subdivision III., Equitable owner. And so, in the former class, Transfers for collection and suit, some states have gone one way and some the other, although the weight of authority now is that the legal holder for collection may maintain an action thereon; and in regard to equitable owners, under the Code a party who holds paper without indorsement, being the owner thereof, is entitled to maintain an action thereon. The negotiable instrument law, providing that "the holder of a negotiable instrument may sue thereon in his own name, is an adoption of the commercial law. As to whether or not new difficulties will arise in the application of this statute which has been adopted in many states, remains to be seen. The assignees and owners of warrants, bonds, notes, checks, and the like are generally held to be the real parties in interest. This was held in regard to notes, whether negotiable or not, and where they were transferred after maturity, and where they were transferred by a separate instrument. After transfer of title the payee cannot maintain an action on a note; and some cases have held that, in an action by an assignee or indorsee on a note, it is a good defense that the plaintiff has improperly obtained possession of the same, and is not the owner or legal holder.

In an action on a county warrant issued to B. or order, and by him assigned to S. or bearer, it was held that the holder thereof could maintain an action in his own name, and was the real party in interest. McCormick v. Grundy Co. 24 Iowa, 382.

In an action on a note by the indorsee, an answer denying that plaintiff had any interest in the note was held to constitute no defense, where no reason was given why, if the note was indorsed, the plaintiff did not own it; nor why she was not the party in interest. Hereth v. Smith, 33 Ind. 514.

Where the plaintiff sued as indorsee of a note, and proved his title as such, it was held that he was the real party in interest. James v. Chalmers, 5 Sandf. 52.

The assignment of a note after maturity was held to vest the legal title in the assignee, 64 L. R. A.

and he was held to be the real party in interest. Walsh v. Allen, 6 Colo. App. 303, 40 Pac. 473; James v. Chalmers, 6 N. Y. 209.

And where an action was brought upon a note, by a party holding the same under a blank indorsement, and the answer denied that the note was transferred to the plaintiff, or that he was the legal holder or owner, or that he was the real party in interest, and alleged that a bank was the real party in interest and the owner and holder thereof, it was held that evidence to sustain the allegations of the answer was properly rejected on the ground that the blank indorsement constituted a written assignment of the security, and made the plaintiff the real party in interest. Hays v. Southgate, 10 Hun, 511. The court said: "The cases cited by the defendants—Metropolitan Bank v. Lord, 1 Abb. Pr. 185; Flood v. Reynolds, 13 How. Pr. 112; Duncan v. Lawrence, 6 Abb. Pr. 304; Tamiser v. Cassard, 17 Abb. Pr. 187—arise on the sufficiency of answers denying plaintiff's ownership of the notes sued upon, and setting up another owner. These were held to be issuable facts, and to compel the plaintiff to prove his title. But they do not reach this case, where a sufficient title has been proved on the trial. Sheldon v. Parker, 3 Hun, 498, was decided on the question of bona fides. Killmore v. Culver, 24 Barb. 656, must be considered as overruled by the cases cited. In Sanford v. Sanford, 45 N. Y. 723, the defendant, as executor, claimed to be the owner and holder of the note, and entitled to the proceeds equally with the plaintiff, who was executor under the same will."

The holder and owner of a note indorsed in blank was held entitled to maintain an action thereon, notwithstanding subsequent indorsements. Vanaradule v. Hax, 47 C. C. A. 31, 107 Fed. 878. The court said that a holder of a note indorsed in blank by the payee may, at the trial, strike out all subsequent indorsements, and recover on the instrument.

And where a note was indorsed in blank, and an action brought thereon by a party other than the payee, it was held that the introduction of the note in evidence established a prima facie case that the action was brought by the real party in interest. Yakima Nat. Bank v. Knipe, 6 Wash. 348, 33 Pac. 834.

In Riebig v. Teabout, 73 Iowa, 419, 35 N. W. 499, it was held that the holder of a note could maintain an action thereon whether it raised any other question." Abell Note Brokerage & Bond Co. v. Hurd, 85 Iowa, 559, 52 N. W. 488, was an action upon a promissory note assigned to plaintiff for collection merely. The only question submitted was whether the plaintiff was the real party in interest. The court said "that the party holding the legal title of a note or instrument may sue on it, though he be an agent or trustee, and liable to account to another for the proceeds of the recovery; but he is open in such case to any defense which exists against the party beneficially interested." In First Nat. Bank v. Hummel, 14 Colo. 275, 8 L. R. A. 788, 20 Am. St. Rep. 257, 23 Pac. 991, an action on a chose in action, the court said: "The meaning of the language of the 1st section [Code, § 3] cited has been frequently construed by the courts. The 'real party in interest' is held to mean the person in whom the legal title to the claim in suit is vested." The case of Young v. Hudson, 99 Mo. 102, 106, 12 S. W. 632, 633, was an action upon three promissory notes and an account for merchandise, all alleged to have been regularly transferred to plaintiff. The defense was that the assignment of the account to plaintiff was without consideration, and was a mere pretense and sham, and the assignors, being the owners and entitled to whatever sum might be collected on it, were the real parties in interest. Speaking on this question, the court said: "The assignment was regular and formal. There was evidence of defendant's admission of the original inwas negotiable or not. The court does not discuss the question of the party in interest.

In Helper v. Alden, 3 Minn. 332, 611. 232, it was said that in this state an indorsee is a proper party to maintain a suit in his own name against any or all of the parties on a non-negotiable instrument under seal.

Where an assignment of a note was made upon separate paper, it was held that the assignee could maintain an action on the note in his own name as the real party in interest. Thornton v. Crowther, 24 Mo. 164.

And where the payee of a lost note indemnified the obligor and brought suit upon the note, to which it was pleaded that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, the court said: "The objection that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest is without foundation; the note was made payable to him, and he is prima facie the owner; his right to maintain this action cannot be questioned, except the defendant pleads payment or offset against Cleero Price, whom he alleges is the true owner of the note." Price v. Dunlap, 5 Cal. 483.

After a bond under seal had been lost, the owner transferred the same to the plaintiff by a writing under seal. It was held that he could maintain an action on the bond. Glassell v. Mason, 32 Ala. 719. The court said: "A debt created by bond, which bond has been lost, is still a debt or contract for the payment of money, and is embraced by the section of the Code above copied."

Assignees of a promissory note, to whom it had been transferred by a separate writing by the payee, but not by indorsement or delivery, were held to be proper parties to maintain an action in their own name on the same. Morris v. Poillon, 50 Ala. 403.

And where a non-negotiable note had been assigned by a separate instrument, and not by indorsement, such assignee was held entitled to maintain an action in his own name, in assumption, against persons wrongfully collecting and appropriating the same. Planters' & M. Ins. Co. v. Tunstall, 72 Ala. 142. The court said: "Under the statute a suit must have been prosecuted in the name of the assignee having the equitable or beneficial interest."

So, where a non-negotiable note was transferred by a separate indorsement the assignee was held to be the proper party to maintain an action in his own name. Stephens v. Adams, 83 Ala. 117, 9 So. 529.

And where a memorandum was indorsed on the back of a note after its execution, that "this note shall not be transferred to any person other than S.," but it was transferred to J., it was held that he could maintain an action on the note. Johnson v. Washburn, 98 Ala. 258, 13 So. 48. The plea did not negative the fact that it might have been transferred to A. and by him to J.; and it was also held that a contemporaneous parol agreement could not affect the original terms of the writing.

Where the complaint alleged that the defendant made his note, and that the indorsee obtained a judgment against the maker, and, after "no property found," obtained a judgment against the indorser, who transferred to plaintiff "said claim against defendant,"—it was held, under Ala. Code, § 2129, providing that an action on notes, bonds, or contracts for the payment of money must be prosecuted in the name of the person really interested, that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest in the judgment; but the complaint was treated as one on the note, the right to which had reverted in the indorser on his payment of the judgment rendered on his indorsement, and therefore the action was brought by the real party in interest. Smith v. Harrison, 33 Ala. 706. In this case the court said: "The recovery of the several judgments, and the payment of the latter, were but links in the chain of facts which supported the plaintiff's action,—necessary to be averred and proved, but the cause of action stated in the complaint is the note of Smith, not the judgment which Maull, for the use of Givhan, recovered upon it."

In a suit by an assignee and purchaser upon a time check, it was held that the action should have been in the name of the purchaser and assignee because he was the owner and real party in interest. Rio Grande Extension Co. v. Coby, 7 Colo. 299, 8 Pac. 481.

In an action on a note payable to a party as trustee for others, it was held that the trustee could maintain an action in his own name. Rice v. Rice, 106 Ala. 636, 17 So. 628. In this action the plaintiff amended his complaint to sue as "trustee of Jennie, Lena, and Belle Rice," and the case was tried as upon the complaint of Rice in his individual capacity. In most of the states the Code provision authorizes a party in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, or a trustee for another, to maintain an action. This seems to be wanting debtedness it exhibited. But no consideration for its transfer to plaintiff appeared. The account was evidently assigned to him to collect for the use of the assignors. That did not preclude a recovery. An assignee of a chose in action arising out of contract may sue upon it in his own name, though the title was passed to him only for the purpose of collection." In McPherson v. Weston, 64 Cal. 275, 281, 30 Pac. 842, 845, the defense was that the plaintiff was not the owner of the note, and therefore not the real party in interest. It was ruled: "It makes no difference that the plaintiff paid nothing for the note. Forbes had the right to indorse it to him whenever the note became his property. He held it with the same right as any other owner had." In the syllabus the court says: "The transfer to plaintiff was without consideration, and merely for the purpose of collection. Held, that the transfer to plaintiff was valid, and that he was entitled to judgment against Robinson as an indorser." In McCallum v. Driggs, 35 Fla. 277, 278, 17 So. 407, 408, it was held: "If a note be indorsed in blank, the courts never inquire into the right of the plaintiff, whether he sues in his own right or as trustee, nor into the right of possession, unless a plea be made of mala fides in the plaintiff's possession." In Caldwell v. Laurence, 84 Ill. 161, 162, one defense was that the plaintiff was not the owner of the note, and therefore not the real party in interest. The court says: "The legal title to the note was still in in the Alabama Code, but the same result is reached in the decision. The court said: "Notwithstanding the provision of the statute, that 'actions on promissory notes . . . must be prosecuted in the name of the party really interested' (Code, § 2594), when the promise is made to one person for the benefit of another, either may sue (Mason v. Hall, 30 Ala. 599; Shotwell v. Gilkey, 31 Ala. 724); and where the party having the legal title—the payee named in a promissory note—is also the party entitled to receive the money and discharge the debtor, 'although, when collected, he holds the money, not for his own use, but for the use of some other person, and to whose use he is to apply it, or to whom he is bound to pay it,—in all such cases the action must be in the name of the party having the legal title.' Per Peck, Ch. J., in Yerby v. Sexton, 48 Ala. 311, 325. And to like effect it is said by Manning, J.: 'This § 2524 [now 2594] has caused much perplexity in practice. But whenever a party has the legal title, if he is a party to whom payment can be legally made, and who can legally discharge the debtor, the action may be brought in his name, although the money, when collected, is not for his use.' Hirschfelder v. Mitchell, 54 Ala. 419. See also Tilley v. Harrison, 91 Ala. 295, 8 So. 802. In this case the plaintiff had the legal title; payment could be efficaciously made to him, and he could discharge the debtor. The suit, therefore, proceeded properly in his name, though had there been a recovery, he would have held the money for Jennie, Lena, and Belle Rice."

A party who had the legal title, to whom payment could be made, and who could legally discharge the debtor, was held to be a proper party to maintain an action in his own name on a note, although the money, when collected, was not for his use. Hirschfelder v. Mitchell, 54 Ala. 419. In this case the plaintiff was the owner of one-half interest in the note, had it in his possession, and could give an acquittance to the debtor.

After a transfer by the payees of notes, and while the same were owned by the transferee, it was held that the payees could not maintain an action in attachment for the debt evidenced by such notes, as they were not the real parties in interest. Landauer v. Espenhain, 95 Wis. 169, 70 N. W. 287.

A county superintendent who was the legal holder of a note turned over to him by town- 64 L. R. A.

ship trustees, and which note was given for money loaned by the trustee, was held to be the proper party plaintiff within the meaning of Ala. Code, requiring an action to be brought by the real party in interest, and Ala. act August 5, 1865, providing for the appointment of a superintendent of education in each county, and that all money or other property shall be turned over to the county superintendent. Yerby v. Sexton, 48 Ala. 311. In this case the court said: "Said trustees had, not only the legal title to said note, but were, within the meaning of said section, the parties really interested. What the words, 'the party really interested,' as used in this section, mean, I readily admit I do not very well understand; no rule, so far as I know, has been laid down by which their meaning as applicable to particular cases, or to cases generally, can be certainly ascertained. In ordinary cases, there is little difficulty. Where the dry legal title is in one, and a clear equitable title is in another, whether by transfer, delivery, or otherwise, to whom alone the money belongs, and who only is entitled to receive it, and authorized to discharge the debtor,—in such cases there is no trouble; the action must be brought in the name of the equitable owner. He is, in the language of said section, the party really interested. But where the party having the legal title is also the only party entitled to receive the money and discharge the debtor, although when collected he holds the money, not for his own use, but for the use of some other person or persons, and to whose use he is to apply it, or to whom he is bound to pay it,—in all such cases the action must be in the name of the party having the legal title."

An officer of a lodge may maintain an action upon a note payable to himself as such officer. Bryan v. Willson, 27 Ala. 208. The court said that where the note is made payable to the plaintiff it is an admission that he is entitled to receive the amount thereof. It further said that it is a general rule that an agent cannot sue in his own name on a note made to him in behalf of his principal; but there are exceptions. "One of this class of cases is where the promise is made in writing, and made to the agent by description of office."

Where the payee of a note, payable to him individually, brought an action on the same, and the answer set up that the note was the property of the township and was given for money plaintiff, and the facts averred simply showed the payee was equitably entitled to the proceeds; but that is a question with which defendant need not concern himself. It is not alleged he had any defense to the note as against the payee, and in whom were the equities is a matter of no consequence. Had the plea set forth facts which constituted a defense to the note, either in whole or in part, a very different question would have been presented. The legal title of the note remaining in plaintiff, the fact that the payee may have been the equitable owner constitutes no sort of defense to the action. The suit was rightfully brought in the name of the party in whom was the legal title to the indebtedness, and it can make no difference to defendant who may have been the equitable owner of the note if he had no defense on the merits." In Brown v. Chenoworth, 51 Tex. 470, the defendant pleaded that plaintiff after the execution of the note was adjudged a bankrupt, and that the note was transferred to his assignee in bankruptcy for the benefit of his creditors; that after his discharge in bankruptcy the note belonged to the creditors, who had not been paid. The court said that plaintiff, "the apparent owner of the note, might sue in his own name, and the mere fact that he was not the real owner would constitute no defense, either in bar or in abatement." In Epting v. Jones, 47 Ga. 622, it was held that "it is no good plea to a suit upon a promissory note that the suit is brought by the true owner in a ficti-loaned from the township funds; that the payee had accounted for the same; that he should have delivered it to his successor in office, and that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest.—It was held that this constituted no defense. Robbins v. Cheek, 32 Ind. 328, 2 Am. Rep. 848.

But in an action brought upon a note indorsed by the payee, where plaintiff claimed to be the owner and holder, an answer alleging that the payee had never delivered the note to the plaintiff, and that the payee was the owner and holder of the note, was held to be a good answer. Mendenhall v. Bayles, 47 Ind. 575.

So, where a party brought an action on a note, and introduced the note in evidence, and it was indorsed by the payee, and the answer put in issue the ownership and want of interest in plaintiff, it was held that it was error to exclude evidence tending to prove that the note was not the property of plaintiff, that the same was never transferred to him, that he was not the real party in interest, and that the note was the property of a savings bank, which was the real party in interest. Hays v. Hathorn, 74 N. Y. 486.

And where a note indorsed by the payee was given to a bank to be used for thirty days, and such note was not so used, but was retained by the bank, and, after maturity, was transferred to a bona fide purchaser without notice, who brought an action thereon and to foreclose a mortgage securing the same; and the defense was that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest,—it was held that the payee of the note was the real party in interest, and plaintiff could not recover. Osborn v. McClelland, 43 Ohio St. 284, 1 N. E. 644.

Where a note had been transferred by an indorsement of the payee, and an action was thereafter brought by him on the note, it was held that the plaintiff could not maintain such action as he was not the real party in interest. Clawson v. Cone, 2 Handy (Ohio) 67.

And where an assignment of a note was made, and the assignee sued one of the three makers of the note and did not sue the sureties, and subsequently the assignor brought suit against all the parties, it was held that he could not maintain an action on the note without a re-assignment of the same to him, as the assignees were the real parties in interest, and entitled to 64 L. R. A.

VIII. Joint obligees and partial assignments.

The assignment by one obligee of his interest to another obligee, or to a third party, is held to constitute the remaining obligee and the assignee the real parties in interest. If an obligee has only a partial interest in the recovery of the debt, he cannot maintain an action on the same. A surviving obligee is the party in interest; but, if both obligees are dead, it is held that the representatives of both should sue.

A note was payable to two payees, and one of them assigned his half interest in the note to a third party. It was held that the remaining payee and the assignee could maintain an action thereon, such parties being the real parties in interest. Groves v. Ruby, 24 Ind. 418.

And where an action was brought to recover money paid by the plaintiff and another party, who had assigned his claim to the plaintiff, it was held that an instruction that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest was properly refused, as it was not competent for the defendant to question the sufficiency of the consideration therefor. Stone v. Frost, 61 N. Y. 614.

Subscribers to a contract to build a church, who paid their subscription, and who incurred obligations on the faith of the contract, were held to be the real parties in interest, and entitled to maintain an action on such subscription against a defaulting subscriber. Hodges v. Nalty, 104 Wis. 434, 80 N. W. 726.

In an equity action to establish the rights of parties advancing money against other parties liable by the express terms of the contract to contribute equally to such advances and share such liabilities, it was claimed that the plaintiffs were not the real parties in interest, because the enterprise was for the purpose of purchasing land for the benefit of two railroads, and five of the plaintiffs were officers in one company and three others in the other company; but it was held that there was no trust, tious name, it not appearing by the plea that the defendant has any defense to the note."

The question involved in this case has been before this court, and for fifteen years it has been the settled law of this state that one holding the legal title to a chose in action may maintain an action thereon in his name, and, in my judgment, this should have been left at rest. In Krapp v. Eldridge, 33 Kan. 106, 109, 5 Pac. 372, 373, Mr. Chief Justice Horton, speaking for the court, said: "Finally, it is urged that the trial court committed error in not compelling Eldridge to answer upon cross-examination 'what he paid for the account.' The amount he paid was immaterial. The account was transferred and assigned in writing to him, and to this writing Carroll had attached his signature. Where an account is assigned absolutely, so that the assignee becomes in fact the owner thereof, he is the real party in interest. As Carroll had transferred in writing this account to Eldridge it was immaterial to Krapp whether he had given it to him or sold it to him. After such transfer and assignment, Eldridge was the only person entitled to maintain an action therefor. Of course, Eldridge, as assignee, had no rights which his assignor did not possess. Krapp was entitled to make all defenses against the account in Eldridge's hands which he might have made if the action had been brought in the name of Carroll." An able and thoroughly sound opinion involving the principles of this case and that the plaintiffs acted in their individual capacity, and that they could maintain the action. King v. Barnes, 109 N. Y. 267, 16 N. E. 332.

Notes were taken in settlement of a claim due plaintiff, payable to her attorneys, and plaintiff agreed that they should have the amount of the smaller note for fees, and all of the notes were indorsed by the attorneys. It was held that plaintiff was the real party in interest, and could maintain an action thereon. Miller v. Wolbert, 71 Iowa, 539, 29 N. W. 620, 32 N. W. 402. The court said: "While it is true they were to have the amount of the smaller note, it does not appear to have been understood that they were to have the note itself as their property. That was indorsed as well as the larger one, and both were treated in the same way. It may be that Grass & Storey had the right to hold the smaller note until they should be paid their fees. But we see nothing more. The plaintiff then, we think, is the real party in interest, so far as both notes are concerned, and we see no evidence tending to show otherwise."

Surviving obligees on a joint contract were held to be the real parties in interest, and could maintain an action on such contract without joining the heirs or representatives of the obligee. Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Adamson, 114 Ind. 282, 15 N. E. 5. The court said: "If they do possess the entire right, then they are the real parties in interest, since it is inconceivable that, if they do possess the entire right, any other person can be a real party in interest. The principle of the common law vesting the whole right in the survivors is not changed by the Code, and, so long as the principle remains unchanged, the persons possessing this entire right must be regarded as the real parties in interest."

But where a chose in action as a penal bond had been assigned to two, both of whom were dead, it was held that, in treating a bond as an obligation to pay money, the real interest was not in the representatives of the survivor alone, but in the representatives of both the assignees; and an action by them for the recovery of purchase money and interest, on the failure of title to land, was properly brought in the name of the two representatives of the assignees jointly. Skinner v. Bedell, 32 Ala. 44. The difference between this case and the one preceding is probably on the ground that, the survivor having died, there was no one in whom the legal title could vest, and, therefore, the representatives of both assignees were the real parties in interest.

Where a party to a contract transferred by an equitable assignment one half thereof to another party, it was held that both were proper parties plaintiff in an action thereon. Singleton v. O'Brien, 125 Ind. 151, 25 N. E. 154.

Where a note as made payable to a husband and wife, and, after the husband's death, the wife brought an action thereon, it was held that the court erred in excluding evidence which tended to show that a legacy to the wife was intended to take the place of the note, and that she had turned the note over as assets of the decedent, and that it was competent to show that she was not the real party in interest. Sanford v. Sanford, 45 N. Y. 723.

And where a subscription was made promising to pay two persons for building an opera house, and one of the payees assigned all his interest in the same to the other payee and a third party, it was held that the assignor had no interest in an action on such subscription, and that the suit was improperly brought in the name of the original payees, and that it should have been brought by the remaining payee and the assignee of the interest of the other payee. Gerner v. Church, 43 Neb. 690, 62 N. W. 51.

Where bonds were transferred on a settlement, and the transferee agreed to pay a portion of the proceeds to a third party, it was held that such third party could not maintain an action on the bonds. Pleasants v. Erskine, 82 Ala. 386, 2 So. 122. In this case the court said: "The contract, by which James J. Pleasants turned the bonds over to Robert did not, and does not, clothe Sam, plaintiff's intestate, with the real interest. It confers on him only a partial interest,—one-fourth interest in the net collections. Where a contract is one and single for the payment of a gross sum of money, it cannot, without the consent of the promisor, be so altered as to make it several, for the payment of parts of it to different persons separately."

See Hirschfelder v. Mitchell, 54 Ala. 419, supra, VII.; Holderman v. Tedford, 7 Kan. App. 657, 53 Pac. 887, infra, XI.; Leeds v. Richmond, 102 Ind. 372, 1 N. E. 711, infra, XV.; Filley v. Walker, 28 Neb. 506, 44 N. W. 737, infra, XIX.; O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 Pac. 236; Silliman v. Tuttle, 45 Barb. 171; Tustin Fruit Asso. v. Earl Fruit Co. (Cal.) 53 Pac.

was written by Judge Garver in Linney v. Thompson, 3 Kan. App. 718, 45 Pac. 456.

If Stewart had paid Price the amount of this account after the assignment, and before the suit, does any one doubt that this would have been a complete satisfaction? Price had been authorized to receive the money, and the account had been assigned to him and placed in his hands. A receipt from him would have been sufficient to protect Stewart, and could have been successfully pleaded in payment to any action thereafter prosecuted by Mrs. Thompson on that account. Holding the legal title, as he did, with authority to collect and receipt in full, why may he not maintain an action in his own name? The Code did not intend to adopt a rule that changes the law of commercial paper, nor one that abolishes the equity rules as to parties to actions on contracts; but it intended to abrogate the common-law rule, and adopt and apply the equity rule of pleadings, so far, at least, as concerns the plaintiffs in actions on contracts and other choses in action. The principle running through and controlling in all of the foregoing decisions is that the person in possession and holding the legal title to the evidence of indebtedness sued on is the real party in interest, within the meaning of the Code, notwithstanding the entire beneficial interest is in another.

IX. Fictitious payees.

An action was brought upon an instrument in writing given to Quan On Wing in payment for goods, and was assigned to plaintiff, who brought an action thereon. It was objected, in the supreme court, that the payee's name was fictitious, not showing the persons interested as partners, and that the payee could not maintain an action, and, therefore, the assignee could not. It was held that there was nothing in that point, and that, the assignment being established, the action was properly brought in the name of the real party in interest. Quan Wye v. Chin Lin Hee, 123 Cal. 185, 55 Pac. 783. This objection not having been made in the pleadings, and no objection having been made to the evidence, it was too late to raise the question on appeal in the supreme court.

In Farwell v. Tyler, 5 Iowa, 535, an action was brought in the name of D. C. F. on a note payable to him. The defense was that defendant had been a partner with one M. C. F., and the note was given to him on a settlement, but was made payable to D. C. F., a fictitious person, in order to prevent creditors of M. C. F. from seizing the same; that the note had never been delivered to plaintiff and that M. C. F. was still the owner and the real party in interest. It was held that M. C. F. could not sue upon the note in his own name, it not having been assigned. The court said that, if he owned it, the suit was properly brought; but held that any defense against M. C. F. could be made against the note if he was the party beneficially interested in the debt, although the suit was brought in the name of the person having the legal interest.

X. Bonds given in judicial and other proceedings.

a. On appeal.

If an assignment of a judgment is made the assignee is held to be the party in interest to maintain an action on the appeal bond. Under a statute giving a city the fees and costs received by an officer, the city is held to be the party in interest, in an action on an appeal bond, for costs given in an action against city officers.

An action was assigned, but prosecuted in the name of the original plaintiff, and after the assignment the bond was given on appeal in the name of the original plaintiff. It was held that the assignee was the real party in interest, and could maintain an action for a breach of the bond in his own name. Bennett v. McGrade, 15 Minn. 132, Gil. 99.

So, where an appeal was taken in replevin, and the obligee in the appeal bond had caused an assignment of the judgment to be filed, it was held that the assignor could not maintain an action on such appeal bond. Crum v. Stanley, 55 Neb. 351, 75 N. W. 851.

A plaintiff recovered a judgment, and assigned his cause of action. The action was continued in the name of the plaintiff, and judgment for costs in his favor was obtained in the court of appeals, which judgment was also assigned to the same party. An action was thereafter brought in the name of the original plaintiff on the appeal bond to recover the costs. It was held that this could not be maintained for the reason that the attorney, being the equitable owner of the costs, should have brought the action in his own name. Klapp v. Rapp, 7 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 385.

Where an appeal was taken in an action against the officers of the city of New York, and the judgment in favor of the officers was affirmed, it was held that the city of New York was the real party in interest in an action on the appeal bond for costs, under N. Y. Laws 1882, chap. 410, § 56, providing that all fees and costs received by any officer shall be the property of the city, and Code Civ. Proc. § 449, providing that all actions must be brought in the name of the real party in interest. New York v. Bannan, 42 App. Div. 191, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1031.

b. In attachment.

Where a bond to pay any judgment which may be recovered was given to release an attachment, and was assigned to a third party in trust for another who paid the consideration of the assignment, and after the death of the equitable owner it was assigned to the trustee, widow of the deceased, it was held that such widow held the bond in trust for the estate, and, having the legal title, was the real party in interest in the undertaking sued on, and was entitled to maintain an action as the "real party in interest." Grant v. Heverin, 77 Cal. 263, 19 Pac. 493, 18 Pac. 647.

In Taafe v. Rosenthal, 7 Cal. 515, it was stated that in an attachment bond given by the plaintiff to the state the defendant, being the real party in interest, could, no doubt, sue upon the undertaking in his own name.

But in an attachment action judgment was rendered against the plaintiffs for costs. An action was afterwards brought upon the attachment bond for costs, including witness fees, but the complaint did not show that such fees had been paid, or that the witnesses had assigned their claim to the plaintiff. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover. Munzelheimer v. Byrne, 56 Ark. 116, 19 S. W. 320.

c. In replevin.

A plaintiff succeeding in attachment was held to be the real party in interest and a proper party plaintiff in an action on the bond given in a replevin action against the sheriff, where that action failed, although the bond in replevin was given to the sheriff personally. It was held that the statute providing that a trustee of an express trust may bring an action in his own name did not prevent the beneficiary in the bond from maintaining this action. Lomme v. Sweeney, 1 Mont. 584.

On a redelivery bond in a replevin suit, given to the sheriff and payable to the plaintiff, the party for whose benefit the undertaking was taken was held to be the real party in interest. Kimball v. Bleck, 24 Or. 59, 32 Pac. 766; McBeth v. Van Sickle, 6 Nev. 134.

A replevin bond in attachment, if made payable to the officer, was held not to be within Ala. Code, § 2890, providing that actions on contracts for the payment of money must be brought by the real party in interest; and the plaintiff could not sue upon such bond as the real party in interest, as that section was confined to actions on contracts, express or implied, for the payment of money. Agnew v. Leath, 63 Ala. 345.

Property attached by a sheriff was replevied, and the sheriff, who was successful in the replevin suit, brought an action against the officer who served the replevin writ for taking an insufficient bond whereby the debt was lost. It was held that the sheriff was the real party in interest, and could maintain the action. Shull v. Barton, 58 Neb. 741, 79 N. W. 732, Overruling 56 Neb. 716, 71 Am. St. Rep. 698, 77 N. W. 132.

A bank obtained a judgment, execution, and levy. The defendant gave a replevin bond to the sheriff, and judgment was rendered in replevin in his favor. Subsequently an order was made substituting the bank as defendant in the replevin action, and it brought a suit on the replevin bond. It was held that Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 50, authorizing the substitution of the plaintiff in execution to be made party defendant in a replevin action, did not mean after judgment, and that the real party in interest in the execution was the sheriff, and not the bank. Hicklin v. Nebraska City Nat. Bank, 8 Neb. 463, 1 N. W. 135. The court said: "It is true, also, that, if the defendant in error were the real party in interest in the execution under which the sheriff held the goods when they were replevied, it would have an interest—not a legal, but an equitable interest—which the 64 L. R. A. law would protect in a proper action. . . . Looking, however, to the petition, we fail to see that the defendant in error has any interest whatever in the subject of the action, but, on the contrary, we do discover that said Farber, as sheriff, the person to whom it was given, was, and for aught that is pleaded is still, the real party in interest."

d. Other bonds.

It is generally held that a party for whose benefit a bond is given is the party in interest to maintain an action thereon, although the payee of the bond may be an officer of the state.

It was held that the owner of tobacco was the real party in interest, and could maintain an action on a warehouse bond executed for his benefit, running to the commonwealth, although the bond was informal as to statutory requirements. Lane v. Kasey, 1 Met. (Ky.) 410. The court said: "Under the former system of pleading, the action must have been brought in the name of the commonwealth, for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. But the Code of Practice has changed this rule of pleading by requiring every action to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. The plaintiff was the person injured and the real party in interest, and, therefore, had a right to bring the action on the bond in his own name."

And where an action was brought upon an injunction bond to recover counsel fees for obtaining the dissolution of the injunction, and the obligees named were designated as "mayor of the city of Washington" and "marshal of the city of Washington," it was held that the city of Washington was the real party in interest. Hyatt v. Washington, 20 Ind. App. 148, 50 N. E. 402.

And under N. Y. act 1871, chap. 103, § 19, making it the duty of the board of education to commence suit against the city treasurer to recover for funds diverted, it was held that the board of education was the real party in interest, and was entitled to sue upon the treasurer's and tax receiver's bond, although the bond on its face was payable to the city. Board of Education v. Quick, 99 N. Y. 138, 1 N. E. 533.

Where a statute in regard to an election contest required a bond, but failed to provide for an obligee, and the bond was taken, in which the contestee was named as obligee, it was held that the election inspectors were the real parties in interest, and should have a right to maintain the action precisely as if no obligee had been named or the obligation had run to the state. Moede v. Haines, 66 Minn. 419, 69 N. W. 216. In this case it was said that, "although it was error to name the contestee as obligee, the obligors, who presumably are responsible for the error, should not be allowed to escape responsibility on this ground alone."

A master commissioner collected rents under an order of the court. It was held that the owner of such rents, being the real party in interest, could bring an action for the same against the surety on the master's bond, although the bond was executed to the commonwealth. Tyler v. Exchange Bank, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 195.

A bond was given by the defendant in an action to prevent the appointment of a receiver, and ran to the state. A judgment was obtained in that action, and suit was brought on the bond by the plaintiff. It was held that he could maintain the action, as he was the real party in interest. Baker v. Bartol, 7 Cal. 551.

An assignee of a delivery bond given for property seized under an execution, which bond was not in accordance with the statute, but good as a common-law bond, was held to be a proper party plaintiff in an action thereon. Waterman v. Frank, 21 Mo. 108.

And the assignee of a penal bond conditioned to make the title to land when the purchase money was paid, was held to be the real party in interest, in an action on such bond. Utey v. Foy, 70 N. C. 303.

An action on a detinue bond in a justice's court was held to be properly brought in the name of the beneficiary, under Ala. Rev. Code, § 3204, providing that all actions founded on any contract, express or implied, brought before justices of the peace, must be brought in the name of the party really interested therein, whether he has the legal title or not. Levystein v. Marks, 56 Ala. 564. In this case the court said there was a substantial difference in the language of the two sections applying to the circuit court and to the justice's court. "While one limits the rule to contracts for the payment of money, the other embraces all actions founded on contract. The present suit is founded on a contract,—the bond of defendants, given when they sued out their writ in detinue. It results that the complaint first filed in the city court was right as to parties, and that court erred in sustaining the demurrer to it." The form of the bond was not given, but the court evidently held that the action need not be brought in the name of the obligee if he was not the party beneficially interested.

Where a bond was taken by a county treasurer from a bank payable to him as county treasurer to indemnify him for deposits, it was held that he was the real party in interest. Moulton v. McLean, 5 Colo. App. 454, 39 Pac. 78. In this case the court said: "There having been no question of the solvency of the treasurer and his sureties, no default, and the treasurer being liable over for the funds deposited with defendants, and the bond having been taken by the treasurer as one of indemnity, the fact that the money was that of the county, and upon its recovery by the treasurer must have been paid over to the county, did not change the status of the parties, invest the county with the title to the bond, nor divest the treasurer."

In an action in which the county was interested by reason of being the beneficiary in a bond, it has been held that the action should be brought in the name of the county.

A bond was given to a territory to prevent a sale of personal property for taxes, and the obligation was to pay to the tax collectors of G. county "when the same shall be payable as prescribed by law." It was held that the county was the proper party to prosecute an action on the same. Curry v. Gila County (Ariz.) 53 Pac. 4. The court said: "The complaint, and bond, which is a part of the complaint, clearly show that the bond was given for the benefit and use of the county in the exercise of its function of collecting taxes for 1895."

An official bond was given by a county treasurer, running to the territory by mistake. In an action thereon to recover for defalcation it was held that the county was the real and only party in interest, and was the proper party to institute the action. Jefferson County v. Lineberger, 3 Mont. 281, 35 Am. Rep. 462.

Where an action was brought in the name of the state, for the use and on relation of Hickory county, on a bond of a collector of state and county revenue, for defalcation of county-revenue funds in his hands, it was held that the state was a mere nominal party, and that the county sued in its own right and was the real party in interest and a proper and necessary party to recover the lost revenue funds belonging to the county, for which the bond was given as security, as well as to secure the state revenue. Dollarhide v. Parks, 92 Mo. 178, 5 S. W. 3.

And where a recognizance was taken in the name of the state it was held that an action could be properly brought thereon in the name of the county. Shelby County v. Simmonds, 33 Iowa, 345. In this case the court said: "The bond in this case was executed to the state, but the money forfeited thereon is to be paid into the county treasury, as a trust fund, for the benefit of the schools of the state. It clearly appears from the foregoing considerations that the county is the only party entitled to receive the money. There exists no party for whose benefit the money is held by the county, that may prosecute an action. Neither the people nor the different school organizations can prosecute the suit in their names. The county, therefore, is a proper party in whose name the action may be prosecuted."

An action was held to have been properly brought by the county on a bond for the hire of a convict made in the name of the county. Pike County v. Hanchey, 119 Ala. 36, 24 So. 751. In this case the court said: "The action was properly brought in the name of Pike county, not only because Pike county was the party really interested, and therefore the proper party plaintiff, under § 2594 of the Code of 1886, in the counts seeking a recovery for the payment of money, but by the terms of the contract Pike county is made the obligee or payee, and, therefore, entitled to maintain the action to recover damages for a breach of the agreement."

But in an action upon a county treasurer's bond, payable to the state of Ohio, to recover for a delinquency and for not paying over taxes collected for county, township, and school purposes, and money arising from the sale of school lands, it was held that the commissioners of the county could not maintain an action in their own names, as they were not the parties in interest. Hunter v. Mercer County, 10 Ohio St. 515.

It was further held that, under an act of Ohio, establishing a board of county commissioners, § 7, providing that a board of county commissioners shall be capable of suing in certain enumerated cases, but not providing for this kind of a case, no authority was conferred by this section to sue in this case. Ibid.

Where a surrogate made an order assigning bonds of an administratrix to a claimant having a decree against the administratrix, it was held that the claimant was the real and only party in interest to prosecute an action on the bond. Baggott v. Boulger, 2 Duer, 160. In this case the court said: "It is a useless proceeding to bring it in the name of 'the People on the relation of Edward Baggott.' . . . The common-law rule that an action on a bond must be brought in the name of the obligee, whoever may be the owner, is abrogated by the Code."

An action for a breach of a sheriff's bond payable to the county was held to be properly brought in the name of the individual damaged for a breach of official duty, and the county was not a necessary party plaintiff. Hollister v. Hubbard, 11 S. D. 461, 78 N. W. 949; Guernsey v. Tuthill, 12 S. D. 584, 82 N. W. 190.

See Hughes v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 11 Or. 437, 5 Pac. 206, supra, IV.; Skinner v. Bedell, 32 Ala. 44, supra, VIII.; People v. Slocum, 1 Idaho, 62, infra, XXXII.

XI. Judgments.

The general rule is that an assignee of a judgment is the real party in interest in actions based upon such judgments. This is not the rule in Alabama, as the Code section in regard to real party in interest is held not to apply to judgments.

So, where a decree in foreclosure for a deficiency was assigned by the complainant, it was held that the assignees might maintain an action in their own name on such decree to set aside fraudulent conveyances, and to enforce the same. Robinson v. Springfield Co. 21 Fla. 203.

And where the complaint alleged that a judgment had been obtained by the plaintiffs in an action, against the defendant, and that the plaintiffs in such action equitably sold and assigned in writing said judgment to this plaintiff, who now owned the same, and the judgment plaintiffs were made defendants in this case to set up what interest they had, it was held that the action was properly brought in the name of the real party in interest. Anthony v. Masters, 28 Ind. App. 239, 62 N. E. 505.

In Moore v. Nowell, 94 N. C. 285, it was held that judgments arise out of contracts, and that an assignee could maintain an action on them in his own name, under N. C. Code, § 177, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided; but this section shall not be deemed to authorize the assignment of a thing in action not arising out of contract.

Under Mont. Stat., requiring all suits to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, it was held that a scire facias to revive a judgment should be sued out in the name of the assignees of the judgment. Haupt v. Burton. 21 Mont. 572, 69 Am. St. Rep. 698, 55 Pac. 110.

A right of action against a garnishee, under Ohio Code Civ. Proc. § 218, giving such an action, was held to pass by an assignment of the judgment that was obtained in attachment, and the assignee was a proper party to maintain an action in his own name. Whitman v. Keith, 18 Ohio St. 134.

And where a claim was assigned after suit was brought, and a judgment was recovered thereon, it was held that a creditor's bill based upon that judgment must be brought in the name of the assignee. Wilson v. Kiesel, 9 Utah, 397, 35 Pac. 488.

Parties covenanted to indemnify the defendants in an action in New York, and to pay any judgment rendered. A judgment was rendered and taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, while pending there, a judgment was recovered in Wisconsin upon the New York judgment, and was paid by the indemnitors. 64 L. R. A.

The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of New York, and it was held that the covenantors were the real parties in interest in an application to vacate the Wisconsin judgment. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 38 Wis. 107.

It was also held in Mann v. Ætna Ins. Co. 38 Wis. 114, that the real defendant who paid such a judgment against a nominal defendant, which judgment was afterwards vacated, could recover in his own name the money so paid. The court said: "Though the plaintiffs were not named parties to the record, still they were the parties in interest who were really affected by the judgment, and stood in such relation to it that they were entitled to move to have it set aside."

In Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 481, which held that an assignee of a judgment might sue thereon, the court said: "The course of decisions in this state establishes this rule, viz., that the party holding the legal title of a note or instrument may sue on it, though he be an agent or trustee, and liable to account to another for the proceeds of the recovery; but he is open, in such case, to any defense which exists against the party beneficially interested. Farwell v. Tyler, 5 Iowa, 535; Fear v. Jones, 6 Iowa, 169; Sheldon v. Middleton, 10 Iowa, 17. Or, under the Revision, the party beneficially interested, though he may not have the legal title, may sue in his own name. Conyngham v. Smith, 16 Iowa, 471, construing Rev. § 2757. . . . Holding, as the plaintiff did, the legal title to the judgment by assignment, he could sue upon it; and his right to recover could not be defeated by simply showing that Cluff was the party beneficially interested in the action. This, alone, would not constitute a defense."

Farwell v. Tyler, 5 Iowa, 535, supra, cited by the court, held that the equitable owner of a note could not sue thereon; but this was overruled by many Iowa cases. See Conyngham v. Smith, 16 Iowa, 471, and Knadler v. Sharp, 36 Iowa, 232, supra, I.

But after an action had begun on promissory notes the plaintiff assigned the claim and all interest in the judgment to another party, and authorized the assignee to prosecute the suit in the plaintiff's name to final judgment, and to receipt for the same. The notes were not assigned. It was held that it was improper to substitute the assignee as a party, and that the action should be prosecuted by the original plaintiff. Allen v. Newbery, 8 Iowa, 65. In this case the court said: "Civil actions are to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. . . . After an action has been commenced, however, the plaintiff may sell and dispose of the judgment he may recover, without investing the person purchasing it with the legal interest to the thing in action. Under such an assignment, it would be improper to substitute the holder of it as plaintiff, with the power to prosecute in his own name. And taking the writing, made in this case, in all its parts, we are inclined to either give it this latter character, or to conclude that it was not the intention to invest Nichols with the legal title to the notes."

Where a promise was made on a valuable consideration to release a deficiency judgment benefiting several judgment creditors, it was held that one of them could maintain an action upon it. Holderman v. Tedford, 7 Kan. App. 657, 53 Pac. 887. The court does not cite the Code.

An assignee of a judgment holding, also, the power to collect the same was held not entitled to maintain an action to redeem from foreclosure sale, although he was not a party to the foreclosure proceedings. McKee v. Murphy, 2 Jones & S. 261. In this case the court said: "The defendants in this case defended upon the express ground, among others, that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and to be able, therefore, to maintain the action, it was necessary for the plaintiff either to prove himself to be the bona fide legal owner of the equity of redemption, or to bring himself within one of the exceptions authorized by the Code. He failed to do either."

An action on a judgment that had been assigned was held to be properly brought in the name of the original plaintiff, as a judgment was not a "contract, express or implied, for the payment of money," under Ala. Code, § 2890, providing that "actions on promissory notes, bonds, or other contracts, express or implied, for the payment of money, must be prosecuted in the name of the party really interested," etc. Wolfe v. Eberlein, 74 Ala. 99, 49 Am. Rep. 809; Maaterson v. Gibson, 56 Ala. 56; Johnson v. Martin, 54 Ala. 271.

Where, on appeal, a motion was made to substitute as party plaintiff an assignee of the judgment, and his counsel admitted that he had paid the judgment in fact for one of the defendants, the court said: "The latter, if anyone, should be made a party to the action as the 'party in interest.' Code, § 177. This, however, would present the singular spectacle of the same person being plaintiff and one of the defendants. The motion is denied." Field v. Wheeler, 120 N. C. 264, 26 S. E. 812.

See Cottle v. Cole, 20 Iowa, 485; Brown v. Powers, 53 App. Div. 251, 65 N. Y. Supp. 733; Searing v. Berry, 58 Iowa, 20, 11 N. W. 708, — supra, II.; Kelley v. Love, 35 Ind. 106; Thomas v. Irwin, 90 Ind. 557; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Pederson, 6 S. D. 140, 60 N. W. 747, — supra, III.; Bartholomew County v. Jameson, 86 Ind. 154; Root v. Morlarty, 39 Ind. 85, supra, V.; Smith v. Harrison, 33 Ala. 706, supra, VII.; Ashby v. Ashby, 39 La. Ann. 105, 1 So. 282, infra, XVI.; Daby v. Ericsson, 45 N. Y. 786, infra, XIX.; Greene v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 6 Hun, 128, infra, XXI.

XII. Corporations, stockholders, and associations.

A corporation locating a railroad on acquired land upon compliance with the act of Congress making the grant was held to be the real party in interest in an action to restrain other parties from obtaining title, and it was no defense that the other parties had a beneficial interest in the subject-matter of the suit. Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 359. The court said that stockholders might have a beneficial interest, but that they would not be proper parties to an action brought to enforce the strictly legal right, or to redress a wrong committed against the corporation.

And where the court found that the plaintiff had never held the notes sued on, excepting as treasurer and as mere custodian for an association, and that he was never authorized to sue upon said notes in his own name, but prosecuted a suit without the knowledge or direction of the association and without any right so to do, it was held that he was not the real party in interest, nor was he a trustee of an express trust. Mitchell v. St. Mary, 148 Ind. 111, 47 N. E. 224. In this case the facts disclosed that the plaintiff was a mere agent for the custody of the paper, not named in the paper as trustee, and acting in the suit with neither authority nor consent of the association; and that he was only connected with the transaction without any intention to make him trustee. This was an action to foreclose a note and mortgage. The notes had been indorsed in blank, and the mortgage had been assigned to the complainant.

But, where a stockholder in a building association brought suit to restrain the officers from closing out a series of shares before maturity and releasing securities in violation of its by-laws, it was held that he was the real party in interest notwithstanding the stock in the association was pledged as collateral for a loan. Fisher v. Patton, 134 Mo. 32, 33 S. W. 451, 34 S. W. 1006. In this case the court said: "Plaintiff has still such rights, as owner of the equity of redemption in the stock, as will authorize in equity his interposition to prevent its destruction or impairment by the wrongful acts of the company's board of directors."

Where a legacy was to be paid to a person who should act as treasurer of the American Protestant Society, and such society with two others was dissolved, and the members associated themselves under the name of the American Foreign Christian Union, it was held that the proper person to prosecute for this legacy was the treasurer of the American Protestant Society, or his successor (if there were such), the treasurer of the American Foreign Christian Union. DeWitt v. Chandler, 11 Abb. Pr. 459. The court said: "The suit shall be brought by the real party in interest, or by the party who occupied the position of a trustee of an express trust." In this case the action for the legacy was brought in the name of the president, instead of by the treasurer.

See Herman v. Hecht, 116 Cal. 553, 48 Pac. 611, supra, I.; Bell v. Tilden, 16 Hun, 346; Gillispie v. Ft. Wayne & S. R. Co. 12 Ind. 398; — supra, II.; Chin Kem You v. Ah Joan, 75 Cal. 127, 16 Pac. 705, infra, XX.; State ex rel. Gilbert v. Union Ins. Co. 7 S. D. 51, 63 N. W. 232, infra, XXXII.

XIII. Receivers.

In an action on a note by a receiver in chancery, it was held that he was the party really interested, where both parties to a note were enjoined from collecting, and the maker was enjoined from paying, and the receiver had been ordered to collect the same. Leonard v. Storrs, 31 Ala. 488.

In an action on an account, where the plaintiff's title was an assignment by receivers of a corporation, it was held that, if no consideration had been paid by the assignee, the defendant would be protected by making payment to him, and could not object to his title; that it constituted the plaintiff the real party in interest if he had a valid transfer as against the assignor, and held the legal title to the demand. Toplitz v. King Bridge Co. 20 Misc. 576, 46 N. Y. Supp. 418.

In Merchants' Loan & T. Co. v. Clair, 36 Hun, 362, where a receiver of a New Jersey corporation brought an action in New York in the name of the corporation under N. J. Stat. 1877, p. 187, authorizing such an action, it was held that such statute had no extraterritorial force, and that it should have been brought by the recelver, who alone would be recognized as the real party in interest.

XIV. Assignments for creditors.

After an assignment for creditors a discharge in bankruptcy was had, and it was held that the assignee for creditors could not maintain an action to foreclose a mortgage belonging to the assignor, as the discharge in bankruptcy caused the trusteeship of the assignee to cease, and the property remaining in the hands of the assignee belonged to the bankrupt. Seymour v. Street, 5 Neb. 85.

An action on a note was brought by an assignee for creditors, and the defense was that the marshal had levied upon the note, treating the assignment as void. This defense was held valid. Rohrer v. Turrill, 4 Minn. 407, Gil. 309.

XV. Husband and wife.

A husband and wife were lessees of real estate, but the buildings placed on it were the property of the wife, and she brought an action on a contract made between herself and husband and the city wherein the city obtained permission to excavate for a sewer on the property, and agreed to pay all damages. It was held that the wife was a proper party plaintiff, and the fact that the husband joined with her in executing the contract did not make him a necessary party, for he was not the real party in interest. Leeds v. Richmond, 102 Ind. 372, 1 N. E. 711. The court said: "The party who owns the property injured by the negligence of another is the one who should bring the action. It is true that the complaint avers that her husband had an interest in the property as the manager for their joint benefit, but, taking all the allegations of the complaint together, it must be held that the husband was simply the agent, and the wife the owner of the property injured."

And where plaintiff brought an action against an agent for fraud in buying land for plaintiff, on which land the agent had a secret option and converted the difference, it was held that plaintiff was the real party in interest notwithstanding that a letter from him to defendant indicated that the purchase was to be on account of his wife, but that the title should be in his name. The contract was made in the name of the plaintiff, and there was nothing else, except this letter, to indicate that he was not the real party in interest. Hewitt v. Young, 82 Iowa, 224, 47 N. E. 1084.

And where a widow continued her husband's business, and signed his name in her business transactions, and brought a suit in his name upon one of them, it was held that she was the real party in interest, but that she was as well known by the name in which the suit was brought as by that of her proper name, and could maintain the action in that name. Deets v. Smith, 6 Kan. App. 601, 51 Pac. 581.

But in Carpenter v. Tatro, 38 Wis. 297, a divorced woman married again, and her second husband furnished necessities to a child of her former husband, and assigned to her the claim. She brought an action thereon. It was held that a married woman having no separate estate could not acquire the claim from her husband, and, therefore, was not the party in interest, and could not maintain the action.

On notes payable to a husband or wife, it appears that the equitable owners thereof are the real parties in interest. See Grantham v. Payne, 77 Ala. 584; McDowell v. Bartlett, 14 Iowa, 157; Cassidy v. First Nat. Bank, 30 Minn. 86, 14 N. W. 863,—supra, II.; Sanford v. Sanford, 45 N. Y. 723, supra, VII.

See, further, Denver, St. P. & P. R. Co. v. Frame, 6 Colo. 382, infra, XXII.; Ray v. Honeycutt, 119 N. C. 510, 26 S. E. 127, infra, XXXIII.

XVI. Infants; parent and child.

A contract of employment of a minor was entered into by the employer, the step-father, and the minor, and provided that a part of the services was to be performed by the step-father, but the contract was ambiguous as to whom the wages should be paid. The step-father brought suit for breach of contract in not allowing him to perform the services, and he alleged that the previous payments had all been made to him. It was held that he was the proper party to maintain an action on such contract. Tilley v. Harrison, 91 Ala. 295, 8 So. 802. This was on the ground that the minor was not entitled to receive the money, and could give no acquittance therefor.

Under Minn. Gen. Stat. chap. 66, § 26, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and § 30, providing that, when an infant is plaintiff, he shall appear by his guardian, it was held that an action upon an insurance policy payable "to their children for their use, or to their guardian if under age," was properly brought in the name of the infants "by their guardian ad litem." Price v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 17 Minn. 497, 10 Am. Rep. 166, Gil. 473. The court said: "The children are the real parties in interest, and, therefore, the action is, under the statute (Gen. Stat. chap. 66, §§ 26, 30), well brought by them in their own names, they appearing by a guardian ad litem. Even if the general guardian be regarded as a trustee of an express trust, the statute authorizing such trustees to bring actions in their own names is not imperative, but permissive in its terms. Gen. Stat. chap. 60, § 28."

In an action by an assignee of a debt, an answer alleging that the assignor was a minor and could not assign, that the suit was solely for her benefit, and that she was made a defendant to give the court jurisdiction as to venue and with the intention of enabling her to testify, was held to show that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest. Lawrence v. Long, 18 Ind. 301.

But where a judgment was in favor of children, and they had all attained their majority, it was held that their mother, who had at one time been their tutrix, could not individually prosecute a suit on that judgment to have fraudulent conveyances of the debtor set aside. Ashby v. Ashby, 39 La. Ann. 105, 1 So. 282.

Where an action was brought for damages for killing plaintiff's cow it was held that plaintiff was the real party in interest, although the cow had been given to plaintiff for his son, Boss, the donor stating: "Take that blue calf as your own, and when Boss . . . comes twenty-one years old give him a cow as good as that one will make." Wood v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 20 Mo. App. 601. The court said: "Plainly it was a gift of the calf to the plaintiff, coupled with the request that the plaintiff would give to Boss, not the particular cow which this calf would make, but as good a cow, —that is, another cow."

See Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181 47 Am. Rep. 20, supra, IV.

XVII. Executors and administrators; wills.

An executor or administrator is the real party in interest in actions on choses in action belonging to the estate, or on contracts made by him for the benefit of the estate. It is held that he may sue individually on contracts for which he is personally responsible to the estate. But an administrator cannot maintain an action where the subject-matter involved relates to real estate belonging to the heirs.

An executrix sold on credit the property of the estate, and sued to recover the debt. It was held that she, as an individual, was the real party in interest in an action on the contract. Thompson v. Whitmarsh, 100 N. Y. 35, 2 N. E. 273. This was on the ground that the contract was made with her, and the promise to pay ran to her, and she was personally accountable for the assets which she had sold.

In an action by an executrix in her individual name to recover on a note payable to testator or bearer, where the defense was that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, but that the action should have been brought by her as executrix, judgment was rendered for plaintiff without opinion. Curtis v. Dean, 77 App. Div. 632, 79 N. Y. Supp. 1130. In this case the possession of a note payable to bearer evidently was prima facie evidence of ownership, and, in addition to that, the plaintiff claimed in her evidence that she was entitled to the note as distributee.

And where an administrator assigned all claims for an infringement of a patent, it was held that the assignee could maintain an action thereon in the Federal court. May v. Logan County, 30 Fed. 250.

In Niederhaus v. Heldt, 27 Ind. 480, an action was brought by a citizen and taxpayer to set aside a probate of a joint will, on the ground that neither the testator nor the testatrix had any heirs within the jurisdiction of the United States. This action was brought under Ind. act May 31, 1852 (2 Gavin & Hord, § 39, p. 559), providing that any person may contest the validity of any will, or resist the probate thereof, at any time within three years after the same has been filed for probate. It was held that the Code provision, requiring every action to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, applied also, and that, as plaintiff had no interest, he could not maintain the action. But an adverse suit to determine the right to mining profits was held to have been improperly brought by the administrator on the ground that the heirs, being the real parties in interest, could, alone, maintain such action. Keeler v. Trueman, 15 Colo. 143, 25 Pac. 311.

And where notes were taken by a sheriff individually under an order of sale, and he died, it was held that his administrator was not the real party in interest, and could not maintain an action on the notes. Pratt v. Carr, 46 Ind. 67.

Legatees have been held to be the real parties in interest in actions against the executor for conversion; and where there were neither debts nor an administrator, it was held that the legatees could maintain an action for waste; and 64 L. R. A.

a distributee receiving a note was held to be the proper party to sue thereon.

A wife, who was the sole legatee of her husband's will, was held to be the only party in interest, and she alone could complain of an unlawful conversion by the executor of the personality, and an heir could not maintain such action. State ex rel. Ruhlman v. Ruhlman, 111 Ind. 17, 11 N. E. 793.

So, a sole legatee and devisee was held to be a proper party to bring a suit for waste where there were no administrator and no debts, and the property was held by the testatrix, a wife, as her statutory separate estate. DeBardelaben v. Stoudenmire, 82 Ala. 574, 2 So. 488. This was on the ground that the complainant was the equitable owner.

In Carter v. Owens, 41 Ala. 217, it was held that distributee could maintain an action on a note payable to a testator, where it was shown that there were no debts due by the estate, and there was no administrator, and the note was given to the distributee as his share. This was under Ala. Code, § 2129, providing that actions on contracts for money should be brought by the real party in interest. The court said that, "under this section, the plaintiff may sue, although holding only an equitable title."

Executors of an assignee of a note and mortgage brought an action thereon, and it was claimed that the testator had given the same to his daughter, and that, therefore, the executors could not sue. It was held that the defendant had the statutory right to have the cause of action against him prosecuted by the real person in interest. But the rule was laid down that "where the plaintiff shows such a title as that a judgment upon it satisfied by defendant will protect him from future annoyance or loss, and where, as against the party suing, defendant can urge any defenses he could make against the real owner, then there is an end of the defendant's concern, and with it of his right to object; for, so far as he is interested, the action is being prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest;" and it was held that, by satisfying the present judgment, the defendant would be discharged from all liability to the alleged conflicting claimants, and that was all that he could ask. Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8.

But a sole legatee, who was executor also, but had not qualified, was held not to be a proper party to institute an action on a note payable to his testator, in the absence of a showing that there were no debts, or that the debts had all been paid. Wood v. Cosby, 76 Ala. 557.

See Kelley v. Love, 35 Ind. 106, supra, III.; Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 20; Smith v. Smith, 5 Bush, 625,—supra, IV.; Sanford v. Sanford, 45 N. Y. 723, supra, VIII.

XVIII. Landlord and tenant.

A lessee has been held to be the real party in interest in an action for damages to leasehold, where he was an assignee of the lessor, and where his leasehold interest was injured. In contracts by an agent of the lessor in the name of the agent either may sue, and an assignee of the lessor owning the claim may sue for rent.

A lessee, having also an assignment from the lessor of damages for obstruction of a street in front of the premises, was held to be a proper party to maintain an action therefor. Hall v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 1 Disney (Ohio) 58.

Under N. C. Code, § 1754, providing that crops shall be deemed and held to be vested in possession of the lessor, it was held that this was only for the lessor's protection; and, as against anyone except him, the tenant was entitled to the possession of the land while it was being cultivated, and could maintain an action in his own name for any injury thereto; and for this purpose he was the "real party in interest" within the spirit and meaning of the North Carolina Code. Thames v. Jones, 97 N. C. 121, 1 S. E. 692.

And a lessee of a hotel, having the right to a free and uninterrupted use of the easements, was held to be the party in interest in an action of trespass for a nuisance for obstruction of a right of way. Avery v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 26 N. Y. S. R. 279, 7 N. Y. Supp. 341.

In Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. King, 63 Ark. 251, 38 S. W. 13, it was held that the owner of land was not a proper party plaintiff to bring an action for damages to land in the possession of his tenant, where a railroad company had constructed a temporary fence cutting the tenant off from water. The court said that the right of action, "if there was any, was in the tenant, who, as we understand, was in possession when the wrong was done of which the appellee complains, and held continuous possession until after the institution of this suit." The court does not discuss the statutory requirement as to who must bring an action, but the case evidently was decided with the statute in view.

And in Tarpey v. Deseret Salt Co. 5 Utah, 205, 14 Pac. 338, which was an action for possession, brought by the lessee, it was held that the court improperly excluded a lease which established the plaintiff's right of possession, although such lease recited that actions for possession should be in the name of the lessor. In this case the court said: "It is nowhere otherwise provided that an action of this character could be instituted in the name of anyone not having the title to the possession. That title was not in the railroad company. It was alone in the appellant. The recital in the lease did not pertain to the issue as to the possession, but was a collateral matter, affecting only the appellant and the railroad company. It did not affect the respondent."

Where a lease not under seal was made, by which the lessor rented a farm "now owned by Catherine Whitney," and there was nothing to show that the lessor was principal or agent, it was held that the action was properly brought by the lessor, and that he was the real party in interest; as in such a case the action could be maintained either by the principal or agent, in either of their individual names. Manette v. Simpson, 39 N. Y. S. R. 617, 15 N. Y. Supp. 448.

The assignee of a claim for rent was held to be the proper party, and entitled to bring an action for its recovery, in his own name. Mills v. Murry, 1 Neb. 327.

See Walker v. Mauro, 18 Mo. 564, supra, V.; Schaefer v. Henkel, 75 N. Y. 378, infra, XX.; Weise v. Gerner, 42 Mo. 527, infra, XXIX.

XIX. Partnership.

A partner obtaining the interest of his copartner is held to be the real party in interest; and so is an assignee of a surviving partner. But it has been held that the assignment by one 64 L. R. A.

partner of his interest in a special partnership to a third party, without the knowledge of his copartner, would not prevent an action by the firm.

A partner who obtained from his copartner an assignment of an open account due the firm was held to be the real party in interest to sue on the same. Swails v. Coverdill, 17 Ind. 337.

So, where one partner assigned a firm claim to his copartner, it was held that the latter must sue thereon in his own name. Stuckey v. Fritsche, 77 Wis. 329, 46 N. W. 59. The court said: "We are not aware of any rule of law which prevents one partner from assigning to his copartner his interest in any particular debt due such partners; and, under our Code of Procedure, when such claim is so assigned the individual partner may, and in fact must, sue upon it in his own name."

And after the dissolution of a partnership and a purchase by one of the partnership property, the one who has become the exclusive owner of an account sued on was held to be the only party really interested in collecting the balance due. Walker v. Steel, 9 Colo. 388, 12 Pac. 423.

Where a judgment was owned by a partnership firm, and two of the members died, and the surviving partner assigned the judgment, which was a copartnership demand of the firm, it was held that the survivor had the right to assign. Daly v. Ericsson, 45 N. Y. 786. The court said: "The survivor of a firm is the real party in interest to a demand owned by or due to the firm. The debtor cannot, when sued by the survivor, object that the representatives of the deceased partner are not made parties with the survivor. . . . It is not material upon the question of the capacity of the surviving partner to maintain an action for the partnership demand, that the beneficial interest in the claim was by the arrangement between the copartners and the deceased, or that upon an accounting his representatives would be entitled to the proceeds."

In Christ v. Schell, 31 Fed. 550, it was held that causes of action accruing to one firm may be recovered upon by another firm which has succeeded to its rights.

An indorsee of a bill of exchange indorsed by one of the partners in his individual name was held to be the proper party plaintiff; but, as the first count in the complaint was upon an indorsement, and did not contain an allegation appropriate to recover upon the equitable title, it was held insufficient. Alabama Coal Min. Co. v. Brainard, 25 Ala. 476.

But where a partnership of two brought an action for damages for failure of the vendee to comply with the contract of sale, the fact that one of the firm, without the knowledge of his copartner, sold his interest in firm cattle to another party, was held not to make such third person a party in interest, or prevent a recovery in the name of the original firm. Filley v. Walker, 28 Neb. 506, 44 N. W. 737.

See Smith v. Westcott, 34 Fla. 430, 16 So. 332, supra, II.

XX. Principal and agent, and parties claiming title therefrom.

The principal has been held to be the real party in interest in actions brought by him against the agent. The same has been held in actions on contracts made by an agent, even when the principal was not disclosed, and in actions for real estate belonging to the principal, and where the contract was in the principal's name, and where the agent had no interest. An agent has been held to be the real party in interest on contracts made by him in his own name under seal, and where he had an interest or special property in the matter in controversy; and it has been held that he could sue in his own name where he contracted as principal.

A debtor placing notes in the hands of another on a special contract to collect the same and to pay certain creditors was held to be a proper party to maintain an action of assumpsit against the estate of his agent for failure to carry out the contract. Shotwell v. Gilkey, 31 Ala. 724.

A principal who sued in his own name upon a simple contract made in writing with his agent, of which the principal was the sole owner, was held to be the real party in interest. Erickson v. Compton, 6 How. Pr. 471.

And where a contract was made by an agent for the benefit of his principal, it was held that the principal could sue on the contract, even though the agent might also have the right to sue; and this was so held where the contract was made in the name of the agent, and the principal's name was not disclosed. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. v. Thatcher, 13 Kan. 564.

In an action on a written contract for trading in sewing machines, naming Bartran, "agent," as the obligee, it was held that the principal was the real party in interest to maintain an action on such contract. Weed Sewing Mach. Co. v. Wicks, 3 Dill. 261, Fed. Cas. No. 17,348. This conclusion was reached by applying the Missouri Code provision in regard to real parties in interest to suits in the Federal court.

In Ruiz v. Norton, 4 Cal. 355, 60 Am. Dec. 618, it was held that principals may sue in their own name on a contract in writing made and signed by their agent without disclosing the principals. In this case the court said: "Although the cases cited are conflicting, the best authority and soundest reasoning, I think, are in favor of the position that, in such cases, the principal may bring the action. But, in order to maintain it, he must show the agency, and the power of the agent to bind him, at the time of making the contract, else there would be no mutuality, and consequently no contract."

Where an agent assumed the ownership of property bought by him for two persons, and one of them assigned all of his interest to a third party, who brought suit to enforce the trust, it was held that he was the real party in interest. O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 435, 16 Pac. 266. The court said: "It is sufficient, under the Code, if he holds the legal title to the demand." But the court held that the other principals should have been made parties to the action.

And where the title to property was in the name of one person for the benefit of several owners, and he sold the property in his individual name, it was held that all the joint owners could sue upon the bill of sale, as it was for their joint benefit, and they were the real parties in interest. Silliman v. Tuttle, 45 Barb. 171.

Five persons contributed $5 each for a bet, and one of them deposited the whole amount with the stakeholder. It was held that the depositor could not maintain an action for any of the fund contributed by the others. Toney v. Snyder, 50 Iowa. 73. The court said: "This seems to have been the ruling in New York, in the absence of any statute requiring the action to be brought in the name of the real party in interest. Ruckman v. Pitcher, 20 N. Y. 9."

The action in New York was brought before the Code of Procedure, requiring actions to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, was adopted, and, although the case ran from 1844 to 1850, the court did not refer to the New York Code.

An agent appointed under parol authority to take care of real property was held to have no such interest as would authorize him to maintain an action in his own name to recover possession from the holder under a tax title. McHenry v. Painter, 58 Iowa, 365, 12 N. W. 338. In this case the court said that he could not recover as trustee, because, under the Code, § 1934, a trust must be executed the same as deeds or conveyances.

Where a Chinese pawnbroker claimed to have loaned money for the Hong Fook Tong Society, and the contract in Chinese was a memorandum showing that Ah Joan borrowed $500 from the Hong Fook Tong Society, it was held that the agent was not the real party in interest, and was not authorized to bring a suit in his own name, and that the cause of action, if any existed, was in favor of the Hong Fook Tong Society. Chin Kem You v. Ah Joan, 75 Cal. 124, 16 Pac. 705. In this case there was no showing made that the plaintiff had any personal interest in the money, or was a member of the Hong Fook Tong Society. It was further held that there was no showing made that plaintiff made the loan as trustee of an express trust.

In Sutton v. Mansfield, 47 Conn. 388, which was a bill in equity to set aside an award, it was held that an agent having no real interest in the controversy could not maintain the bill to set aside the award.

And, where an agent claimed that he was authorized in writing to procure insurance, and brought an action for a premium paid by him, it was held that, if the action was for premiums, the insurance company was the party in interest; and, if it was for money paid out by plaintiff personally, it was held that the payment was a voluntary one, and, as it had not been made until after the action was commenced, he could not recover in either event. Ross v. Rubin, 25 Misc. 479, 54 N. Y. Supp. 1036.

So where a party who sold goods for a merchant was to sell only for cash, and verbally agreed that on failure so to do he would be personally responsible, and a sale was made on credit and charged on the employer's books, it was held that the employer was the only person authorized to sue. Smock v. Brush, 62 Ind. 156, 176. In this case the court said (p. 159): "We think it was most clearly shown by the evidence that Owen, Pixley, & Co. were the parties, and only parties, entitled to sue in this action, and that, in legal contemplation, Brush, the plaintiff, had no interest whatever in the subject-matter in controversy. A merely verbal understanding that the plaintiff was to be personally responsible for the debt, if it could not be collected, was within the statute of frauds, and not binding on him, and did not, in any event, confer any ownership of the debt upon him."

A real-estate broker making a contract for the conveyance of property to him or his assignees was held not to be the real party in interest in an action for specific performance, where his sole interest was a commission of 5 per cent, and he demanded a deed conveying the property to the purchaser. Lawyer v. Post, 47 C. C. A. 491, 109 Fed. 512. In this case the court said: "Conceding Lawyer to be the party in interest, he does not appear to have made any demand on the defendants for the conveyance of any of the property to him. If he be not the real party in interest he cannot maintain the action."

And where a contract was made by an agent, who had no personal interest in the contract, it was held that the only parties in interest were the principals, and the action should have been prosecuted in their names. Rawlings v. Fuller, 31 Ind. 255.

But where an agent having parol authority to make a lease executed a lease under his own seal as party of the first part, and signed his own name as agent, it was held that the owners could not maintain an action thereon in their own name for rent, in the absence of proof showing that the lessees had knowledge of the owners' rights. Schaefer v. Henkel, 75 N. Y. 378. The court said: "One great object of this provision was, to enable an assignee of a chose in action to sue in his own name; and it would be placing a construction upon this provision which is, I think, unwarranted, to hold that a sealed instrument executed by parties belongs to another, without any transfer whatever by a party named therein. The parties whose signatures and seals are affixed to such an instrument, and who alone are named therein, are the real parties in interest, for they only are bound thereby. No right, therefore, exists in a stranger, as against one of them, until there is an assignment of the interest of such party."

In Fear v. Jones, 6 Iowa, 169, a bill of sale was executed by an agent for a threshing machine, and a note was given for the same. By mistake a machine of higher value was taken. The agent brought suit in his own name to recover the difference in the value, and it was held that, as the contract was made in his name, and the promise made to him, he was the party having the legal interest, and the proper plaintiff.

And where an agent sold an engine, furnished working material to set it up, and gave his personal guaranty for one year, it was held that he was the real party in interest in an action for the price, although the contract provided that the engine was to remain the property of the gas-engine company until paid for in full. Welsh v. Rheinhardt & Co. 21 Misc. 22, 46 N. Y. Supp. 866, Affirmed 20 Misc. 407, 45 N. Y. Supp. 1026. In this case the court said: "The real party in interest is the party having the sole right to enforce the contract, and the plaintiff is that party, the contract being, not simply for the sale of the engine for which plaintiff might have been regarded as acting merely as agent, but for labor and materials for which he contracted as principal, and for a collateral warranty upon which he alone is liable."

And where a factor brought an action against a wrongdoer for taking from the possession of a bailee property stored by the factor, it was held that the plaintiff was the real party in interest. Gorum v. Carey, 1 Abb. Pr. 64 L. R. A.

285. This was on the ground that he was to be accountable for the loss pursuant to an agreement, or on the ground that he was a party having a special property in the goods, and entitled to the possession.

So, a bailee holding goods for the purpose of sale was held to have such an interest in them that he could maintain an action for any injury or loss to the property resulting from the negligence of the defendant. Allen v. Barrett, 100 Iowa, 16, 69 N. W. 272.

In a suit on a contract by which defendant agreed to sell plaintiff's fruit, it was objected that plaintiff was not the real party in interest on the ground that the complaint showed that plaintiff was not the owner of the fruit under that contract, and that stockholders of plaintiff in their individual capacity owned the various crops with which plaintiff dealt, and that plaintiff was merely an agent. It was held that, notwithstanding this, plaintiff was the proper party. Tustin Fruit Asso. v. Earl Fruit Co. (Cal.) 53 Pac. 693. In this case the court said: "The defendant contracted directly with plaintiff as a principal, and in such a case the law allows the agent treated as a principal to sue in his own name on the contract, whether the fact of agency was or was not known to the other contracting party."

Parties wrongfully obtaining from an agent title to choses in action cannot maintain an action thereon.

So, where an obligee in a bond gave it to her son to deliver to a lawyer for collection, and the plaintiff bought it of her son and held it without indorsement, it was held that he could not maintain an action thereon. McMinn v. Freeman, 68 N. C. 341. In this case the court said: "The Code, however, requires the 'real party in interest to sue.' And, if the plaintiff could show that he had any interest in the bond, he could maintain the action without an indorsement of the bond to him."

And a purchaser of a note under an execution in garnishment against an agent, which note belonged to his principal and was converted by the agent to his own use, was held to have acquired no property in the note, and the purchaser was not the real party in interest in an action against the maker. McCormick v. Williams, 54 Iowa, 50, 6 N. W. 138. The court said: "As the plaintiff acquired no property in the note, he cannot maintain an action thereon; it can only be prosecuted by the real party in interest."

A telegram was sent by plaintiff's sister, whom he had left in charge of his house, the cost being prepaid out of his funds, and was directed to his father, at whose house he was on a visit. The telegram requested the father to tell the plaintiff to come home, that his daughter was ill. It was held that the plaintiff could maintain the action on the ground that his sister was his agent in sending the telegram, and also because he was a beneficial party on the face of the telegram, and was the party alone who would be injured. Sherrill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 109 N. C. 527, 14 S. E. 94.

Where a sender of a telegram discloses to the company that he is an agent, and that it is sent for his principal, the latter may bring an action in his own name for failure to deliver. Daugherty v. American Union Teleg. Co. 75 Ala. 168, 51 Am. Rep. 435. In this case it was contended that the plaintiff could not maintain an action. The court said: "The first three grounds of demurrer raise the same question, and deny the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action in his own name. We think this ground of demurrer was also improperly sustained. The point of this objection to the complaint is, that Renfro Brothers are shown to have made the contract with the telegraph company in their own name; and the contract not being for the payment of money, the suit should have been brought in their name. This point is certainly well taken, if the proper construction of the complaint is that which is contended for. Code 1876, § 2890; Johnson v. Martin, 54 Ala. 271; Masterson v. Gibson, 56 Ala. 56; Agnew v. Leath, 63 Ala. 345. It is certainly true that the message proposed to be sent, as copied in the complaint, is signed Renfro Brothers. But the message is not the contract declared on. The complaint avers, in substance, that the plaintiff made the contract through his agents, Renfro Brothers. The contract declared on we suppose was oral. It is not averred that it is in writing. If, in delivering and paying for the message to be forwarded, the Renfro Brothers disclosed the name of their principal, for whom they were acting, that constituted it plaintiff's contract, upon which he can, and should, sue in his own name. Such proof is admissible under the complaint as framed, and, if made, will sustain the averment. This ground of demurrer was not well taken." The effect of this decision is that, under Ala. Code, § 2890, providing that actions on contracts for the payment of money must be brought by the real party in interest, the contracting party must sue for the failure to send telegrams.

XXI. Insurance.

In actions upon insurance policies only a small proportion of the cases discuss the question as to who is the real party in interest, but treat the question, By whom must an action be brought? under the rule at common law. In the following cases the statutory provision was applied.

An insurance company has been held to be the real party in interest in actions for damages against the party causing the fire, where there was no one who could make any other claim against the defendant for causing such loss. But in such a case, where an interest remains in the assured, or other insurance companies have similar claims, the company paying the loss will not be held to be the party in interest.

An insurance company paid to the owner less than the value of his loss, and obtained an assignment of all his right to recover on account of said loss against the railroad company that caused the fire, reserving all rights in excess of the face of the policy. It was held that the insurance company could not maintain an action against the railroad company that caused the fire. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 3 Dill. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 96. In 64 L. R. A.

this case the court said: "The suit, though for the use of the insurer, must be in the name of the person whose property was destroyed. The wrongful act is single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability.

So where a loss by fire exceeded the whole amount of the insurance paid, it was held that an insurance company could not maintain an action against a third party for negligence in causing the fire, but that such action must be brought by the assured. Norwich Union F. Ins. Soc. v. Standard Oil Co. 8 C. C. A. 433, 19 U. S. App. 460, 59 Fed. 984. In this case the court said: "When the insurer pays the assured the full value of the property destroyed, the insurer may maintain an action in his own name against one responsible for its loss, because, by operation of law, the whole beneficial right to indemnity from the wrongdoer has been vested in the insurer. He is, therefore, the real and only party in interest, and, under the Code, the proper party to bring the suit. But, when the value of the property destroyed exceeds the insurance money paid, the beneficial right to indemnity from the wrongdoer remains in the assured, for the whole value of the property,—for the unpaid balance due to himself, as well as for the amount paid by the insurer, as to which last sum he is chargeable as a trustee."

But where an insurance company had paid the insured the full value of the property destroyed by fire, the insurance company was held to be the real party in interest to maintain an action against the railroad company for causing such fire. Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 41 Fed. 643.

And where an insured accepted payment from a railroad company that caused the fire, and gave it a release, reserving a claim for insurance, and the insurance company afterwards brought an action against the railroad company on the policy which it had paid, it was held that the action was properly brought in the name of the plaintiff, and that no other person had any right or interest in the claim. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Erie R. Co. 73 N. Y. 399, 29 Am. Rep. 171.

So an insurance company which had indemnified the owner in part for loss by fire from the railroad was held to be the proper party to maintain an action against the railroad company for the same where the railroad company had paid the remainder of the loss, and obtained a release from the owner. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Wabash R. Co. 74 Mo. App. 106. In this case the court said: "But it has been held, as contended by defendant, even in states providing that the action must be brought in the name of real party in interest, that, if the insurance placed on the property is less than its value, the suit must be in the name of the owner. Norwich Union F. Ins. Soc. v. Standard Oil Co. 8 C. C. A. 433, 19 U. S. App. 460, 59 Fed. 986; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 3 Dill. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 96, and cases cited. In the latter case it was said: 'The property destroyed exceeded in value the amount insured, and the rule of law has been long settled that the insurance company, on the payment of the loss, cannot sue the wrongdoer who occasioned it in its own name. The suit, though for the use of the insurer, must be in the name of the person whose property was destroyed. The wrongful act was single and indivisible, and gives rise to but one liability. If one insurer may sue, then, if there are a dozen, each may sue, and, if the aggregate amount of all the policies falls short of the actual loss, the owner could sue for the balance." We are, however, of the opinion, after full reflection on the point made, that it cannot apply to this case from the fact that here Burruss, the owner, released all his interest in the loss by his settlement with the defendant railroad company."

The beneficiary of a policy and his assignee are usually held to be the real parties in interest in an action against the insurance company.

The beneficiary of a policy of insurance running to nominal parties for the benefit of "whom it may concern" was held to be the party really interested, in Insurance Co. v. Forchelmer, 86 Ala. 541, 5 So. 870.

And where a fire-insurance policy was issued to one N., "loss, if any, payable to W. C. L. Co., as their interest may appear," it was held that the latter, being the beneficiary, was the proper party to maintain an action on the policy after loss. West Coast Lumber Co. v. State Invest. & Ins. Co. 98 Cal. 502, 83 Pac. 258. In this case the court said: "A receipt from Newkirk was not necessary to the security or discharge of defendant. A party entitled to maintain an action may, upon payment being made to him, give a valid discharge from the cause of action. Under our law an action may be maintained by the party in interest. The courts, with some exceptions, hold that the party to whom the loss is payable may sue. Cone v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 60 N. Y. 619; Chamberlain v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 249. It is sufficient to say, under this head, that decisions to like effect are to be found emanating from the courts of Missouri, New Jersey, Illinois, and many other states. Where the proceeds of the policy are to go in part to the assured and in part to others, the authorities are not uniform as to the proper plaintiff; the better opinion, however, is believed to be that all the beneficiaries may unite as plaintiffs in the action."

An order on an insurance company, given by the insured to a creditor after the loss, directing the company to pay such creditor the whole amount due under the policy, was held to constitute the person receiving such order an assignee, and entitled him to sue on the policy for the loss in his own name. Spratley v. Hartford Ins. Co. 1 Dill. 392, Fed. Cas. No. 13,256; Perry v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 25 Ala. 355.

A mortgagee entitled to the whole of the policy is held to be the real party in interest.

So, where an insurance policy on a vessel was made payable to a chattel mortgagee, it was held that he was the real party in interest, and the proper person to maintain an action on the policy after the loss. Roussel v. St. Nicholas Ins. Co. 9 Jones & S. 279.

But a mortgagee in fire insurance policies was held not entitled to maintain an action thereon, where the policies were taken out by the mortgagor in his own name, "the loss, if any, payable to J. F. (the mortgagee) to the extent of his mortgage interest." Fire Ins. Cos. v. Feirath, 77 Ala. 194, 54 Am. Rep. 58. In this case the policies did not provide that the entire sum was payable to the mortgagee, nor were they assigned to him. The court said: "They did not confer on Feirath a right to sue for a part, and on Clark the right to sue for the residue. That would have been to split one contract into two causes of action, which can only be done by agreement of debtor and creditor, having that object in view."

In Tennessee and Mississippi it seems that an action by the assured for the use of a creditor complies with the statute requiring an action to be brought by the real party in interest; but in an action on a judgment in such a case the courts of New York refuse to follow that view.

Under Tenn. Code, § 2795, providing that in all suits prosecuted in the name of one person for the benefit of another the person for whose benefit the suit is brought would be held to be the real plaintiff of record, it was held that the real party in interest was in court, where the debtor, in whose name the fire insurance policy was taken, brought an action for the use of his creditor on a policy payable to the creditor "as his interest may appear." Queen Ins. Co. v. Union Bank. & T. Co. 49 C. C. A. 555, 111 Fed. 697. In this case the court said: "The Tennessee Code provides (§ 2795): 'In all suits prosecuted in the name of one person for the use of another, the person for whose use the suit is brought will be held the real party of record.' Under this statute the real party in interest was in court, and, if appellant's contention be correct, was entitled to the sole recovery in the case. It is effectually barred from any further recovery on the cause of action sued upon, and, assuming that it might have brought the action alone, the plaintiff in error has not been prejudiced, and a judgment otherwise correct should not be disturbed for this reason."

And where an action was brought in Mississippi on an insurance policy, by a firm "for the use of E. A. Greene," and a judgment was obtained by the plaintiff in that action, no question was made in Mississippi as to the party plaintiff. In a subsequent suit in New York by E. A. Greene on that judgment, it was held that he was not the real party in interest under the Code. Greene v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 6 Hun, 128. In this case the court said: "The Code requires suits to be commenced and prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest; and that has been held to be the person having the title to the instrument on which the action is brought, even though the proceeds, when recovered by him, are to be principally paid over to another person ultimately entitled to receive them from him. Williams v. Brown, 2 Keyes, 486, 488; Allen v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 228, 231; Fulton v. Fulton, 48 Barb. 581. As these cases now appear, the action should have been brought in the name of the members of the firm of William R. Greene & Co. The plaintiff cannot maintain them without some further proof of title than that given upon the trials already had."

Notwithstanding a restriction in a policy making it payable to an agent only, it was held that the principal may recover thereon. A broker, not being authorized by the assured to act, procuring policies that are not accepted by the assured, cannot maintain an action against the insured for the premiums.

A policy of insurance was effected by an agent, and the policy was made out in the name of the agent as principal, and contained a clause, "the loss, if any, to be paid to the agent (naming him) only." It was held that the principal could maintain an action thereon, and that he was the real party in interest. Lane v. Columbus Ins. Co. 2 Code Rep. 65. In this case the court said: "This brings us to the second point: Whether, by the insertion of the word 'only,' the real party in interest is precluded from his action. It is alleged that the word was inserted for the protection of the broker or agent and to secure some claims he had. If that really was the object, it was an unnecessary precaution, for the broker would, without the insertion of that word, have had a right to hold the policy to secure any lien he might have thereon; but a third party having a lien was never understood to prevent the party in interest suing in his own name, and neither the agent, nor the insurer, had a right to make out a policy in a form which would prevent the party in interest from maintaining his action; and of this opinion is Mr. Duer in his work on insurance."

Where the insured repudiated a policy, and a broker brought an action to recover for insurance premiums paid by him, where he was not requested by the insured to pay such premiums, and the insurance company had not assigned the claim to him, it was held that the broker was not the party in interest, and could not maintain the action. DeGroot v. Clark, 51 App. Div. 606, 64 N. Y. Supp. 282.

See Price v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 17 Minn. 497, 10 Am. Rep. 166, 6 Ill. 473, supra, XVI.

XXII. Against carriers of goods.

Notwithstanding the statutory provision requiring actions to be brought by the real party in interest, nearly all the cases in regard to carriers seem to be determined upon common-law principles. The rules in such cases are varied, and have many exceptions, which this note is not intended to include; but reference is made to Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, Freight Carriers, § 147, for a discussion of the question, Who may sue for loss? In the following cases reference is made to the statutory provision.

A consignor of goods belonging to him and his wife was held to be the proper party to sue for the loss of the same. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Frame, 6 Colo. 382. The court said: "The appellee had a special property in the goods, and a beneficial interest in the recovery therefore, which gave him a right to sue in his own name the same as in actions of replevin for the possession, or in trover upon a conversion."

Where a railroad company agreed to furnish transportation at several places for the grain to be delivered to it, in pursuance of a contract made by the plaintiffs for the purchase of the same, to be paid for on delivery, and the grain was tendered to the railroad company but it failed and refused to receive it, it was held that plaintiffs were the real parties in interest, and could maintain an action for breach of a contract to receive, transport, and deliver grain. Cobb v. Illinois C. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 601. The court said: "It seems to us that it can hardly be questioned that the sixth count presents a cause of action entitling plaintiffs to recover. It alleges an undertaking on the part of defendant to transport property for, and on account of, plaintiffs, and for their benefit. It cannot be doubted that the duty of defendant to transport the oats was owing to plaintiffs, and the obligation so to do was to them. And it is 64 L. R. A.

very plain that any loss sustained by plaintiffs from defendant's failure to discharge this duty and obligation would constitute a cause of action in plaintiffs' favor."

But where an action was brought by an assignee of a shipper on a claim for conversion against a common carrier, it was held that an answer which put in issue the assignment, and pleaded that they were not the real parties in interest, gave the defendant the right to introduce evidence to that effect, the exclusion of which was held to be error. Nanson v. Jacob, 98 Mo. 331, 8 Am. St. Rep. 531, 6 S. W. 246. In this case the consignee received notice from the railroad company that the goods had arrived, and on his order a transfer company delivered the goods to him without notice that there was a draft attached to the bill of lading, which was unpaid.

The consignors of soap who sued the carrier for damages caused to the goods, having also sued the consignees for the price, were held to have no interest in a cause of action against the carrier, under La. Code Prac. art. 15, providing that an action can only be brought by one having a real and actual interest which he pursues; but as soon as that interest arises he may bring his action. Leberman v. New Orleans, F. & H. S. S. Co. 28 La. Ann. 412. This was on the ground that, if the consignees were liable to the consignors for the value of the goods, the consignees alone were entitled to a recovery against the carrier.

And where consignees of a car load of wheat screenings paid a draft drawn on them, and received a bill of lading to which the draft was attached, and subsequently purchased the grain consigned to them from the owner, it was held that they thus became the real parties in interest, and the fact that the screenings were destroyed prior to the absolute sale to plaintiffs did not affect this; and the consignees could maintain an action against the carrier where the wheat was destroyed before reaching the point of destination. Kirkpatrick v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 86 Mo. 341. The court said: "The property of Slaughter in the screenings still continued, and was the subject of transfer to plaintiffs, and they could maintain this action on the ground of the transfer, if upon no other."

See Merchants' Bank v. Union R. & Transp. Co. 69 N. Y. 373, supra, III.

XXIII. On collateral and pledge.

The general rule is that the pledgee cannot maintain an action on the collateral while the condition is not performed, and the pledgee of a collateral, where the condition has not been performed, is held to be the party in interest to maintain an action thereon. It is held that this rule applies, although the collateral was not indorsed to the pledgee. But it was held that the pledgee holding the legal title could maintain an action on the collateral with the consent of the pledgee.

An action upon a note by parties holding the same as collateral security was held to be properly brought in their name. Bibb v. Hall, 101 Ala. 79, 14 So. 98.

So where a note was indorsed and delivered to a trustee as collateral security for the payment of certain money, it was held that the payee of such note was not a proper party plaintiff to recover thereon, as he was not the party beneficially interested. Alabama Terminal &

Improv. Co. v. Knox, 115 Ala. 587, 21 So. 495. In this case the court said: "Upon these facts it seems hardly debatable that the plaintiff had no right to maintain the action. It was neither the legal, nor beneficial, owner of the note, entitled to receive payment thereof at the time this suit was instituted."

A note was transferred to secure a pre-existing indebtedness, and the holder before maturity, in the usual course of business, had it discounted. It was held that the party discounting it was the proper party to maintain an action thereon. Marine Bank v. Vall, 6 Bosw. 421. In this case the court said: "In determining the question of the plaintiff's right to recover, so far as that right depends upon the character of the indorsement alone, it must be borne in mind that there is no obstacle to a recovery under the Code created by the fact that a bill or note is not indorsed at all. An action since the Code must be brought in the name of the actual party in interest, even though the instrument sued on be not negotiable; yet, if it has been transferred and delivered to a party, either absolutely upon the sale of it, or as security, such party may sue upon it in his own name. Code, § 111."

Pledges of a mortgage were held to be the real parties in interest, and entitled to bring an action on the same in their own name, and recover the entire amount, in Morgan v. South Milwaukee Lake View Co. 97 Wis. 275, 72 N. W. 872.

A party holding an unindorsed note as collateral security was held to be the proper party to maintain an action thereon, in White v. Phelps, 14 Minn. 27, 100 Am. Dec. 190, Gil. 21, and Williams v. Norton, 3 Kan. 295.

In Palmer v. Mt. Sterling Nat. Bank, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 790, 18 S. W. 234, where the plaintiff brought an action upon a note, it was allowed to amend and set up that it held the same as collateral, making the administrator of the payee a coplaintiff.

Where the plaintiff, a bank, had delivered a note and mortgage, without indorsement, to a savings bank as a pledge, and afterwards, with the consent of the savings bank, presented its claim on said note and mortgage to administrators, and the same was allowed, and the pledgee afterwards commenced an action in its own name, with the consent of the pledgee, it was held that the delivery without indorsement did not constitute such a transfer as would deprive the pledgee of the right to sue on the note and mortgage in its own name. Consolidated Nat. Bank v. Hayes, 112 Cal. 75, 44 Pac. 469. The court said: "The rule is that where the plaintiff holds the legal title to the demand he is the real party in interest."

Where the assignee of notes assigned the same as collateral security to his assignor, it was held that, where the act for which he assigned them as security had not been performed, and where they were still held by the other party as collateral, the assignee was not the real party in interest to maintain an action against his assignor on the prior assignment. Felton v. Smith, 84 Ind. 485; Smith v. Felton, 85 Ind. 223.

So, an assignor was held to have no right of action upon contracts that had been assigned as collateral security to another. Reynolds v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 143 Ind. 579, 40 N. E. 410.

In an action by an assignee of a note, an answer alleging that the payee assigned the note to the plaintiff as collateral for a debt, that such debt had been paid, and that plaintiff had no other interest in the same, was held to be a good defense, and to show that plaintiff was not the real party in interest. Swift v. Ellsworth, 10 Ind. 205, 71 Am. Dec. 316.

See Fisher v. Patton, 134 Mo. 32, 33 S. W. 451, 34 S. W. 1096, supra, XII.; Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108, 51 Pac. 2, 542, supra, XXV.

XXIV. Chattel mortgages.

An assignee of a note secured by chattel mortgage was held to be the real party in interest, and could maintain an action of replevin thereon in his own name. Kingsland & F. Mfg. Co. v. Chrisman, 28 Mo. App. 308. The court said: "Certainly, where a court of equity would compel the depositary of the naked legal title to assign the instrument to the assignee, under our Code, he must be the real party in interest. And it does seem to me that the spirit and object of the statute will be best expressed and executed in allowing this plaintiff to proceed in his own name, immediately, to enforce his possessory right under the mortgage, rather than to compel him either to resort to the circumlocution of a bill in equity to compel an assignment of the legal title, or to bring replevin in the name of the mortgagee."

So, where a note was made payable to G., to secure which a chattel mortgage was executed, and the consideration consisted wholly of sums due from the mortgagor to a third party, and the note was taken at his instance, to whom it was indorsed by the payee without recourse, the assignee as the real party in interest was held to be the proper party to maintain an action in replevin as against the sheriff who had levied on the property. Coughran v. Sundback, 9 S. D. 483, 70 N. W. 644.

In Wyle v. Ohio River & C. R. Co. 48 S. C. 405, 26 S. E. 676, where a chattel mortgagee brought an action for the negligent killing of a cow, and the defense was that the plaintiffs were not the real parties in interest, it was held that upon a breach of the condition of a chattel mortgage the mortgagee became the legal owner of the property, and could bring an action for damages for injury thereto.

See Buddington v. Mastbrook, 17 Mo. App. 577, supra, 11.; Roussel v. St. Nicholas Ins. Co. 9 Jones & S. 279, supra, XXI.

XXV. Foreclosure.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, an assignee of the note and mortgage was held to be the real party in interest, and the proper party to bring the action. Lamson v. Falls, 6 Ind. 309.

And the same was held notwithstanding a subsequent assignment by the assignor recited that these notes were held by the first assignee and the bank as collateral security. Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108, 51 Pac. 2, 542. The court said that a recital in a subsequent assignment could not bind a previous assignee.

And where a decree of foreclosure was a nullity, it was held that on a second foreclosure the assignee and the holder of a sheriff's certificate of sale under the prior foreclosure was the real party in interest, and that she alone could maintain the second suit. Curtis v. Gooding, 99 Ind. 45.

And where an assignee of a note secured by mortgage had subsequently made a deed conveying to a stranger all the plaintiff's estate and interest in the real estate, but the assignee did not transfer the notes, it was held that this did not prevent him from maintaining an action to foreclose the mortgage. Swan v. Yaple, 35 Iowa, 248. In this case the court said: "The plaintiff, being the owner and holder of the notes, would, in case he had assigned the mortgage, remain the real party in interest, and his assignee would be a mere trustee, and an action to foreclose would be maintainable by him." "Him" apparently referred to the plaintiff.

See Hardin v. Helton, 50 Ind. 319, supra, II.; Caldwell v. Meshew, 44 Ark. 564, and Barthol v. Biakin, 34 Iowa, 452, supra, III.; Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 604, 10 S. E. 884, and Clutchison v. Myers, 52 Kan. 290, 34 Pac. 742, supra, IV.; Osborn v. McClelland, 43 Ohio St. 284, 1 N. E. 644, supra, VII.; Riblinson v. Springfield Co. 21 Fla. 203, supra, XI.; Mitchell v. St. Mary, 148 Ind. 111, 47 N. E. 224, supra, XII.; Fire Ins. Cos. v. Feirath, 77 Ala. 194, 54 Am. Rep. 58, and Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 48 Neb. 713, 67 N. W. 764, supra, XXI.; Morgan v. South Milwaukee Lake View Co. 97 Wis. 275, 72 N. W. 872, and Consolidated Nat. Bank v. Hayes, 112 Cal. 75, 44 Pac. 469, supra, XXIII.

XXVI. Relating to counties.

An action to recover money alleged to have been wrongfully taken from the treasury of the county was held to be properly brought in the name of the county, under Iowa Code, § 2343, providing that an action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and § 2544, providing that a party with whom a contract is made for the benefit of another and a trustee may sue in their own name. Polk County v. Sherman, 99 Iowa, 60, 68 N. W. 562. The court said: "This is not an action for the collection of taxes, but to recover money alleged to have been taken from the treasury of the county wrongfully. In collecting it the county, a body corporate, acted by its agent, the treasurer. When collected the money belonged to the county; or, if a part of it was from levies made for municipal corporations and other beneficiaries, that part was held in trust by the county for their benefit and use. It did not belong to the treasurer, and, if it was wrongfully paid out by him, the county may properly recover it."

Where a county appealed from a judgment against it setting aside certain taxes, part of which was for indebtedness of a town; and the county board authorized the town to employ an attorney,—it was held that the county was the real party in interest, and was liable to reimburse the town for expenditures. Eagle River v. Oneida County, 86 Wis. 266, 56 N. W. 644. The court said: "The first contention of the learned counsel for the appellant is that the county had no interest in the suits, but the town was the real party in interest. The town may have been incidentally interested in those two items of the taxes. All the taxes were sustained except those two items, and the plaintiffs in the action appealed also. It follows that the county had the main interest in the suits. But the county is the party to be sued in such a case, as the real party in interest, and the town could not be made a party." 44 L. R. A.

The duty of defending the action was on the county alone, and the county is liable for the costs in case of defeat."

And where township trustees and clerks, as a local board, paid a physician for smallpox services out of taxes collected, it was held that they could not maintain an action against the county to recover the money, as they were not the real parties in interest. Sanderson v. Cerro Gordo County, 80 Iowa, 89, 45 N. W. 560. The court said: "We know of no law giving the plaintiff the right to receive and hold the funds in question conceding the liability of the county for its payment."

XXVII. Taxes and taxpayers.

A taxpayer is held not to be the real party in interest in an action to restrain payment of claims; so, a bank is not the party to maintain an action to restrain the collection of a tax on stockholders. But a taxpayer was held to be the real party in interest in an action of damages for failure of a water company to comply with its contract with a city, whereby the plaintiff was specially damaged; and under local statutes a holder of a certificate for special assessment, or his assignees, are held to be the parties in interest.

A taxpayer was held not to be the real party in interest, and was not authorized to bring an action against supervisors for allowance and payment of illegal claims, in Hedges v. Dam, 72 Cal. 520, 14 Pac. 133. In this case the court said: "No reasons are set forth in the complaint why this action is prosecuted by and in the name of plaintiff, a taxpayer, instead of by the district attorney, in the name of and in behalf of the county. It is not alleged, even, that any demand was made by plaintiff, either for the money, or for the institution of an action for its recovery. The county is the real party in interest, and the district attorney is the proper person to prosecute actions in the name of the county."

And a bank was held not to be the proper party to maintain an action to restrain the collection of a tax assessed against the individual owners of stock, in Northwestern Loan & Bkg. Co. v. Muggill, 7 S. D. 527, 64 N. W. 1122, 8 S. D. 160, 65 N. W. 442.

Under Mo. act January 16, 1860, providing that a contractor for paving could proceed to collect the same by ordinary process of law in the name of the city to his use, it was held that an assignee of a certified tax bill was a proper party to maintain an action thereon as the assignment vested in him the whole equitable interest in the demand. St. Louis v. Rudolph, 36 Mo. 465. The court said: "He thus became the real party in interest, and we think he may maintain an action in the name of the city to his own use under the special act."

An assignee of a contractor to whom tax bills were issued was held to be the real party in interest, and he could prosecute an action under the city charter, providing that all state tax bills shall be a lien on the property charged, and may be collected of the owner of the land in the name of and by the contractor, as any other claim in any court of competent jurisdiction. Galbreath v. Newton, 45 Mo. App 312.

In Levy v. Cunningham, 56 Neb. 348, 76

N. W. 882, where an action was brought by an assignee of tax certificates to recover the redemption money, and the plaintiff failed to prove the assignment, it was held that the action was not brought by the real party in interest.

An action to recover a delinquent assessment upon swamp lands situated in a reclamation district was held to have been properly brought by the district, as it was the real party in interest. Reclamation Dist. No. 3 v. Parvin, 67 Cal. 501, 8 Pac. 43; Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 54, 4 Pac. 945.

In the latter case McKinstry, J., said: "It seems to be admitted that plaintiff is 'the real party in interest,' and the general rule is that an action must be brought in the name of the real party in interest. Code Civ. Proc. § 367." Both of the above cases cite People v. Haggin, 57 Cal. 579, to the effect that actions under the act of March 28, 1868, which was the act under which this proceeding was brought, were properly brought in the name of the people as plaintiff, the court saying in the Hagar Case: "It is true that it has been decided here that actions brought under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act of 1868 were properly brought in the name of the people. People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171; People v. Haggin, 57 Cal. 579; and further, that actions brought under and in pursuance of the provisions of the Political Code must be commenced in the name of the reclamation district. People v. Haggin, 57 Cal. 579." But in People v. Haggin, 57 Cal. 579, the action was brought in the name of the people to enforce the lien of an assessment upon certain lands alleged to have been made for their reclamation. The court said: "The law requires that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. Code Civ. Proc. § 367. . . . Who is the real party in interest here? In our opinion it is manifestly the reclamation district. The money, when collected by suit or paid by the persons assessed, is to go to the credit of the district, and to be paid out for the reclamation of the district. It is assessed, collected, and disbursed for the district,—a district which we hold as a corporation is competent to sue. . . . We are of opinion that the corporation—the reclamation district—was the real party in interest within the rulings of the cases above cited, and that the action should have been brought in the name of the district."

See Niederhaus v. Heldt, 27 Ind. 480, supra, XVII.; Eagle River v. Oneida County, 86 Wis. 266, 56 N. W. 644, supra, XXVI.

XXVIII. For possession of land; rents and profits.

A grantor having conveyed land that was in the adverse possession of another, it was held that an action to recover the land from the party thus in possession, in the name of the grantor in such conveyance, was properly brought, as he was the real party in interest. Steeple v. Downing, 60 Ind. 478. This was because, as against the party in possession, the deed of the grantee was inoperative and void.

So, an action to recover possession of land must be brought by the grantor where he has made a deed that is void, and he is held to be the real party in interest; and the grantee cannot maintain an action in the grantor's name without his consent. Lowber v. Kelly, 9 Bosw. 494.

In Hamilton v. Wright, 37 N. Y. 502, the court said: "When, therefore, the Code had, in § 111, provided that every action should be brought in the name of the real party in interest, a doubt arose whether an action to recover lands thus conveyed could be brought by anyone. If brought in the name of the grantee he could, as against the party in possession, show no title; for, as against such party, his deed was void. If brought in the name of the grantor, it might be shown that he was not the real party in interest, because, if he recover, his recovery would inure, not for his own benefit, but for the benefit of the grantee. The Code was, therefore, amended so as to exclude such conclusion, by adding to the section the provision that 'an action may be maintained, by a grantee of land, in the name of a grantor, when the grant or grants are void by reason of the actual possession of a person claiming under a title adverse to that of the grantor at the time of the delivery of the grant.' The purpose was, I think, to limit the operation of the section, as previously enacted,—not to create any new authority, as between the grantor and grantee, for the use of the name of the former by the latter. If, by reason of the giving of the deed, such authority was to be implied, very well; if not, I do not think the Code conferred it."

In Anson v. Townsend, 73 Cal. 415, 15 Pac. 49, it was held that the holder of the legal title to land, although a trustee for a third person, was the real party in interest, and could maintain an action in its own name to recover possession. In this case the point was made at the trial that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, but was suing for, and in the interest of, another, who had conveyed the property to him by deed.

In Dever v. Hagerty, 160 N. Y. 481, 62 N. E. 586, a grantor of land in the adverse possession of another made a deed to the party in adverse possession. Subsequently the grantor brought an action in ejectment for the benefit of the first grantee. It was held that, as the deed to the first grantee was void on account of adverse possession, the second grantee, being in possession, obtained a good title from his grantor which the grantor could not gainsay or deny. The court discusses N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1501, providing for actions in such cases in the name of the grantor, and says: "As has been intimated, we have inherited this form of procedure from the common law. It was based upon the theory that, under a deed which was void as against a person in adverse possession, the title remained in the grantor, while the grantee took nothing more than a right of entry which was merely a chose in action. As the assignee of a chose in action could not sue upon it at common law, the courts created this method of permitting the assignee to sue in the name of his assignor. As applied to actions in ejectment, it was simply allowing the grantee under a void deed to use his grantor's title for the purpose of getting possession of the land. With the adoption of the Code rule, requiring suits to be brought by the real party in interest, and permitting assignees of choses in action to sue in their own names, the common-law rule was abolished except as to action in ejectment, in which the rule still survives. Thus it is apparent that, if this action had been brought before the execution and delivery of the deed from the plaintiff to the defendant

Hagerty, the plaintiff's first grantee, Caulkins, could have rested upon the title of her grantor, the plaintiff, and could have recovered, unless the tax deed to the defendant Hagerty was regular and valid."

In an action of ejectment it was held that Ala. Code, § 2829, providing for a suit in the name of the party really interested in actions on contracts for the payment of money, did not apply. Dane v. Glennon, 72 Ala. 160.

After a recovery in ejectment a purchaser was held to be the proper party plaintiff to sue in his own name for the rents and profits which accrued pending the former action in ejectment. Limberg v. Higenbotham, 11 Colo. 156, 17 Pac. 481.

Under Ky. Civ. Code, § 30, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, it was held that an action for mesne profits must be prosecuted in the name of the lessors, and not in the name of John Doe. Masterson v. Hagan, 17 B. Mon. 325.

But in an action by an assignee of a claim for rent, issues, and profits, it was held that, if the plaintiff was without ownership or interest in the subject of the suit, he was not the real party in interest, and a judgment in defendant's favor would be affirmed in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing the evidence on this question. Henley v. Evans, 54 Neb. 187, 74 N. W. 578.

See Tarpey v. Deseret Salt Co. 5 Utah, 205, 14 Pac. 338, supra, XVIII.; McHenry v. Painter, 58 Iowa, 365, 12 N. W. 338, supra, XX.

XXIX. On covenants.

In an action of covenant the real party in interest is the party who is entitled to the proceeds of the judgment to be rendered in that action.

A lessee of a perpetual lease covenanted to pay rent to the lessor, his heirs and assigns. The lessee assigned his interest, and an action for rent was brought against him on the covenants of the lease by the assignee of the reversion. It was held that such assignee was the real party in interest, and was entitled to sue, in her own name, the original lessee, for accruing rent. Smith v. Harrison, 42 Ohio St. 180. It was further held that the covenant for rent with the lessor passed with the land, and, although not made with the present plaintiff, it was for her benefit.

And where an assignee of a reversion was also the assignee of the benefits of the covenants in a lease, it was held that he was the proper person to bring an action in his own name for a breach of such covenants, as he was the party beneficially interested. Masury v. Southworth, 9 Ohio St. 340. In this case the court said: "It has been decided by this court that the statute of 32 Henry VIII., chap. 34, is not in force in this state, and that an assignee of the reversion cannot maintain an action upon the covenants in the lease. But if the covenant be assignable in equity, so that an action might have been maintained in the name of the assignor, or relief obtained by a suit in equity, our Code of Civil Procedure operates upon the remedy, even more extensively than the statute of 32 Henry VIII., chap. 34. For, whether the covenant be collateral, or inhere in the land, if it be assigned the assignee not only may, but, as the party beneficially interested, must, sue in his own name."

conveyed to him for the benefit of another party, under covenants of seisin and against incumbrance and warranty that were broken at the time of the deed, and the party for whom the purchase was made obtained a conveyance from his agent, it was held that such party could maintain an action in his own name on the broken covenants as the real party in interest, although such covenants did not pass to him by the mere conveyance of land, and had not been in terms assigned to him. Hall v. Plaine, 14 Ohio St. 417.

A grantee who had conveyed the land to another party could not maintain an action for damages for the benefit of his grantee for a breach of the covenant contained in a deed executed to him. Sinker v. Floyd, 104 Ind. 291, 4 N. E. 10. This action was by a grantee for the use of his grantee. In this case the court said: "We are satisfied that under our Code an action for a breach of covenant must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and that the real party in interest is the person entitled to the money recovered as damages."

Where the lessee covenanted to make repairs and assigned his interest, and the assignee promised to fulfil all the covenants in the contract, and, the lessor having died, the first tenant brought an action to the use of the executors of the landlord against his assignee for failure to comply with the covenants in the lease, it was held that the action should have been brought in the name of the executors, joining such persons as had an interest, as they alone were to be considered as the real parties in interest, within the meaning of the statute, and the action should have been prosecuted in their names only. Welse v. Gerner, 42 Mo. 527. The court said, the lessee, having assigned his lease and transferred his entire term, "had no interest in the matter such as to authorize him to institute this suit."

See Knadler v. Sharp, 36 Iowa, 232, supra, I.; Ryall v. Prince, 82 Ala. 264, 2 So. 319, supra, III.; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 38 Wis. 107, supra, XI.

XXX. For conversion and trover.

An action for taking and converting personal property, where the defendant alleged that it was taken on execution in his favor by the sheriff as the property of the defendant in that execution, cannot be defeated by showing that the property did not belong to the plaintiff, where the plaintiff was in possession claiming to be the owner when it was converted, as such possession gave him sufficient interest to maintain an action against a stranger, or anyone, except the owner, who had the right of possession. Paddock v. Wing, 16 How. Pr. 547. In this case the court said: "The defendant claims that the Code (§ 111) has changed the law. By that section every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest except as otherwise provided in § 113. In my opinion the Code has not affected the question we are considering. The plaintiff was 'the real party in interest.' He had an interest in protecting his possession, assuming that the property was not his,—that is, that he was not the owner, but that it had been and was the property of Danforth."

After an attachment was levied the owner of the property sold the same to another party. It was held that his vendee was the real party in interest in an action against the sheriff for conversion. Kinsella v. Sharp, 47 Neb. 684, 66 N. W. 634. The court said that the question of consideration paid by the vendee would make no difference.

A pre-emptor had paid for land, and the presumption was that he had made final proof, and that the final certificate had been issued to him. It was held that the United States could not maintain an action of trover against a transferee for cutting timber. United States v. Saucier, 5 N. M. 569, 25 Pac. 791.

See Allen v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 228, supra, II.; State ex rel. Ruhlman v. Ruhlman, 111 Ind. 17, 11 N. E. 793, supra, XVII.

XXXI. For seduction.

An action for seduction was held to be properly brought by the woman as she was the real party in interest, as the real issues were as to whether she had been really seduced, the amount of damages the jury should award as compensation for the injury done her, and as punishment against the wrongdoer. Hood v. Sudderth, 111 N. C. 215, 16 S. E. 397. In this case the court said: "The plaintiff, being of age, is the real party in interest. She is the only one who now could maintain the action. The father certainly cannot."

But in Scarlett v. Norwood, 115 N. C. 284, 20 S. E. 459, it was held that a father, being entitled to the services of his minor daughter, was the real party in interest, and could maintain an action for loss of services and for seduction. In this case the court said: "Hood v. Sudderth, 111 N. C. 215, 16 S. E. 397, relied on by defendant, has no application. That case held that when the woman seduced is of age, there being no loss of services to the father, the only cause of action in such case is the tort,—the fraud and deceit causing injury to her person and good name. It held that the woman herself can in such case maintain the action, being the party injured. But here, the girl being a minor, the father was entitled to her services. It was incumbent upon him to pay the expenses attendant upon her illness, and the jury, upon common-law and immemorial precedent, might add punitive damages for the wrong done him in his affections and the destruction of his household. He is the party in interest, and can maintain the action under the Code, § 177, and, it has been ruled, could have the defendant held in arrest and bail."

XXXII. Mandamus and ex rel. proceedings.

The writ of mandamus was originally styled a prerogative writ issued on behalf of the Crown, and the pleading and practice originally attaching to such writ have more or less clung to the same in this country. It is usually stated in text-books that the relator must be the party interested; but as to whether or not, in the absence of statutory provisions, the relator can ignore the old common-law form, and bring an action directly in his own right and in his own name for mandamus, is a question that seems not to have been discussed in the text-books or in the large number of cases on mandamus. A few of the cases, however, discuss the question as to who is the party really interested, and are as follows:

The remedy of mandamus was invoked for the protection of a purely private right by the individual aggrieved. It was held that the proceedings might be conducted in the name of the actual party in interest. Stoddard v. Benton, 6 Colo. 508; Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irrig. Co. 9 Colo. 248, 11 Pac. 103.

And where the relator was the only person injured, it was held that mandamus should be brought in his name, and not in the name of the state. People ex rel. Livingston v. Pacheco, 29 Cal. 210.

So, under Kan. Code, § 26, providing that every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and § 689, providing that a writ of mandamus may issue on the information of the party beneficially interested, where an action of mandamus was brought in the name of the state on the relation of a railroad company to compel county commissioners to issue certain county bonds, it was held that the railroad company was the real party in interest, and the state had no interest in the result, and the action should be dismissed. State ex rel. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Jefferson County, 11 Kan. 68.

And on application for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel county commissioners to hold their offices at a place claimed to be the county seat, it was held that it should have been brought in the name of the relator, and not in the name of the state. State ex rel. Wells v. Marston, 6 Kan. 524. The court said: "Under said Code there is but one form of action, called a 'civil action.' § 10. 'The party complaining shall be known as the plaintiff, and the adverse party shall be known as the defendant.' § 11. 'Every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided,' etc. § 26. The statutes do not anywhere otherwise provide; that is, they do not anywhere provide that an action of mandamus may be prosecuted in the name of the state when prosecuted by a private individual. The party prosecuting in such an action is always called the 'plaintiff' in said Code, and never the relator."

But under Kan. Civ. Code, authorizing the issue of a writ of mandamus on the information of the party beneficially interested, it was held that a suit to compel the performance of a purely public duty must be prosecuted in the name of the state. A private citizen must show some specific interest peculiar to himself in order to obtain a writ of mandamus. Bobbett v. State, 10 Kan. 9. The court held that the plaintiff failed to show such an interest, and said: "Again, mandamus, like other proceedings under our Code, should be brought in the name of the party interested. State ex rel. Wells v. Marston, 6 Kan. 532. Where a public duty is neglected, the public, the community as a whole, is the party interested. . . . But the statute authorizes the issue of the writ 'on the information of the party beneficially interested.' Civil Code, § 689. This evidently refers to an interest peculiar and specific, and not one common and general. All citizens are in a certain sense interested in the proper discharge of their duties by public officers, but it is not such an interest as will enable each citizen to describe himself as 'the party beneficially interested.' The party beneficially interested in the discharge of a purely public duty is the public."

Where an action was brought in the name of the attorney general by a relator to cancel a patent, and the state had no direct interest in the subject-matter or the relief, it was held that the relator was the real party in interest, and that the attorney general could not withdraw the consent or control the suit. People ex rel. Rondel v. North San Francisco Homestead & R. R. Asso. 38 Cal. 564.

An action in the name of the state, by relator, was brought to quiet title, and to have canceled a deed executed by a nonresident corporation to another party. The complaint stated that the corporation was exercising franchises unlawfully. It was held that the relator was the real and only party in interest, and the name of the state as party plaintiff was not contemplated by any provision of the statute, and could not be used when the only object of the action was to enforce the private right of individuals. State ex rel. Glibert v. Union Invest. Co. 7 S. D. 51, 63 N. W. 232. In this case the court said: "Where it is claimed, in an action to vacate a charter or annul the existence of a corporation, that said corporation has exercised a franchise or privilege not conferred upon it by law, or has offended against or violated any constitutional provision or statutory requirement, the action must be in the name of the state alone as the real party in interest, and the offending corporation is the real and only proper party defendant. Code Civ. Proc. chap. 26."

In an action of trespass brought in the name of the state "who sues for the use and benefit of" A. for trespass on lands belonging to and being the property in fee simple of the state, a demurrer was filed on the ground that the real party in interest should sue. It was held that Iowa Code, § 1676, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, had reference in part to §§ 949 and 952, which make claims assignable by writing which before were not, so as to enable the assignee to sue in his own name. But this was held to be an action founded on a tort which was not assignable, and the action stood, in respect to this question, on the same grounds as one brought in like manner upon a contract not assigned in fact; and the demurrer to the petition was overruled. Isbell, J., dissenting, held that the party for whose use the action was brought was the real party in interest. State v. Butterworth, 2 Iowa, 158.

In People v. Slocum, 1 Idaho, 62, an action was brought by the People of the United States in the territory of Idaho upon the relation of the District Attorney of said judicial district, suing for the use of a county against the obligors on a treasurer's bond running to the People of the United States in the territory of Idaho. In determining the legal capacity of plaintiffs to maintain the action the court cited the Code, which provided that every action shall be brought in the name of the real party in interest, and said that the county could not sue upon the bond although it was entitled to the indemnity if recovered, and that the action was properly brought. This conclusion was on the ground that when a contract is made with one party in which another has a beneficial and resulting interest, the party with whom the contract is made has the right to recover; quoting a New York decision based upon the New York Code, that a "trustee of an express trust," or a "person in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another," may maintain an action. The court did not notice or cite the cases which hold that, notwithstanding the latter Code provisions, the beneficiary also may sue. The court further held that the allegation that it was for the use of the county might be rejected as surplusage, as an unnecessary averment, and yet not defeat the plaintiff's right to recover. The court said: "There are numerous decisions under the Code going to sustain the doctrine that, when a contract is made with one party in which another has a beneficial and resulting interest, the party with whom the contract was made has the right to recover, although he alleges the injury to be only to a stranger to the instrument or contract."

XXXIII. For use of another.

The antiquated practice of bringing an action in the name of the assignor for the use of the assignee is practically abolished by the Code provision requiring an action to be brought by the party really interested.

A suit brought by the original creditors for the use of the assignee was held to be improperly brought upon a due bill that was indorsed, directing the money to be paid to another party. It was held that the latter was the real party in interest, and that, after the assignment, there was no title in the assignors, legal or equitable. Brady v. Chandler, 31 Mo. 28.

And so it was held that an action was improperly brought by the assignor for the use of the assignee, in Hutchings v. Weems, 35 Mo. 285.

Where an action was brought by a widow against an administrator to reimburse her for funeral expenses of her husband, the court said: "We are not advised why the action is brought in the name of 'G. D. Ray & Son to the use of Mary E. Young,' but, even under the antiquated and obsolete system when that form was in use, Mary E. Young would have been the real party plaintiff; and now the rest is to be disregarded as mere surplusage, and she is the only plaintiff, being the real party in interest." Ray v. Honeycutt, 119 N. C. 510, 28 S. E. 127.

Where a bank brought an action for the use of its assignees to set aside certain conveyances of real estate on which complainants had mortgages, and to foreclose the same, it was held that in equity a party in interest should sue in his own name; and, as the bill should be amended, and as the charter of the bank had expired, it was recommended that the names of the persons for whose use the bank sued should be made parties complainant. Frye v. Bank of Illinois, 10 Ill. 332.

See Dollarhide v. Parks, 92 Mo. 178, 5 S. W. 3, supra, X. d; Queen Ins. Co. v. Union Bank & T. Co. 49 C. C. A. 555, 111 Fed. 697, and Greene v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 6 Hun, 128, supra, XXI.; Sinker v. Floyd, 104 Ind. 291, 4 N. E. 10, and Welse v. Gerner, 42 Mo. 527, supra, XXIX.; State v. Butterworth, 2 Iowa, 158, and People v. Slocum, 1 Idaho, 62, supra, XXXII.

XXXIV. Summary.

There is some conflict of authority as to whether an assignee for collection may maintain an action in his own name as the real party in interest, but the weight of authority now seems to be in favor of such an action. It is believed that the negotiable instrument law will produce the same result, as it is but an expression of the commercial law; and, whilst heretofore some states have held that the legal title holder of a note should be treated as the real party in interest, they have also held that the equitable owner of a note or chose in action should also be treated as the party in interest, applying both the rule of commercial law and the Code. On the other hand, some states hold that the equitable owner is the only party who may maintain an action. The difficulty lies in the fact that in many cases the Code is not cited, and the cases are determined under the commercial law when brought accordingly, and then, when the action is brought by an equitable owner, it is maintainable under the Code. Where the action is by the holder of the legal title some of the cases hold that he is within the statutory exception allowing an action to be brought by a trustee of an express trust, or party in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another. A great many cases do not notice this distinction. The difficulties arising from conflicting decisions will probably be settled by the negotiable instrument law allowing the legal holder of a note to maintain his action. In cases in regard to choses in action not notes or bills of exchange it is believed that the statutory provision will control, except in such states as have allowed actions by collecting agents in their own names, to whom the claim has been assigned for collection. There is very little written on this subject, and it seems but little effort has been made heretofore to analyze the cases. Some of the cases clarify the whole matter by allowing the holder of the legal title to sue on the ground that he is the trustee of an express trust and within the exception of the statute, and allow the equitable owner to sue as within the terms of the statute. Where an obligation is payable to two persons, and one assigns his interest, the remaining obligee and the assignee are the real parties in interest. In actions on bonds, unless the statute is restrictive and mandatory, it is a general rule that the party entitled to the damages for a breach of a bond is the party in interest. After a judgment has been assigned the assignee is the party to maintain an action thereon, except in Alabama. It seems that a bank holding paper may assign the same to its cashier, who may maintain an action thereon. This is on the theory that he holds the legal title as under the commercial law. On the other hand, some cases allow the bank, as the real party in interest, to maintain an action on paper assigned to its cashier. In matters affecting a strict legal right of a corporation a stockholder cannot maintain an action. On notes payable to a husband or wife the equitable owner may sue thereon. An executor or administrator is the real party in interest on choses in action beionging to the estate. Some cases hold that a distributee may sue on a chose in action given him for his share of the estate where there are no debts or personal representatives. A lessee may maintain an action for injuries to his leasehold interest, and the lessor or his agent may sue for rent in contracts payable to the lessor's agent. A partner acquiring the interest of his copartner in a firm account is the real party in interest. A principal is the party in interest in contracts made by his agent. An agent may also sue where the principal was not disclosed in the contract. The pledgee is the party to maintain an action on a collateral where the condition is not performed. A chattel mortgagee is the proper party plaintiff in an action of replevin, as he holds the legal title, and his assignee stands in the same right. In an action of covenant the real party in interest is the party entitled to the proceeds of the judgment. Either the party in possession having a special property, or the owner of the property, may maintain an action for injury to the same. In cases of seduction, in the absence of particular local statutes, the plaintiff must be the woman, if of age, or the father, if the woman is a minor. In mandamus proceedings most of the states cling to the old form of writ, and the action is by the people or state ex rel.; but this rule is changing, and in some cases it is held that the party injured, if the public interest is not affected, is the only party that can maintain the action. A large number of cases involving the question of principal and agent, common carriers, bailments, insurance, and partnership seem to have been disposed of on principles of common law, and without reference to the statutory provision existing, requiring an action to be brought by the real party in interest. The intention of the statute is to simplify matters of pleading and procedure, and to adopt the rule in equity requiring all actions to be brought by the equitable owner of the cause of action. Cases which do not refer to the statute are not intended to be included in this note, and should be examined by the pleader as construed by the courts of his state, as the rules are varied and the exceptions many. It is believed that the tendency of the courts, however, is to simplify all matters of pleading, and to adopt as a universal rule that the equitable owner is the real party in interest, with the exception, possibly, of the rule in commercial law allowing the holder of paper to sue, who also may sue as trustee of an express trust.

This note is not intended to include the various exceptional provisions in the several statutes, such as allowing actions by trustee of express trust, administrators, guardians, and officers, except so far as the question has incidentally arisen in cases under the statutory provisions requiring an action to be brought by the real party in interest. Any construction of the attachment laws of Minnesota which would have the effect of laying a burden upon interstate commerce would not only nullify the contract, but would be a burden upon and a regulation of commerce between the states, such as would fall within the inhibition of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

Cars of a railroad company are in the same position, and entitled to the same rights, and subject to the same liabilities as far as interstate commerce is concerned, as are articles of interstate commerce, and there is and can be no substantial difference between their situation and rights as far as this subject is concerned.

Merchandise becomes articles of interstate commerce only after they are committed to a common carrier for transportation out of the state.

Cars of railway companies may be seized and sold in the same manner as any other personal property at common law.

Central Trust Co. v. Moran, 56 Minn. 188, 29 L. R. A. 212, 57 N. W. 471.

Lovely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate a writ of attachment under which one of defendant's freight cars was seized in an action for an alleged delay in forwarding a consignment of strawberries shipped from a point on defendant's road in Missouri to be sent through successive railway carriers to Minneapolis. The complaint alleges a cause of action which, if established, would entitle plaintiff to recover for an alleged negligent delay in transmitting perishable goods to the consignee; but it is claimed by the moving party that the property levied upon, though owned by the defendant and within this state, was not subject to the processes of our courts.

The defendant company was a railway corporation of Missouri, had no line of road or office in this state, and did no business herein; its only property being the car in question, temporarily within our boundaries, to be returned as soon as its errand was fulfilled.

From the facts established on the hearing of the motion, it appears that an agreement existed between the defendant company and the intermediate subsequent common carriers, whereby the defendant, instead of unloading and transferring freight at the points of connection or at state lines, received the car in question to be hauled to the place of destination without breaking bulk or discharging its contents, under an implied agreement to return it as soon as practical, reloaded to some point on or near its line in Missouri; that the car in question was used by the carriers bringing it into this state and delivered to the Minnesota Transfer Company, an independent corporation here paying to the first carriers for the use of the same a per diem or mileage; that this method of receiving and returning cars facilitated traffic, and is claimed to be a substantial accommodation to the shipping public and a compliance with the system of freight transportation adopted universally throughout the United States.

Under this custom, it appears that the car in question had been used in an interstate shipment of goods therein from St. Louis to points in Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana, and at the time of the levy was awaiting reloading by the Minnesota Transfer Company in its yards with a return shipment to points in Missouri. While the car was in fact empty when seized it appears that there was no unreasonable or unnecessary delay in securing its return according to the regular course of business, and that the car was a part of the actual equipment of the foreign railway corporation to which it belonged.

Under our statute, although a cause of action may not have arisen in this state, jurisdiction of a foreign corporation can be acquired by our courts through service of summons on one of its officers or agents who may be found therein, providing it has property here; otherwise not. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5200. But, within the sensible intent of the statute, such property must be of a kind and value to justify the reasonable probability that the creditor can secure something from a sale thereof which may be applied to the debt on judgment; and we have already held that, while no precise rule is applicable to all cases, the mere fact that freight cars are in transit through the state would not constitute such property for the purposes of meeting the jurisdictional requirements. Strom v. Montana C. R. Co. 81 Minn. 346, 84 N. W. 46.

Again, it is in substance provided that, where a foreign corporation has property within the state, a creditor may acquire a lien thereon by attachment or garnishment, 64 L. R. A.

but only to the extent of the property at the time the jurisdiction acquired thereby attaches. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5211.

Strictly speaking, the freight car which was seized in this case was actually property owned by defendant corporation, and, under a technical reading of this statute, was subject to attachment or garnishment; but we do not think this conclusion absolutely follows in all cases. We have held that the property of nonresidents within the state, while strictly subject to garnishment,—as, for instance, in the case of a common carrier receiving goods consigned for transit to a place outside of the state,—is not amenable to such process. Stevenot v. Eastern R. Co. 61 Minn. 104, 28 L. R. A. 600, 63 N. W. 256; Baldwin v. Great Northern R. Co. 81 Minn. 247, 51 L. R. A. 640, 83 Am. St. Rep. 370, 83 N. W. 986.

From the cases above cited from this court, it would follow that we should not give such literal interpretation to our statutes in securing jurisdictional powers as would overcome by artifice the mere presence of property here which has practically been enforced under exceptional circumstances which required its presence temporarily to meet the necessities of commerce, traffic, public policy, or is made essential to secure benefits to our citizens, and whose presence is not intended to serve any other purpose.

Under the laws of this state common carriers doing business herein are required to establish joint through rates and transfer through car-load shipments to their destination without unloading. Laws 1887, chap. 10, § 2.

The Federal government has expressly required that the movement of railway cars shall not be stopped or delayed at the point where the lines of such railway companies cross the borders of states, or at the point where the carriers deliver the cars to the next connecting carriers; but that shipments shall go forward from the originating point to their destination in the cars in which they are first loaded. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5258 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3564).

Under the Interstate Commerce Act (so-called) it is provided, in terms: "That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, expressed or implied, to prevent, by change of time schedule, carriage in different cars, or by other means or devices, the carriage of freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination; and no break of bulk, stoppage, or interruption made by such common carrier shall prevent the carriage of freights from being treated as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such break, stoppage, or interruption was made in good faith for some necessary purpose, and without any intent to avoid or unnecessarily interrupt such continuous carriage, or to evade any of the provisions of this act." 24 Stat. at L. 382, chap. 104, § 7 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3159).

These well-known provisions of law are expressive of a universal condition that exists upon all the railway lines of this country, and, without giving them effect, and permitting the railway carriers from other states to come into our boundaries with goods which are shipped here and returned without being retarded or so treated that the carriers must protect themselves against litigation away from home, that they must transfer the contents of such cars to others in our state would be provocative of the greatest detriment to the business interest of our own citizens, and be violative of the terms and spirit of the enactments to which we have referred.

It follows that we cannot justify a construction of our attachment or garnishee statutes that would effectuate such a result, and, while it was a part of the contract between the nonresident corporation in this state and the connecting carriers that the freight cars should be loaded and within reasonable time returned, this custom was but a practical method of securing a compensation for bringing the car into and out of the state in the necessary effort for continuous and unbroken transit which is essential to the purpose of traffic and interstate commerce, hence, it should not be treated as property subject to attachment.

This subject has been thoroughly and exhaustively considered in two recent cases, and the reasoning therein within the lines above suggested meets our approval. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Chicago & M. L. S. R. Co. 1 Ill. App. 399-404; Wall v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 52 W. Va. 485, 94 Am. St. Rep. 948, 44 S. E. 294.

Had the car seized in this case been delayed longer than was necessary in the course of business to return it to the place from whence it came, or had it been diverted within the state to uses and purposes exceptional to its presence here under the demands of interstate commerce with the consent of the owning corporation, a different proposition would be presented; but practically it was engaged in a transit into and from the state upon such reasonable conditions as ought not to impose upon it such property conditions and characteristics as should subject it to seizure in coming into and returning from the state for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to litigants here who otherwise would be compelled to contest their causes of action in the tribunals where the property had its undoubted legal situs.

The order refusing to vacate the attachment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

Mayor, etc., of FROSTBURG et al., Appts.,
v.

Marx WINELAND.

(.....Md.....)

1. Equity may review the action of a municipal corporation in declaring ornamental trees adjoining the curb in the street in front of private property to be nuisances, and ordering their removal.
2. Trees which have been standing for forty years without impeding the travel on a public highway are not shown to be nuisances because they extend a few inches outside the curb on a proposed plan for the improvement of the street, where the curb can be so arranged as to carry water flowing in the gutter around them, so that it will not interfere with the flow of the water, or the improvement of the street in a workmanlike manner.

(January 12, 1904.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Allegany County enjoining them from removing trees from the street in front of plaintiff's property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles G. Watson, for appellants:

The mayor and councilmen are the judges of what obstructs and constitutes a nuisance of the public streets, and their action is not reviewable by the courts.

Private property which is not a nuisance per se by the general law of the land cannot be arbitrarily declared a nuisance and destroyed by municipalities under the small delegation of power to abate nuisances, in advance of some proceeding according to law, declaring the same a nuisance, in which the owner of the property has had an opportunity to participate and be heard.

Alberger v. Baltimore, 64 Md. 1, 20 Atl. 988; King v. Hamill, 97 Md. 103, 54 Atl. 625.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 5th day of November, 1902, the appellee filed a bill in the circuit court for Allegany county, in equity, against the appellants, for an injunction to restrain the mayor and councilmen of Frostburg from cutting down and removing two shade trees at the curb between the sidewalk and the street, and in front of the appellee's property, and within the corporate limits. The bill, in substance, charges that the destruction of the trees is wholly useless and without authority, and that it is not necessary to the proper grading, paving, curbing, or sewerage of the street. It is further alleged that the destruction of the trees, on account of their intrinsic value, their beauty and comfort as shade trees, and their enhancement of the value of said property, will be an irreparable loss, which could not be compensated for in any way by a suit for damages or by any proceeding at law; that said street, although a main business street of the town, is still not entirely devoted to business houses, but is also a most important and fashionable residence street of the town, and thickly occupied by persons living upon the same, from end to end: that said shade trees, so far from being a nuisance, are an ornament and benefit to said street and the people thereon, and their destruction would be a great harm to the citizens of the town, apart from the special harm that would be done to the plaintiff. The bill admits the right of the mayor and council to improve the streets, and to repave or to change the width of the sidewalks or the curbing, but charges that the plan adopted in this case is a wholly unnecessary, unreasonable, unjust, and arbitrary plan, and will result in the useless destruction of the plaintiff's property. A preliminary injunction was issued on the bill, with leave to dissolve after five days' notice to the plaintiff. On the 11th of November, 1902, the defendants filed an answer to the bill, denying that the trees are not an obstruction to the street, but charging that they are a great nuisance, and a serious obstruction to the public use of the street of the town. It admits the passing of an ordinance declaring the two trees to be a nuisance and an obstruction to the paving and curbing of the street, and instructing the street commissioners to remove them, but states the order was passed for the good of the public, and with a view to a proper discharge of their duty as the officers of the town, in having all serious obstructions that are likely to cause damage removed from the street. The answer further denies that the corporation has acted in an unreasonable and arbitrary manner, but insists that they have complete control over the streets and alleys, by and under their charter, with full power to remove all nuisances and obstructions, and to regrade and improve the streets of the town in any manner that, in their judgment, will be to the best interest of the town, and that their acts as a municipal corporation are not reviewable in this court. The case was heard on bill, answer, and proof, and from a decree passed on the 6th day of August, 1903, continuing and making perpetual the preliminary injunction, with certain modifications, this appeal has been taken.

The law has been settled in this state since the case of Alberger v. Baltimore, 64 Md. 7, 20 Atl. 988, that where the legislature confers the power on a municipality, in general terms, to provide by ordinance for paving or repaving the streets, the discretion exercised by the city council in regard to the propriety or necessity of the improvement provided by the ordinance cannot be controlled by the courts, except where the power is exceeded, or fraud is charged and shown to exist, or where there has been a manifest invasion of private rights. Judge Alvey, in delivering the opinion of the court, cites 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 94, where it is said that, where the law or charter confers upon the city council or local legislative power to determine upon the expediency or necessity of measures relating to the local government, their judgment upon matters thus committed to them, while acting within the scope of their authority, cannot be controlled by the courts. In such case the decision of the proper corporate officer is, in the absence of fraud, final and conclusive, unless they transcend their powers.

The first question, then, in the case, resolves itself to this: Was the summary proceeding of the appellants in declaring the two trees in front of the appellee's property to be a nuisance and an obstruction to the paving and curbing of the street, and directing them to be removed and destroyed, so far final as not to be reviewable by the courts? This question, we think, was in effect settled by this court in the recent cases of New Windsor v. Stocksedale, 95 Md. 215, 52 Atl. 596, and King v. Hamill, 97 Md. 103, 54 Atl. 625. In the latter case it is said that equity will not lend its aid to enforce by injunction the by-laws or ordinances of a municipal corporation, restraining an act, unless the act is shown to be a nuisance per se. And in the case of Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984, the Supreme Court held that the mere declaration by the city council that a certain structure was an encroachment or obstruction did not make it so, nor could such declaration make it a nuisance unless it in fact had that character. It is a doctrine not to be tolerated in this country that a municipal corporation, without any general laws either of the city or of the state, within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance, can, by its mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself. This would place every house, every business, and all the property of the city at the uncontrolled will of the temporary local authorities. It is clear, we think, both upon reason and authority, that, when a municipality undertakes to destroy private property which is not a nuisance per se, it then transcends its powers, and its acts are reviewable by a court of equity. In Bills v. Belknap, 36 Iowa, 583, it is held that, if the removal of trees in a highway is not required for the free and proper use of the highway, no principle of law will permit it to be done against the will and the interest of the owner. In Clark v. Dasso, 34 Mich. 88, Judge Cooley says that it must be borne in mind that a tree in a highway is not, under our law, a nuisance per se, and only becomes such when it constitutes an actual injury or obstruction; when the tree is removed, the value of private property is destroyed. And in Everett v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 67, it is said: "A city council has no power to declare a thing a nuisance which is not such at common law, or has not been declared to be such by statutes. Trees growing in a street or highway do not constitute a nuisance unless they make an obstruction to travel." And the same principle is upheld in Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257, 69 Am. Dec. 536; Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 248, 8 Am. Rep. 58; Bliss v. Ball, 99 Mass. 597; Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524, 61 Am. Dec. 678.

As the best-adjudicated cases hold that shade trees in a highway or a street are not a nuisance per se, and only become so when they obstruct or interfere with the use of the highway or street, we come to the remaining question; and that is, Does the proof in the record show that the trees here in dispute amount to such an obstruction to the traveling public as to constitute a nuisance? The record contains a large amount of testimony as to these shade trees, and as to their situation and location in the street, and it would answer no good purpose to attempt to reconcile the conflict in this testimony, or to set it out in detail here. As stated by the judge in his opinion in the court below: "These trees have been standing more than forty years, and there is no evidence to show that in all that long time they have impeded travel or worked any great inconvenience, except in one instance, when a wagon came in collision with a projecting limb, which has been cut off. Nor does the evidence tend to establish the fact that the trees are or have been a nuisance. The defendants' whole objection to the trees seems to be based on their fear that they will be an obstruction to the grading and paving of the street, and that, if they remain, they will divert the flow of water from the curb, and flood the street and sidewalk, and cause the accumulation of débris on the street, and prevent the making of a pavement and curb in a workmanlike manner. The trees stand in the curb, a convenient and proper place; escaping the obstruction of footmen, on the one hand, and vehicles, on the other." According to the evidence, these trees stand on the outside of the curb, and on the edge of the gutter, and are about 1½ feet in diameter. One of the trees is about 6 inches outside of the curb, and the other from 8 to 10 inches. There is no evidence that the trees will obstruct the sidewalk, or that they present any material obstruction to travel on the street. Messrs. Townsend and Shriver, two civil engineers, testified that the curbstones could be so arranged as to carry the water around the trees, and when so fixed the trees would be no material obstruction on this account.

Upon the whole case, then, as disclosed by the record, we are of the opinion that the trees in question do not so obstruct the street as to constitute a nuisance.

The cases cited and relied upon by the appellants are clearly distinguishable in principle from this. They are based upon some statute, or rest upon dissimilar facts. The general doctrine, as stated by the appellee in his brief, cannot be denied,—that a city which is invested with power to regrade and repave a street can determine upon the expediency and necessity of so regrading, and upon the kind of pavement to be used, free from the interference of a court of equity; but if a municipality, in doing an act of that kind, arbitrarily or unnecessarily undertakes to destroy private property which is not a nuisance, it then undertakes to do an act beyond its delegated power, and those acts are within the corrective powers of a court of equity.

For the reasons given, the decree of the Circuit Court for Allegany County will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

WESTMINSTER WATER COMPANY, App't.,
c.
Mayor and Common Council of WESTMINSTER.

(.....Md.....)

1. A contract for a municipal water supply, which is void because perpetual and therefore in excess of the powers of the municipal corporation, cannot be construed to have been intended to exist merely for the lifetime of the water company, and to be valid because such term was not unreasonable.
2. A municipal corporation has no power to contract to levy 5 cents on each $100 of assessed property within its limits, in perpetuity, in payment for a water supply, under a statute authorizing it to levy annually a tax not exceeding that amount, "and out of the proceeds to pay the water company such sum as the mayor and common council may deem proper."
3. A municipal corporation has no power to contract to pay a water company for a water supply a sum annually, in perpetuity, equal to 5 cents on the $100 of the "present valuation of assessment," under a statute authorizing it to levy annually a tax not exceeding 5 cents on the $100 of assessed property.

4. Mandamus will not lie to compel the levy of a tax to pay the contract price for water furnished a municipal corporation, where the contract was ultra vires on the part of the municipality because for a period extending beyond its power to contract, or which fixes a basis for determining the compensation which may, by changing circumstances, exceed the powers of the municipality or become unreasonable.
5. The provisions of the Federal Constitution prohibiting the impairment of the obligation of a contract do not apply to contracts which are not valid

(January 20, 1904.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Circuit Court for Carroll County denying a writ of mandamus to compel the levying of a tax according to the provisions of a contract for a municipal water supply. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles E. Fink and Bernard Carter, for appellant.

Messrs. John K. Cowen, John Milton Reifsnider, James A. C. Bond, and Francis Neal Parke, for appellee:

Water was needed for fires, but, in order to secure public health and comfort, it was also needed to flush the gutters and the sewers, and to sprinkle, cool, and clean the streets. McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the circuit court for Carroll county, and was taken from an order refusing to grant a writ of mandamus which had been asked for by the appellant against the appellee. The facts which are necessary to be stated are as follows: By chapter 88, p. 136, of the Acts of the General Assembly of 1876, it was provided that "the mayor and common council of Westminster, may levy annually a tax not exceeding 5 cents on every $100 to be used and applied to the payment of water rents for the use of water for the public uses of said city,—that is to say, for use on the public streets of said city, and for the suppression of fires, to any incorporated company which may be organized for the introduction of a supply of water into said city; and the said mayor and common council may contract with any such incorporated, or to be incorporated, company for the introduction of water into the said city, to pay such company annually in such sum not exceeding the proceeds of said levy of 5 cents as aforesaid, as the said mayor and common council may deem proper: Provided that no such payment shall be made until water shall have been actually introduced into said city by such company; and Provided further that said levy of 5 cents as aforesaid shall not be made or used and applied for any other purposes whatsoever." On May 12, 1883, the mayor and council of Westminster passed an ordinance known as No. 62, wherein, amongst other things, it was provided that when mains of the size and length described in the ordinance "shall be laid through the streets and alleys of the city of Westminster with water therein suitable and sufficient for fire extinguishing, street sprinkling, and domestic purposes, by the Westminster Water Company, a body corporate of Carroll county, then and in that event the mayor and common council of Westminster shall annually levy and pay to the said water company the sum of 5 cents on each $100 of the assessed value of all property within the limits of the said city subject to the levy and taxation by said city, whatever the sum may be, less one third of the expenses of collecting said water taxes each year: Provided that the amount of the said tax to be paid said company in any one year shall not be lower than that produced by the valuation or assessment of the year 1883." On the faith of the foregoing and other terms of the ordinance, all of which were accepted by the water company, the latter expended large sums of money in erecting a plant, building reservoirs, laying mains, and erecting fire plugs in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance just named. The ordinance thus became the contract between the company and the city. On June 29, 1885, a supplemental agreement was entered into between the water company and the mayor and common council of Westminster, whereby some of the provisions of the contract made by ordinance No. 62 were modified, but the terms of that supplemental agreement need not be stated, further, than the one we shall now quote, namely: "Now therefore, for the purpose of rendering said ordinance clearer, and to avoid any future misunderstanding concerning it, this agreement is now entered into by the said contracting parties to bind them and their successors in office forever, as follows." There are further provisions, which we have said it was unnecessary to quote in this opinion. The tax was levied annually and paid to the water company under the provisions of ordinance No. 62 and the supplemental agreement just alluded to, until the year 1902, when the mayor and common council passed an ordinance (No. 145) repealing ordinance

No. 62, and declaring that "the contract in said ordinance with the Westminster Water Company is hereby repealed and terminated;" and in making the levy for the year 1902 the mayor and common council omitted to levy for the use of the Westminster Water Company the sum of 5 cents on each $100 of the assessed value of the property within the limits of the city, as previously levied under the ordinance No. 62 and the supplemental agreement referred to. Thereupon the pending petition for a mandamus requiring the mayor and council of Westminster to make the levy of 5 cents for the use of the Westminster Water Company was filed. Upon the coming in of the answer, an agreed statement of facts was entered into, and the case was heard. The application was denied upon the ground that the writ of mandamus could not be applied as an appropriate remedy for such wrongs as are alleged in the petition of the relator. The appeal now before us brings up that order for review.

It ought to be stated, though not as tending to influence the decision of this case, that the act of 1876 which gave the city of Westminster authority to contract for a supply of water for the purposes heretofore named was repealed by the act of 1882, p. 451, chap. 295, but the repealing act failed to take effect by reason of an omission to hold an election, upon the result of which its becoming operative depended. But Code Pub. Loc. Laws 1888, art. 7, §§ 238 to 247, incorporated the provisions of the act of 1882, and omitted the act of 1876. The result is that the act of 1876 is no longer in force. By the Local Code a totally different system for levying the water tax and contracting with a water company is provided. A specific sum, not exceeding $1,800, is required to be levied annually, and under certain conditions a portion of that sum must be paid back by the water company to the city.

It has been more than once held by this court, following the English doctrine, that the writ of mandamus is not one which is granted ex debito justitiæ. State ex rel. Baltimore, U. & P. B. R. Co. v. Latrobe, 81 Md. 222, 31 Atl. 788. There must be a clear and unequivocal legal right to be enforced, and there must not be any adequate remedy other than mandamus for its enforcement. Brown v. Bragunier, 79 Md. 234, 29 Atl. 7. If the right be doubtful, mandamus will not lie. If the right be clear, and there be some other adequate remedy, that remedy, and not mandamus, must be invoked. Obviously, then, the inquiry at the threshold of the case is, Is the right which the water company sets up and seeks to have enforced such a clear legal and unequivocal right as can be enforced by this process? Under the supplemental agreement it will be borne in mind that the contract of 1883 distinctly and unequivocally purports to bind both the municipality and the water company forever. The municipality is obligated to levy each year, in perpetuity, 5 cents on the $100 of the assessed value of the property within the city, and to pay the proceeds of the levy to the water company, in consideration for the latter's supplying from its works water for public uses. There are two difficulties in the path of the enforcement of that contract by mandamus: First, it has been, as it must be, conceded that no municipality, without express legislative sanction, has authority to bind itself to levy taxes for the payment of money for all time to come, when the taxes, if thus levied, are to be applied as are those we are dealing with. Secondly, the inequality and the want of mutuality in the provision, which, without regard to varying circumstances that might arise in the future, fixes 5 cents as the rate to be levied each year, would of itself stamp the contract as one not creating such a clear and unequivocal legal right in the relator as to warrant the issuing of a mandamus for its enforcement.

First, starting with the postulate that without previous legislative sanction a contract of the kind we are considering cannot be made in perpetuity, because it would be ultra vires, it is argued that the true interpretation of the agreement is not that it was to continue, or was designed to continue, forever, but that it was meant to last for forty years, and no longer, because that period was the limit of the corporate life of the water company; and it was vigorously and ably insisted that a contract of this character for forty years, made under the circumstances we have narrated, was neither illegal nor unreasonable. Now, it is true the books are full of cases where contracts for the furnishing of water by water companies to municipalities, and running for quite a number of years, have been before the courts repeatedly for consideration. Thus, in the case of New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674, 29 L. ed. 525, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, a contract for fifty years was sustained; in Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 9, 43 L. ed. 341, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77, a contract for twenty-five years was sustained; in Vicksburg Waterworks Co. v. Vicksburg, 185 U. S. 65, 46 L. ed. 808, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585, a contract for thirty years was held not unreasonable; and in Bennett Water Co. v. Millvale, 200 Pa. 613, 50 Atl. 155, a contract for twenty years was upheld. Columbus Water Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 15 L. R. A. 354, 28 Pac. 1097. But it will be noticed that in all of these, and similar cases which might be cited, there was a specific claim that a definite period of time had been distinctly agreed upon; and the question in some, though not in all, was whether that definite period was a reasonable one. Take, for illustration, New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674, 29 L. ed. 525, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. The contract there before the Supreme Court was one made between the state of Louisiana and the waterworks company, and was embodied in an act of the legislature. By the act it was provided that the water company shall have for fifty years from the passage of the act "the exclusive privilege of supplying the city of New Orleans and its inhabitants with water from the Mississippi river," etc. In spite of this the city council of New Orleans granted to Robert E. Rivers the privilege to lay a water pipe from the Mississippi river to the St. Charles Hotel for the purpose of supplying the hotel with water. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of the contract between the state and the water company, and struck down the ordinance because it impaired the obligation of that contract. The case of Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 9, 43 L. ed. 341, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77, was this: The act of the territory of Washington by which the city of Walla Walla was incorporated declared that the city should have power to provide a sufficient supply of water and to grant to any persons or associations the right to use the streets of the city for laying pipes to supply the inhabitants with water, but the grant was not to be for a longer period than twenty-five years. There was a proviso which enacted "that none of the rights or privileges herein granted shall be exclusive, nor prevent the council from granting the same rights to others." Pursuant to this authority, the city passed an ordinance granting to the water company the right to lay mains, introduce water, and furnish it to the city and its inhabitants for a period of twenty-five years; and the city stipulated that it would not erect, maintain, or become interested in any waterworks during the time for which the rights were granted to the water company. The ordinance was accepted by the company, and the water was introduced. Six years afterwards the city passed another ordinance to provide for the construction by the city of a system of waterworks. Thereupon the water company filed a bill against the city to restrain the latter from erecting waterworks of its own. The injunction was made perpetual, and the case was taken to the Supreme Court. In the course of its judgment that tribunal, speaking through Mr. Justice Brown, said: "As the contract in question was expressly limited to twenty-five years, and as no attempt was made to grant an exclusive privilege to the water company, the city seems to have acted within the strictest limitation of the charter. Atlantic City Waterworks Co. v. Atlantic City, 48 N. J. L. 378, 6 Atl. 24. Had the privilege granted been an exclusive one, the contract might be considered objectionable upon the ground that it created a monopoly without an express sanction of the legislature to that effect. . . . Without expressing an opinion upon the point involved in that case [the case of Brenham v. Brenham Water Co. 67 Tex. 542, 4 S. W. 143], we are content to say that an ordinance granting a right to a water company, for twenty-five years, to lay and maintain water pipes for the purpose of furnishing the inhabitants of a city with water, does not, in our opinion, create a monopoly, or prevent the granting of a similar franchise to another company." The decree making the injunction against the city perpetual was affirmed by the supreme court. In Bennett Water Co. v. Millvale, 200 Pa. 613, 50 Atl. 155, a similar situation was presented, though the form of procedure was not by bill in equity, but by action at law for the violation of a twenty-year contract made by the borough of Millvale with the water company. In Columbus Water Co. v. Columbus, 48 Kan. 99, 15 L. R. A. 354, 28 Pac. 1097, a very elaborate opinion was filed, and a large number of cases were examined and cited. The result reached may be summarized in this way: A city of the second class has the power to enter into a contract with private parties or a corporation for water to be furnished to it for fire protection by such party or corporation; and when a city of the second class has entered into such a contract, and a waterworks plant has been erected and maintained at great expense for a period of four years or more, and during that period the corporation owning the plant has furnished water in accordance with a contract entered into and recognized by the city, and the city has levied the proper tax and paid the hydrant rental for three years, and otherwise recognized the validity of such contract,—held, that the court will not hold the contract void, under the facts as stated in the petition, because the city did not possess the power to make a contract for the period of twenty-one years. While the city may be powerless to make a contract for the duration alleged, still the contract should be upheld for a reasonable time, when the circumstances and condition of the city as to population and assessed valuation are substantially the same, and no better facilities are offered upon more reasonable terms.

uation presented with which we are confronted here. The nearest approach to the case at bar is the one last above cited. If this contract had been for forty years, then the single question to be considered would be whether that was a reasonable time; but the contract, on its face, purports to run forever, and the argument is that, inasmuch as the duration of the water company's charter was limited to forty years, when the agreement was entered into, the contract, though professing to run forever, must be read as if it ran for forty years, and no longer; and then, reading it in that way, we are asked to say that the forty years would not be unreasonable. But the fallacy of the argument lies in this: That we must prescind from the contract the words that the parties to it have themselves deliberately incorporated therein, and we must then substitute for the words thus eliminated others that the contracting parties did not see fit to use, and obviously did not intend to use. That is to say, we must declare that the contract as made is one that is void because the parties were without power to enter into it; but, inasmuch as it is void on that ground, the court will by construction make a new one for them, though they did not see fit or intend to make it for themselves, so that when made by the court the new contract would be one that is valid, because when thus made it would run only for a reasonable time. By what authority can the court limit the duration of the contract to a term of forty years, when it was the declared intention of the parties to it that it should continue in force forever, as stated in and declared by the supplemental agreement, which was framed for the very purpose of making clear their object in this particular? Why say forty years, now that the charter of the water company has been indefinitely extended by the act of 1900, chap. 489, and obviously so extended to the end that the design of the contracting parties that the contract should remain operative for all time might be given effect? The extension of the charter of the water company is a circumstance not to be overlooked in determining what the parties understood to be the meaning of the original contract as to the period of time the agreement was to run. No case has been cited where the court has changed an ultra vires agreement into a valid undertaking, and we are not prepared to say that a court, upon an application for a mandamus, is at liberty, first, to declare void a contract under which the right to have a mandamus is asserted, and, secondly, in place of the void contract, to construct a valid one, in order that the writ may be issued. Until this can be legally done, the application as here presented must fail.

Much reliance was placed by the appellant on the New Jersey cases. The first of these is Atlantic City Waterworks Co. v. Atlantic City, 48 N. J. L. 378, 6 Atl. 24. That was an action of covenant by the water company against the city to recover the rent stipulated to be paid by the city. The city objected that the contract under which the rent was payable was void because it was a contract in perpetuity. It was held that the contract was not indefinite in duration, because it contained a clause permitting the city to terminate it whenever so minded, by purchasing the water company's plant. The next case was State, Read, Prosecutor, v. Atlantic City, 49 N. J. L. 559, 9 Atl. 759. That was a proceeding by certiorari to have the ordinance declared void. One of the grounds of invalidity, as alleged, was that the ordinance was ultra vires because it continued in force for more than one year. This contention was overruled on the authority of the previous case. The third case was Atlantic City Waterworks Co. v. Read, 50 N. J. L. 665, 15 Atl. 10. That was on error to the supreme court of New Jersey, and the ordinances of October and November, 1880, and the contract of the last-named month, were finally declared invalid. We do not perceive how either of these cases at all conflicts with the views we have thus far expressed. The situation here involved is quite different from that which existed in those cases. We think, therefore, we need discuss them no further.

Secondly, the contract calls for the levy of 5 cents on the assessable basis as that basis existed in 1883. Now, it requires no great stretch of imagination to see that, though the town may not expand geographically, and therefore though no additional water mains or fire plugs may be required, yet the taxable basis may be largely augmented, whereby the sum total of the 5-cent levy would be increased twofold. So that, without the expenditure of a single additional dollar by the water company for supplying more mains or plugs, it would, under the contract, receive twice as much money as originally contemplated. And so the opposite view may be taken. The taxable basis may greatly diminish from various causes, and yet the net amount produced by the rate of 5 cents on the basis as it existed in 1883 must be forever paid, whereby, in point of fact, a higher rate on the decreased basis would have to be levied. Obviously these situations are not within the contemplation of the act of 1876, which permitted the mayor and common council to make the contract with the water company, and yet both might occur if the contract is valid and binding. But, again, both as bearing on the question of ultra vires and the unreasonableness of the contract, it should be noted that the act of 1876 authorized the city of Westminster to levy annually a tax not exceeding 5 cents on the $100 of assessed property, and out of the proceeds to pay the water company such sum as the mayor and common council may deem proper. Under the act the city could have agreed to pay a certain, definite sum per annum, or a sliding scale could have been arranged to meet unforeseen contingencies, but in no event could the amount exceed the sum which a 5-cent levy would produce; but definiteness in the sum, or a standard by which definiteness could be ascertained, was clearly contemplated. We have said that events might happen which would cause a 5-cent rate to yield too much, and it was evidently not the purpose of the legislature to permit the city, by contracting to levy 5 cents absolutely and in all circumstances, to put it out of the power of future city authorities to levy less than that rate, if less than that rate would yield a sum sufficient to liquidate the amount which the city might stipulate to pay. By ordinance No. 62 all discretion is taken away from the municipality, and those who hereafter come into office will find their hands completely tied though they may be fully conscious that the sum realized by a 5-cent levy is grossly excessive and burdensome. In Gale v. Kalamazoo, 23 Mich. 344, 9 Am. Rep. 80, Judge Cooley used this emphatic and apposite language: "It is impossible to predicate reasonableness of any contract by which the governing authority abdicates any of its legislative powers, and precludes itself from meeting in the proper way the emergencies that may arise. Those powers are conferred in order to be exercised again and again, as may be found needful or politic; and those who hold them in trust today are vested with no discretion to circumscribe their limits or diminish their efficiency, but must transmit them unimpaired to their successors. This is one of the fundamental maxims of government, and it is impossible that free government, with restrictions for the protection of individual or municipal rights, could long exist without its recognition." It is difficult to perceive how ordinance No. 62 can stand unless the fundamental maxim of which Judge Cooley spoke be wholly disregarded. There is a distinction which must not be overlooked. If by the ordinance the city had contracted for a fixed period to pay a certain sum annually, or had provided a standard by which some definite sum could have been ascertained, there would have been no difficulty, because the legislative power of the city to levy a sufficient sum within the 5-cent rate would not have been interfered with. Now, however, the legislative power, if ordinance No. 62 is valid, has been completely parted with, and no subsequent common council can exercise any discretion in reference to it, even though it is obvious that a 5-cent levy is excessive. A contract to pay a definite sum for a specified period is binding on the successors of the municipal officials who made the contract. Such a contract is not entered into in virtue of the governmental or legislative functions of the city (Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank v. Arkansas City, 34 L. R. A. 518, 22 C. C. A. 171, 40 U. S. App. 257, 76 Fed. 271), whereas the power to levy a tax belongs to the class of legislative and governmental powers. In the one case successors may be bound; in the other, they cannot be. The provision of ordinance No. 62 requiring 5 cents to be levied forever is an attempt to bind succeeding common councils in the discharge of their legislative and governmental powers. But where did the city get authority to enact that in no event should the sum to be paid the company ever be less than that produced by the 5-cent rate on the basis of 1883? The words of the ordinance are as follows: "Provided that the net amount of said tax to be paid said company in any one year shall not be lower than that produced by the present valuation of assessment." By "the present valuation of assessment" is meant the valuation for the year 1883. Now, if from any cause the basis as it existed in 1883 should materially depreciate, it is obvious that a levy of more than 5 cents on each $100 would be necessary in order to produce a net amount equal to the amount which the 5-cent rate would yield on the basis of 1883. But the city has no power to bind itself to levy more than 5 cents. Consequently the contract which imposed the obligation contained in the proviso was manifestly ultra vires. Yet the relief sought is the enforcement of the entire contract, with this ultra vires feature included. For both of the reasons we have suggested, we are of opinion that the court below was clearly right in refusing the mandamus. There are many other cases that were relied on in argument that we have not deemed it necessary to specially allude to.

Finally, it is insisted that the water company's rights are protected by the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. Before, however, that clause can be invoked, there must be a contract, and some act by the state, or by its creature, a municipal corporation, by which the obligation of that contract is impaired. If there is no contract, there can be no impairment of the obligation of a contract. An ultra vires contract is no contract at all. It is obvious, therefore, inasmuch as the contract relied on by the water company is invalid because ultra vires, the prohibitive clause of the Federal Constitution cannot be invoked.

In view of the nature of the writ of mandamus, and in view of the ultra vires and unreasonable character of the contract which the water company seeks to enforce, we are obliged to affirm the order appealed from.

Order affirmed, with costs.

STATE of Maryland, Appt.,
v.

Louis HYMAN.

(.....Md.....)

1. The court cannot declare an act of the legislature which has a real and substantial relation to the police power void for unreasonableness.
2. The police power extends to prohibiting the use of a room in a tenement or dwelling house for the manufacture of men's clothing, except by the immediate members of the family living there, and then only under permit from a public official.
3. The court will take judicial notice that the manufacture of wearing apparel in improperly ventilated, unsanitary, and overcrowded apartments will be likely to promote the spread of, if it does not engender, disease.
4. Requiring a specified air space for every person employed in a manufacturing establishment is strictly and essentially a health regulation within the police power of the legislature.
5. Persons giving out materials to be manufactured into men's clothing may be required to keep a register of those to whom they are given, to aid the public authorities in their supervision of the places where the work is done.

If the legislature, in the interest of the public health, enacts a law, and thereby interferes with the personal rights of an individual,—destroys or impairs his liberty or property,—it then, under such circumstances, becomes the duty of the courts to review such legislation, and determine whether it in reality relates to, and is appropriate to secure, the object in view, and, in such an examination, the court will look to the substance of the thing involved, and will not be controlled by mere forms.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the state of Maryland from the criminal court of Baltimore city. It is a case wherein Louis Hyman was indicted for a violation of Acts 1902, p. 121, chap. 101. The title of that act is in these words: "An Act to Add Four Additional Sections to Article 27 of the Code of Public General Laws, Title 'Crimes and Punishments,' Subtitle, 'Health—Workshops and Factories, Sweating System,' as the Same was Amended by Chapter 302, Acts of 1894, and Chapter 467, Acts of 1896; Such Four Additional Sections to be Known Respectively as Sections 1490a, 149ff, 149gg, and 149hh, and to Come in Immediately after Section 149d of the Article." The indictment contains five counts. The first count charges that the appellee, Hyman, unlawfully did use and cause to be used a certain room and apartment in a certain tenement and dwelling house by other than the immediate members of the family then living therein for the manufacture of coats, vests, trousers, etc., contrary to the provisions of the above-mentioned act of assembly. The second count charges that the appellee, Hyman, did unlawfully use a certain room and apartment in a certain tenement and dwelling house for the manufacture of coats, vests, trousers, etc., he, the said Hyman, not being then and there an immediate member of the family then living in said room and apartment, contrary to the form of the aforesaid act of assembly, etc. The third count alleges that the appellee, Hyman, being then and there a part of the family, unlawfully did use a certain room and apartment in a certain tenement and dwelling house for the manufacture of coats, vests, trousers, etc., not having first obtained a permit from the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics stating the number of persons allowed to be employed therein, contrary to the said statute. The fourth count charges that the appellee, Hyman, in a certain room and apartment in a certain rear building in the rear of a tenement and dwelling house unlawfully did work at and did hire and employ divers persons to work at making coats, vests, trousers, etc., without first obtaining a written permit from the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics stating the maximum number of persons allowed to be employed therein, contrary to the provisions of the statute, etc. And the fifth count charges that the appellee, Hyman, employing divers persons in a certain tenement and dwelling house to make and wholly and partially finish coats, vests, trousers, etc., failed to keep a register of the names and addresses of all persons to whom such work was given to be made, contrary to the form of the act of assembly, etc. To this indictment and to each count thereof, the appellee interposed a demurrer, and upon hearing the demurrer was sustained, the indictment was on motion quashed, and the traverser was discharged. Thereupon the state took this appeal.

The question which is thus presented is one, not only of importance, but of considerable interest, and, when reduced to its final analysis, it is whether the act under which the indictment was framed is a constitutional exercise of the legislative power of the general assembly. To determine that question it will be necessary to briefly summarize the provisions of that statute. It will be observed at the outset that the act is ostensibly one intended for the preservation and the protection of the public health and safety. It was incorporated in the Code under the subtitle "Health," and its provisions were designed to promote the public health and welfare. By § 149ee (§ 240), it is, in substance, provided: That no room or apartment in any tenement or dwelling house shall be used except by the immediate members of the family living therein, which shall be limited to husband and wife, their children, or the children of either, for the manufacture of coats, vests, trousers, etc. That no room or apartment in any tenement or dwelling house shall be so used by any family or part of a family until a permit shall first have been obtained from the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics stating the maximum number of persons allowed to be employed therein. Such permit shall not be granted until an inspection of the premises has been made by the inspector or his assistant named by the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics, and such permit may be revoked by the said chief of the bureau of industrial statistics at any time the health of the community or those employed or living therein may require it. That no person, firm, or corporation shall work, or hire or employ any person to work, in a room or apartment in any building, rear building, or building in the rear of a tenement or dwelling house at making in whole or in part any of the articles of wearing apparel mentioned above, without first obtaining a written permit from the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics stating a maximum number of persons allowed to be employed therein. That the said permit shall be posted in a conspicuous place in the room, or one of the rooms, to which it relates. That every person, firm, or corporation contracting for the manufacture of any of the articles mentioned above, or giving out the incomplete materials from which they or any of them are to be made, or to be wholly or partially finished, or employing persons in any tenement or dwelling house or other building to make wholly or partially finish the articles above mentioned, shall keep a written register of the names and addresses of all persons to whom such work is given to be made, or with whom they may have contracted to do the same. By § 149ff (§ 241) it is provided that the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics or his assistant or any inspector shall have authority to enter any room, factory, or place where any goods are manufactured into wearing apparel for the purpose of inspection, and that the person, firm, or corporation owning or controlling or managing such places shall furnish access to, or information in regard to, such places to the said chief of the bureau of industrial statistics or his deputies at any and all reasonable times while work is being carried on. By § 149gg (§ 242) it is provided that the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics shall appoint two deputies and assistants, whose duties it shall be to make such inspection of the tenements and dwelling houses, factories, workshops, mills, and such other places as he may designate. By § 149hh (§ 243) it is declared that every person, firm, or corporation who shall in any manner violate the provisions of the preceding sections, and who shall refuse to give such information and access to the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics or his deputies, or who shall fail to secure such permit as provided, shall, upon conviction in any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined or imprisoned, or both, as in said section prescribed.

It is insisted by the appellee, and we presume that it was held by the court below, that these provisions of the statute were unconstitutional, and therefore void, because they were arbitrary and unreasonable. It is obvious that the statute was passed in furtherance of the protection of the health of the community. Its enactment was an exercise by the general assembly of the police power of the state. What is and what is not within the limits of the police power has been a source of prolific discussion both in the Federal and in the state courts. One of the legitimate and most important functions of civil government is acknowledged to be that of providing for the welfare of the people by making and enforcing laws to preserve and promote the public health, the public morals, and the public safety. Civil society cannot exist without such laws, and they are therefore justified by necessity and sanctioned by the right of self-preservation. The power to enact and enforce them is lodged by the people with the government of the state, qualified only by such conditions as to the manner of its exercise as are necessary to secure the individual citizen from unjust and arbitrary interference. With respect to its internal police, the authority of each of the states is supreme and exclusive. Whilst by the Federal Constitution the separate and independent states surrendered or transferred to the general government which they established such powers as were deemed to be necessary to enable it to provide for the common defense and to promote the general welfare of the people of the United States, the states themselves reserved complete and sovereign control over their own internal affairs. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has stated as an "impregnable position" that the states of the Union have the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within their respective territorial limits as any foreign nation has, where that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Federal Constitution; and that by virtue of this it is not only the right, but the bounden and solemn duty, of the state to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people, to provide for their general welfare by any and every act of legislation which may be deemed to be conducive to these ends; and that all these powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what may properly be called internal police, are not surrendered or restricted; and that, consequently, in relation to these the authority of a state is complete, unqualified, and exclusive; and, finally, that amongst these powers are inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating internal commerce of the state and to prevent the introduction or enforce the removal of prohibited articles of commerce. New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 9 L. ed. 648. "Every holder of property," said Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 84, "however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. . . . Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient." This power, said the Supreme Court in Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, legitimately exercised, can neither be limited by contract nor bartered away by legislation; or, as said by the same court in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 818, 25 L. ed. 1079, no legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people themselves cannot do it, much less their servants. Government is organized with the view of their preservation, and cannot divest itself of the power to provide for them. And so again, in New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Louisiana Light & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252, it was said the constitutional prohibition upon state laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the state to protect the public health and public morals nor the public safety, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contract. The exercise of the police power, being for the promotion of the public good, is superior to all considerations of private right or interest, and by virtue of it the state may lawfully impose upon the exercise of private rights such burdens and restraints as may be necessary and proper to secure the general health and safety. Parker & W., Public Health & Safety, § 12. The holder of property is bound to know that through agencies other than his own his property may become an occasion of injury to the public, and that in such event it is subject to reasonable regulation in the interest of the public. "Any other doctrine would strike at the root of all police regulations." Ibid. In the case of the State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L. R. A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771, this court had occasion to go into an examination of the police power of the state in reference to regulations respecting dairies, and we need not repeat what was there so recently said with reference to the extent of the police power of the commonwealth. That the power is broad, comprehensive, and far-reaching will not be questioned or gainsaid. In the very nature of the case it must be so. It is, as said by Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the License Cases, 5 How. 583, 12 L. ed. 256, "the power of sovereignty, the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion." It is a power that necessarily belongs to the legislative department of the state government. It is for that co-ordinate branch to determine whether particular things or acts are or are not dangerous to the public health, the public safety, and the public morals; and when that branch of the government has spoken the subject must be considered as closed, unless the judicial department has a revisory jurisdiction; and that brings us to the question whether the courts have such a jurisdiction, and, if they have, what are its legitimate limits?

This inquiry presents the pivotal point of the case. It may be said in the language of the Supreme Court in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 625, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 297, "if, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution." Running through all the cases, both Federal and state, is the doctrine that, if the measure designed for, or purporting to concern, the protection or preservation of the public health, morals, or safety, is one which has a real and substantial relation to the police power, then, no matter how unreasonable nor how unwise the measure itself may be, it is not for the judicial tribunals to avoid or vacate it upon those grounds. Numerous illustrations of this principle are furnished in reported cases. "For it must now be considered as an established principle of law in this country that there are no limits whatever to the legislative powers of the states, except such as are prescribed in their own Constitutions or in that of the United States; consequently, that the courts, in the performance of their duty to confine the legislative department within the constitutional limits of its power, cannot nullify and avoid a law simply because it conflicts with the judicial notions of natural rights or morality or abstract justice." Parker & W., Public Health & Safety, § 8, and cases cited in note 2. We may also refer to Deems v. Baltimore, 80 Md. 173, 26 L. R. A. 541, 45 Am. St. Rep. 339, 30 Atl. 648, where an ordinance provided that if milk failed, when inspected by one of the local milk inspectors, to be of a certain quality, it should be summarily seized and forfeited; and this court held that the ordinance was a legitimate exercise of the police power, though it involved the destruction of property without judicial procedure. In Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 42 L. ed. 780, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, a statute of the state of Utah limiting hours of labor in mines was held valid as an exercise of the police power. In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, a statute requiring immediate payment of wages to discharged employees was held to be valid. In Detroit, Ft. W. & B. I. R. Co. v. Osborn, 189 U. S. 383, 47 L. ed. 860, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, it was held that restrictions placed upon electrical cars, and not upon other vehicles used on the public streets, was a legitimate exercise of the police power. A striking illustration of what may be done, and validly done, under the police power, is furnished in the case of Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989. The Boston Beer Company was incorporated by the legislature of Massachusetts in 1828 for the purpose of manufacturing malt liquors in all their varieties. In 1869 the prohibitory liquor law of Massachusetts was passed. Under the last-named act a citation was issued requiring the Boston Beer Company to appear in the municipal court of Boston, and show cause why the liquors in its possession should not be forfeited. The beer company appeared, and the trial resulted in a judgment of forfeiture. An appeal was taken to the superior court, where judgment was again rendered for the commonwealth; whereupon the record was transmitted to the supreme judicial court of the state, which affirmed the action of the superior court, and remanded the case to the latter court, where final judgment was entered declaring the liquors forfeited. To that judgment a writ of error was prosecuted, and the proceedings thus reached the Supreme Court of the United States. In the last-named tribunal the judgment of the state court was affirmed. In the course of the opinion reported in Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989, it was said: "The plaintiff in error was incorporated 'for the purpose of manufacturing malt liquors in all their varieties,' it is true; and the right to manufacture, undoubtedly, as the plaintiff's counsel contends, included the incidental right to dispose of the liquors manufactured. But, although this right or capacity was thus granted in the most unqualified form, it cannot be construed as conferring any greater or more sacred right than any citizen had to manufacture malt liquor; nor as exempting the corporation from any control therein to which a citizen would be subject if the interests of the community should require it. If the public safety or the public morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic, the hand of the legislature cannot be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any incidental inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer. All rights are held subject to the police power of the state." Following the same current of decisions is the case of Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6. It was there said, in dealing with a law of Iowa which authorized the abating as a nuisance of a distillery used for the unlawful manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, that "a state has the right to prohibit or restrict the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within her limits; to prohibit all sale and traffic in them in said state; to inflict penalties for such manufacture and sale, and to provide regulations for the abatement as a common nuisance of the property used for such forbidden purposes; and that such legislation by a state is a clear exercise of her undisputed police power, which does not abridge the liberties or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor in any way contravene any provision of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." See also Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132, where a statute prohibiting the sale of cigarettes after they had been taken from the original packages was upheld as within the police power. See also 9 Rose's Notes (U. S.) 524, 525.

There is a class of cases which must be distinguished from those which hold that the unreasonableness of a police regulation adopted by the legislature furnishes no ground for the courts to strike it down. The distinction is plain and simple. The legislature being the sole depository of the law-making power, it is not for courts of justice to say that a given enactment passed in virtue of the police power, and having a direct relation to it, is void for unreasonableness, because, if courts undertook to exercise such an authority, they would, in effect, exert a veto on legislation. But whenever power has been delegated by the legislature to a municipal corporation to adopt and promulgate ordinances for the protection of the public health, morals, or safety, the reasonableness of the measures enacted by the municipality is a feature to which the courts look to see whether the measure is within the power granted; and they do this upon the assumption that the legislature did not intend to empower the municipality to enact unreasonable or oppressive ordinances. Thus, in Radecke's Case, 49 Md. 229, 33 Am. Rep. 239, where an ordinance of Baltimore city, which permitted the mayor to revoke any license previously granted to erect a steam engine, was under review, this court said, after alluding to quite a number of cases: "While we may not be willing to adopt and follow many of these cases, and while we hold that this power of control by the courts is one to be most cautiously exercised, we are yet of opinion there may be a case in which an ordinance passed under grants of power like those we have cited is so clearly unreasonable, so arbitrary, oppressive, or partial, as to raise the presumption that the legislature never intended to confer the power to pass it, and to justify the courts in interfering and setting it aside as a plain abuse of authority. In applying the doctrine of judicial control to this extent, we contravene no decisions in our own state, and impose no unnecessary restraints upon the action of municipal bodies." The ordinance was set aside as a plain abuse of the authority delegated by the legislature to the municipality. But when dealing with an act of assembly on this subject we have no such situation to confront us. If the act has a real and substantial relation to the police power, no inquiry as to its unreasonableness can arise, because it is the judgment of the lawmakers, and not of the courts, which must control; and if, in the judgment of the former, the thing be reasonable, all inquiry on that ground by the latter is foreclosed.

Tested by the principles hereinbefore announced, we find nothing in the act of 1902 which indicates that its design, its purpose, or its details have not a real and substantial relation to the police power. It may be conceded that some of these provisions, if harshly administered, may be or become oppressive; but it by no means follows that the law itself is therefore not a legitimate exercise of the police power. It is not to be assumed that the public functionary will act in an oppressive or unlawful manner. Discretion must be reposed somewhere. If an official should transcend the legitimate limits of the authority with which the statute clothes him, the injured party is not without redress. Laws are to be upheld, rather than stricken down. Every intendment must be made by the courts in favor of the constitutionality of a statute. Dorchester County v. Meekins, 50 Md. 39; Cooley, Const. Lim. 216. It is a cardinal rule that, where one construction of the statute would make it valid and another would make it unconstitutional, courts will follow the former, rather than the latter, interpretation, for the reason that it will not be presumed the legislature intended to pass an invalid act. Temnick v. Owings, 70 Md. 251, 16 Atl. 719; Gordon v. Baltimore, 5 Gill, 241.

Taking now in detail the five counts of the indictment, it is clear, we think, that the first count contains an allegation that the appellee was violating the health regulation prescribed by the statute. It alleges that he was using a certain tenement and dwelling house for the manufacture of coats, vests, and other garments by other than immediate members of his family. We suppose that it is a matter of which a court may take judicial notice that the manufacture of wearing apparel in improperly ventilated, unsanitary, and overcrowded apartments will likely promote the spread of, if it does not engender, disease, and it is obviously within the police power of the state to regulate the number of persons who may be employed in any tenement or other establishment where this manufacturing is carried on, so that the public health may be conserved. What has just been said is equally applicable to the second count, and we need not further discuss it. The third count has relation to a provision of the Code existing prior to the adoption of the act of 1902. By § 149c of article 27 of the Code (§ 238), of which the act of 1894 is an amendment, it was required that at least 400 cubic feet of clear space should be allowed in each room for each occupant in manufacturing establishments, and the act of 1902 required that a permit should be secured from the chief of the bureau of industrial statistics setting forth the number of persons allowed to be employed in each room. The number thus employed was, of course, regulated by the amount of air surface to which, under § 149c (§238), employees were entitled. The failure to procure such a permit is the charge alleged in the third count. It certainly requires no discussion to show that such a regulation is strictly and essentially a health regulation. The overcrowding of factories and the inhalation of impure air, where there is not sufficient surface afforded to each employee, are obviously calculated to produce or foster disease, and the manufacture of articles of wearing apparel in overcrowded rooms or apartments, under these conditions, is unquestionably liable to spread contamination. The fourth count of the indictment need not be further considered. What has been said in reference to the third is sufficient to support the fourth. The fifth count charges that the appellee did not keep a written register of the names and addresses of all persons to whom work was given to be made. If it is important, as we have said it was, that these overcrowded and unhealthy and unsanitary tenement houses should be subject to the inspection and control of some designated health officer, it goes without saying that the provision would be of little avail if the proprietor could give out the work to others without keeping a register of their names and addresses, because the health officer, without the aid of such register, would be unable to trace the localities where the work was being done. The whole scheme of the act appears to us to be in furtherance of the protection and preservation of the public health, and, whatever criticisms may be made upon the method of its enforcement, no convincing reason has been suggested to show that its terms have not a real and a substantial relation to the subject of the police power of the state.

The statute invades no private right of property, and does not confer upon any official either arbitrary or unrestricted power. It certainly does not in terms expressly do either. It has no relation to homes where manufacturing of the enumerated articles is not carried on. The whole tenor of the enactment distinctly indicates that its provisions are aimed at, and are intended to apply to, tenements and other buildings where the garments specified are manufactured for sale; and that it has no relation to homes or places where apparel not manufactured for sale may be made. Nor does the statute clothe the officers its provisions allude to with arbitrary power. As well might it be said that a police officer who is authorized to summarily seize property which could only be put to an illegal or criminal use acted arbitrarily in making such a seizure before a judicial adjudication condemned the thing seized. This court has emphatically said in Police Comrs. v. Wagner, 93 Md. 191, 52 L. R. A. 776, 86 Am. St. Rep. 423, 48 Atl. 456, "that the state has power to pass such laws as are necessary to protect the health, morals, or peace of society; and where the summary seizure, or even the destruction, of the offending thing is necessary for the public safety, may authorize that to be done; and such laws are not incompatible with those constitutional limitations which declare that no person shall be deprived of his property 'without due process of law.'" In the case just cited the alleged arbitrary seizure of a slot machine by the police authorities of Baltimore city was upheld as being within the legitimate exercise of the police power of the state. In the earlier case of Ford v. State, 85 Md. 465, 41 L. R. A. 551, 60 Am. St. Rep. 337, 37 Atl. 172, the traverser was indicted under act 1894, p. 435, chap. 310, for having in his possession lists or slips of lottery or policy drawings. That was a thing which the statute prohibited, even though the accused party did not know what the lists or slips were, or that they were prohibited articles. The statute was upheld as a legitimate exercise of the police power in the face of the contention that its provisions arbitrarily created an indictable offense, where there was not only a total absence of criminal intent, but a complete ignorance on the part of the traverser as to what the list or slips were. An officer who, under pretext of executing the sweat shop statute, would assume to exert an arbitrary or unwarrantable power, would be answerable for his misconduct, just as would be any other trespasser. Rightly interpreted, we find no imperfections in the statute assailed in this case.

Entertaining the views we have expressed, we must reverse the judgment appealed from, and award a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and new trial awarded.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

COLUMBIA IRONWORKS, Appt.,
v.

(127 Fed. 99.)

1. The question of the jurisdiction of a district court is not involved, so as to require the appeal to be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States rather than to the circuit court of appeals, in the determination that a corporation is principally engaged in such a business that it can be adjudged a bankrupt.
2. The allowance of an appeal within the time prescribed by law is sufficient to remove the case to the appellate court, although the appeal is not perfected by the filing of the bond and issuance of service of citation within that time.
3. The building, sale, and repairing of vessels employed in commerce is within the provisions of a statute permitting bankruptcy proceedings to be instituted against corporations engaged principally in manufacturing and mercantile pursuits.

Severens, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Certain creditors of the appellant, the Columbia Ironworks, a Michigan corporation, filed their petition in the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, setting forth that the appellant was a corporation engaged principally in manufacturing and mercantile pursuits, within the meaning of § 4, subsec. b, of the bankrupt act of July 1, 1898, chap. 541 (30 Stat. at L. 547, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3423), which had become insolvent, and within four months preceding the filing of the petition had committed several acts of bankruptcy,—among them, that it had made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors,—praying that it might be adjudged bankrupt. The Columbia Ironworks appeared, and answered that it was not a corporation engaged principally in manufacturing or mercantile pursuits, and denied that it had committed any other of the acts alleged in the petition, except in making the assignment for the benefit of its creditors. To this answer the petitioners filed a replication. A reference was ordered to take proofs, and, upon the filing of the report, an order was made adjudicating the corporation a bankrupt. Thereupon the corporation appealed to this court, assigning as error that the district court erred in holding that it had jurisdiction to hear the cause and determine that the corporation was bankrupt; and, further, that it erred in holding that the corporation was engaged principally in manufacturing or mercantile pursuits.

In this court a motion was made by the appellees to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that this court did not have jurisdiction thereof, but that the appeal should have been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, for the reason that the question of the jurisdiction of the district court was involved, in that its order adjudged that the Columbia Ironworks was a corporation engaged principally in manufacturing or mercantile pursuits, within the true intent and meaning of the bankrupt act, and upon the further ground that the appeal was not taken within ten days from the adjudication in bankruptcy. This court postponed the hearing of said motion to the hearing upon the merits. We think the motion to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction thereof should be disallowed, upon the authority of the case of First Nat. Bank v. Klug, 186 U. S. 202, 46 L. ed. 1127, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 899. There can be no question in respect of the jurisdiction of the district court over the subject-matter, and it seems quite clear that it also had jurisdiction to determine whether the corporation was principally engaged in such a business as that it could be adjudged a bankrupt. That question was one of the elements involved in its determination. It appears that the appeal was prayed and allowed within ten days, as prescribed by the act, but that the bond was not filed, nor the citation issued and served, until a few days after the expiration of the ten days. But the general rule is that, when an appeal is allowed within the time prescribed by law, it is sufficient for the purpose of removing the case, though it is necessary, in order to perfect the appeal, that a bond should be filed, and that a citation should be issued and served, where, as in this case, the appeal is not prayed in open court. The filing of the bond and the service of the citation are steps to be taken in perfecting the appeal, and, if these steps are taken before a motion to dismiss the appeal is made, the court will ordinarily decline to dismiss the appeal because of the delay in filing the bond and serving the citation. In the present case the delay was for a few days only, and we do not think the interests of the opposite party were to any appreciable extent impaired thereby. The motion to dismiss upon that ground is therefore denied.

With respect to the merits, it appears that the corporation was organized under a statute of Michigan providing for the incorporation of manufacturing companies (Comp. Laws 1897, chap. 188, §§ 7037-7073). And article 2 of its charter stated the purpose or purposes of the corporation to be as follows: "To construct and repair vessels of all kinds, carry on a general ship-building and ship-repairing business, construct and operate a marine dry dock in connection therewith, and also the business of steel structural work of all kinds."

By the record it appears that the incorporation was affected about November 5, 1901, and the corporation had at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy been engaged in business nearly two years. A considerable part of the first year was occupied in getting its plant in order for business. After that time its business had consisted of the building of two steel vessels, under contract,—one for the price of $95,000, and the other at a price not fixed. Two other contracts for the building of steel boats had been taken by the company, one of which had been begun, the boats to cost about $260,000 each; and the repairing of two vessels,—one to the extent of $4,200, and one to the extent of $2,100. The material for the construction and repair of vessels came to the plant largely in the unmanufactured and raw state, and it was converted from the crude and raw material by hand labor and machinery into the forms and shapes and designs requisite for the construction and repair of vessels. No doubt, the question is to be determined upon the consideration of what the corporation actually does, rather than what it is authorized by its charter to do. But the business of this corporation appears to be that which it was authorized to engage in, namely, the building and repairing of ships, and principally in building.

We think that upon these facts the finding that the corporation was principally engaged in manufacturing was justified. The principal objection urged to this conclusion is that the building and sale of ships is neither a manufacturing nor mercantile business, and many cases are cited which are supposed to be in point, where various forms of construction have been held to be not within the purview of the language of the bankruptcy act, or similar language employed in other legislation, such as the construction and operation of mining plants for the getting out and sale of ores and coals, dry docks, floating docks, railroads, and depots, and other constructions of a fixed and localized character. With respect to mining companies, it should be observed that, probably in consequence of the decisions holding them not to be subject to the bankruptcy act, Congress, by the act of 1903 (Act Feb. 5, 1903, chap. 487 [32 Stat. at L. 797, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1903, p. 409]), amended the law so as to include them. But we do not think the similarity of such works and business to that of building vessels employed in commerce is such as to furnish a rule for the latter. The business in question is the building of articles of commerce, as much as the building of locomotives and railway cars, or the manufacture of their constituent parts. The distinction would seem to run along the line of those articles which are more or less fixed in place, and not ordinarily the subject of bargain and sale as articles of commerce, as contradistinguished from those which are movable and ordinarily regarded as subjects of sale and manual transfer,—articles of trade in the common course of mercantile business. The associated words seem to import that Congress intended to include all those corporations which were engaged in the manufacture or sale of articles of commerce.

By express designation it included printers and publishers, so as to remove all doubt as to whether their productions were to be regarded as articles of trade; but in the case of vessels, so universally employed in commerce, it was unnecessary.

We have found no case decided under the bankrupt act precisely in point, but there are a number of decisions arising under the laws of the states imposing taxes on "manufacturing corporations" which are quite pertinent for the purpose of defining the meaning and scope of the term. Thus, in Com. v. Keystone Bridge Co. 156 Pa. 500, 27 Atl. 1, a statute of the state exempted from taxation corporations organized exclusively for manufacturing purposes; and the question was whether a corporation engaged in the manufacture of wood, iron, and steel bridges was within the terms of the statute. And it was held that it was. Doubt was expressed as to whether the word "manufacturing" could be properly applied to the putting of bridges in place, but it was held that the preparation of the parts for putting them together from material either raw or unfinished was "clearly manufacturing, within any accepted definition of the word." Other cases in which like definition has been given to the words are Atty. Gen. ex rel. Miner v. Lorman, 59 Mich. 162, 60 Am. Rep. 287, 26 N. W. 311; People v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 99 N. Y. 181, 1 N. E. 669; Com. v. Lowell Gaslight Co. 12 Allen, 75; Carlin v. Western Assur. Co. 57 Md. 515, 40 Am. Rep. 440. And see Schrieffer v. Wood, 5 Blatchf. 215, Fed. Cas. No. 12,481; Lawrence v. Allen, 7 How. 795, 12 L. ed. 918.

The distinction between the manufacture of the material and building it into ships, and that of building engines, boats, yaws, and other small craft, is only one of size and degree, and not of principle.

We are of opinion that the order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

I. Scope.

The whole question of a tenant's duty to repair is very intimately connected with the subject of this note, because, if he is under obligation to keep the premises in any implied or specified condition or degree of repair, he is undoubtedly under an obligation to so leave them at the end of the term; but, in order to determine more specifically the result of the decisions involving the precise question under discussion, all cases dealing with the duty of a tenant to repair generally, or to maintain the premises in good condition, have been excluded, and only those taken wherein the duty of the tenant, arising under a covenant in the lease to deliver up the premises in good condition, is discussed, or where, in the absence of such a covenant, the duty of the tenant to do so is in question.

II. The implied obligation.

a. Its extent in general.

Although the lessee may have bound himself

self by no express covenant as to the condition in which he will leave the premises leased at the end of his tenancy he is nevertheless, not free from a certain implied obligation in that respect. The decisions all recognize the existence of such an obligation, the only lack of harmony being as to its extent.

Early English decisions make the obligation the least onerous, compelling, only, that the tenant keep the buildings wind and water tight.

Thus, in Auworth v. Johnson, 5 Car. & P. 239, it was held that a tenant from year to year, in the absence of an express covenant to sustain and uphold the premises, is only bound to keep them wind and water tight; and, it appearing that the house leased was in a very dilapidated condition when the tenant took it, and that the repairs demanded by the landlord would require new materials because the old were actually worn out, the jury were charged that the tenant was not liable.

And in Leach v. Thomas, 7 Car. & P. 327, an action for waste, against an out-going tenant from year to year, the court said that such a tenant was not bound to make substantial repairs, but must only keep the premises wind and water tight.

In Ferguson v. —, 2 Esp. 500, 5 Revised Rep. 757, an action against a tenant from year to year after the expiration of the lease, for the sum necessary to put the building into complete and tenantable repair, Lord Kenyon said that a tenant from year to year was bound to commit no waste, and to make fair and tenantable repairs, such as putting in windows or doors that had been broken by him, so as to prevent waste and decay of the premises, but that he was under no obligation to put a new roof on an old worn-out house, as the landlord in the case at bar demanded.

The obligation is extended in a slight degree in Horsefall v. Mather, Holt N. P. 7, 17 Revised Rep. 589, which was an attempt to recover against a tenant at will, who, upon leaving the premises, which were in good repair when he entered upon them, had in some degree damaged the ceiling, the walls, and other parts of the house by removing the shelves and fixtures. It was urged that the duty of the tenant included the keeping of the premises in good and tenantable repair, and delivering them up at the expiration of the term in the condition in which he received them; but the court held that the tenant's liability was not so ex-

Boston Block Co. v. Buffington, 39 Minn. 385, 40 N. W. 361; Roach v. Peterson, 47 Minn. 291, 50 N. W. 80.

Lovely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover unpaid rent; also, for expenses of the landlord incurred in removing property damaged by fire and left on the premises by the tenant after surtensive, saying: "He is bound to use the premises in a husbandmanlike manner; the law implies this duty, and no more."

For the mere wear and tear of the premises, however, according to Torriano v. Young, 6 Car. & P. 8, a tenant from year to year is not liable.

But he must, even in the absence of express covenants, abstain from any acts beyond a reasonable use, which would unnecessarily injure the property, as appears in Genau v. District of Columbia, 20 Ct. Cl. 389, an attempt by a lessor to recover for the dilapidated condition of the premises after they were vacated by the lessee. The lease had been lost, and, therefore, the action was brought upon the implied covenants incident to the relation of landlord and tenant. It appeared that at the time the lessee took possession the premises were in good, tenantable condition, and that at the time it abandoned them they were in a ruinous and untenable condition beyond the ordinary damage incident to a reasonable use. The court declared that, independent of an express agreement, the law imposes upon the lessee an obligation to treat the premises in such a way that no substantial injury shall be done during the continuance of the lease, so that they may be restored to the owner unimpaired by the negligent conduct of the lessee; and that, while the latter is bound only to make tenantable repairs, such as keeping fences in order, replacing windows and doors broken during the tenancy of the lease, and is not liable for the ordinary wear and tear of the premises incident to the reasonable use of the same, he is under the obligation not to impair the property beyond the ordinary wear and tear.

It is said in Davenport v. United States, 26 Ct. Cl. 338, that without an express understanding the lessees are bound to use leased property so as not to damage it beyond the reasonable wear and tear.

The court says, obiter, in Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, 6 Am. St. Rep. 467, 13 Atl. 370, 16 Atl. 301, that, independently of any express agreement to keep the premises in repair and restore them in good condition, the law imposes upon every tenant, whether for life or for years, the obligation so to treat the premises that no substantial injury shall be done to them; that they may revert to the lessor at the end of the term unimpaired by any wilful or negligent conduct on lessee's part.

rendering the same. The cause was tried to the court, who made findings of fact, and held, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover a portion of one month's rent; also, a specific sum for expenses incurred by the landlord in taking away injured goods of defendants after they had quit. This appeal is from an order denying a new trial.

The following facts are embraced in the findings of the court and are supported by the evidence: Plaintiffs leased a building in the city of St. Paul to defendants for three years from January 1, 1901, at a stipulated monthly rental. The tenants took possession, and occupied it for the storage and sale of household furniture. On the 19th of November following, the premises became

A covenant on the part of lessee to surrender possession of the premises upon the expiration of the term in the same condition they were in when he entered into possession, the natural wear and tear excepted, was declared in Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446, to be merely the expression of the implied obligation, resting upon a lessee, which obliges him to pay the rent as it accrues, make tenantable repairs, avoid the exposure of the premises to ruin and destruction by acts of commission or omission, and on the expiration of the term quietly to surrender possession.

It appearing that during the occupancy under a lease ornamental trees were destroyed, fences and walls torn down, and the materials used for sidewalks and the erection of buildings, or carried away; and that stone was quarried and gravel dug from the premises and taken away,—this was held voluntary waste, and therefore within the prohibition of the implied agreement existing on the part of the lessee, even in the absence of an express agreement. United States v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53, 24 L. ed. 65.

According to Downing v. De Klyn, 1 E. D. Smith, 563, a lessee vacating premises under an agreement with the landlord is bound to leave them substantially in the condition in which they were at the time of the agreement, and has no right to carry away with him the doors, windows, and floors of the house.

Where a lessee, upon vacating the premises, informed the landlord that he had notified the water department to cut off the supply, and the landlord, relying upon this information, took no steps personally to see that it was done, the lessee was held liable for damages resulting from bursting pipes and injury to ceilings and furnace from the water which had not in fact been shut off. Burland v. Munyon's Homeopathic Home Remedy Co. Rap. Jud. Quebec, 14 C. S. 411.

In a case reported by the Monthly Law Digest and Reporter from Département du Nord. Valenciennes (1893), a landlord brought an action against his tenant to recover damages on account of the house having been left full of bugs. Judgment was rendered for 600 francs to defray the expense indicated by an architect as necessary for the occasion, and 237 francs for a loss of rent since the tenant left the premises.

The relation of a rectory incumbent to the untenantable by reason of a fire occurring without fault of either party. On the succeeding 1st of December, plaintiffs entered without opposition by defendants, and engaged in repairs to make the place serviceable for reoccupation. During the month, defendants were permitted to take out their damaged property, and continued to do so until the 1st of the next January, when they informed plaintiffs that they had entirely removed therefrom and surrendered the premises. After the building was given up by the tenants, there still remained therein a large quantity of injured furniture and rubbish of no value, but distinguishable as having been a part of defendants' stock. This worthless material was removed by the plaintiffs at their own expense, to facilitate repairs and their future use of the premises. The court found the reasonable amount of this expense, and that defendants were liable therefor.

By the terms of the written lease it was provided that upon its expiration, or when terminated by forfeiture or otherwise, the tenants would "yield up the premises in as good condition as when the same were entered, . . . loss by fire, inevitable accident, or ordinary wear excepted." There are other provisions in the lease relative to the surrender of the premises upon notice, as well as for the removal of offal and garbage, which were discussed on the argument; but under the view we have adopted these portions of the rental contract do not affect the result, and need not be considered. There rectory and buildings is undoubtedly slightly different from that of the ordinary tenant, so that the rule in regard to his duties as to the premises does not apply in other cases. Wise v. Metcalfe, 10 Barn. & C. 312, 5 Mann. & R. 235, 8 L. J. K. B. 126, was an action for dilapidations by the successor against the executor of a deceased rector. The question was by what rule the dilapidations were to be estimated. Three rules were proposed: First, that the predecessor ought to have left the premises in good and substantial repair, the painting, papering, and whitewashing being in proper condition for the immediate occupation and use of his successor, and that such repairs were to be ascertained with reference to the state and character of the buildings, which were to be restored, when necessary, according to their original form without addition or modern improvement; second, that they were to be left as an out-going lay tenant ought to leave his buildings where he is under covenant to leave them in good and sufficient repair, without papering, painting, or whitewashing; third, that they were to be left wind and water tight only, or in such condition as an out-going lay tenant, not under and obliged by covenant to do any repairs, ought to leave them. The second rule was the one adopted, the court stating that the incumbent was bound to maintain the parsonage and buildings in good and substantial repair, restoring and rebuilding when necessary according to the original form without addition or modern improvement; and that he was not bound to supply or maintain anything in the nature of ornament to which painting (unless necessary to preserve exposed timbers from decay) and whitewashing and papering belong.

The fact that the landlord has a remedy by an action in covenant does not prevent him from availing himself of the action on the case upon the implied obligation to leave the premises in proper condition as appears in Kinlyside v. Thornton, 2 W. Bl. 1111, where the landlord, after the expiration of the lease, brought an action on the case in the nature of waste against the tenant. Since there was a covenant in the lease to yield up the premises, it was contended that the action should have been brought in covenant. The court held that because the landlord had the action by covenant he did not thereby lose the old remedy of action on the case.

b. As to damages by fire and accident.

The law is undoubtedly settled that there is no implied obligation requiring the lessee to rebuild or stand the loss when the leased premises are accidentally destroyed by fire.

According to Wolfe v. McGulre, 28 Ont. Rep. 45, in the absence of an express contract a lessee is not liable for permissive waste, and an accidental fire from negligence is permissive, not voluntary, waste.

The court held in Maggott v. Hansbarger, 8 Leigh, 532, that the tenant was not bound to reconstruct buildings accidentally consumed by fire, in the absence of an express covenant so clear as to leave no doubt that he intended to take that duty upon himself.

It is admitted in Armstrong v. Maybee, 17 Wash. 24, 61 Am. St. Rep. 898, 48 Pac. 737, that, in the absence of an express covenant to rebuild, the lessee is under no obligation to do so when the premises are destroyed by fire.

The court, in combatting a contention that it was the duty of a tenant at will to deliver up premises in the condition in which he received them, says, in Horsefall v. Mather, Holt, N. P. 7, 17 Revised Rep. 589: "Can it be contended that a tenant at will is answerable if premises are burned down? Would he be bound to rebuild if they became ruinous by any other accident? And yet, if bound to repair generally, he might be called upon to this extent."

The same rule seems to apply in regard to any other form of accidental injury.

So, in the absence of an express agreement, it was held in United States v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53, 24 L. ed. 65, that an implied obligation exists on the part of the lessee so to use the property as to make repairs unnecessary as far as possible, but that such implied obligation has never been so construed as to make the tenant answerable for accidental damages, or to bind him to rebuild if the buildings are burned down or otherwise destroyed by accident.

Where the lease was in parol for one year, with no agreement to repair or deliver the premises in good condition at the end of the term, the tenants were held not liable in damages for the destruction of the building by an explosion when they exercised reasonable care in their use of the property leased. The court says, arguendo, that, in the absence of an express covenant on the subject, the law implies a covenant on the part of the lessee so to treat the demised premises that they may revert to the

is no controversy over the amount found to be due as unpaid rental for a part of the month of November, but it is insisted that, after defendants had removed the portion of their stock which they took away in December, they might without breach of duty allow a considerable portion to remain upon the surrender of the building. A reasonable construction of the facts found by the trial court authorizes the view that the relations between the landlord and tenants were actually terminated by agreement on the 1st of December, when the landlord, desiring to take possession of his property to make repairs, entered on that day, and that the tenants were licensed by the landlord thereafter to be there for the purpose of taking away their property, and continued to do so until it became apparent that the débris and rubbish resulting from the partial destruction of the injured furniture which had been their property was valueless, when they ceased to remove it, but left it in the building, thus imposing upon the landlord this burden.

We have no doubt that the provision in lessor, unimpaired except by usual wear and tear, and uninjured by any wilful or negligent act of the lessee; but that the implied covenant does not extend to the loss of buildings by fire, flood, or tempest, or enemies, which it was not in the power of the lessee to prevent. Earle v. Arbogast, 180 Pa. 409, 36 Atl. 923.

So, it was declared in Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446, that, in the absence of an express covenant to do so, a lessee is not liable to repair or restore the premises, if, by unavoidable accident, or by act of God or the public enemy, they are injured or destroyed.

But in one decision, Meyers v. Hussenbuth, 32 Misc. 717, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1026, the court says that there is an implied covenant in every hiring that the tenant will surrender the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as they were in at the commencement of the term, reasonable wear and tear and damages by the elements excepted; and that this obligation is not confined to cases of ordinary and gradual decay, but extends to accidental injuries. The action in this instance was for waste against the tenant on account of accidental injuries to the premises by third persons, and a judgment in favor of the tenant was reversed, and a new trial ordered.

c. As to removal of rubbish.

It was conceded by the court in Wilson v. Prescott, 92 Me. 115, that, if tenants, upon vacating premises, left them in an untenable condition by leaving ashes thereon, they would be liable for the extent of the injury, in a special action adapted to the facts of the case.

III. The obligation under express covenants.

a. In general.

Whether the state of repair in which the premises are left is a sufficient compliance with the lessee's covenant to leave in the condition specified becomes a question of fact in each case, varying, of course, with the requirements of the covenant and the extent to which it has been complied with by the tenant. A few general rules, however, are recognized and admitted almost universally. Thus, under ordinary covenants, the tenant is not liable for the natural decay of the premises when the repairs needed are so extensive that he would have practically to rebuild or reconstruct the decayed portion; also, he is not liable for the ordinary wear and tear or reasonable use of the premises; and their condition at the time he took possession is a material consideration, because his duty as to delivering them up in good repair is a comparative one only, dependent upon their nature, quality, and condition at the time he executed the lease. Of course, these rules have no force in the face of covenants particularly affecting any one of them.

b. Repairs necessitated by natural decay.

The rule as to a tenant's duty in regard to natural decay of the leased buildings when he has covenanted to leave them in good repair is stated as follows in Sheppard's Touchstone, 169: "If one covenant to keep and leave a house in the same, or as good, plight as it was at the time of the making of the lease, in this case the ordinary and natural decay of it is no breach of the covenant; but the covenantor is hereby bound to do his best to keep it in the same plight, and therefore to keep it covered."

And, similarly, it is said in 1 Leigh, N. P. 616, that "where a covenant to repair is to keep and leave the house in as good a plight as it was at the time of making the lease, the covenantor is only bound to do his best to keep it in that plight, and therefore to keep it covered. The ordinary and natural decay is no breach."

Tindal, Ch. J., in charging the jury in Gutteridge v. Munyard, 1 Moody & R. 334, 7 Car. & P. 129, used the following language in regard to the tenant's immunity from liability for the effects of natural decay: "What the natural operation of time flowing on effects, and all that the elements bring about in diminishing the value, constitute a loss, which, so far as it results from time and nature, falls upon the landlord. But the tenant is to take care that the premises do not suffer more than the operation of time and nature would effect; he is bound by seasonable applications of labor to keep the house as nearly as possible in the same condition as when it was demised."

Where a mortgagee had held possession of the mortgaged premises for forty years, and had made some repairs, he was held not liable for a diminution in the rental value, because, as the court said, it could not be supposed that after forty years' possession he was bound to leave the premises in as good condition as he found them. Russel v. Smithies, 1 Anst. 96.

So, in an action at the end of a term upon a covenant to keep up all repairs of a mill, where the lessor showed that it would cost $40 to set the mill going and $150 to put it in the same condition as at the beginning of the term, it was held that the tenant was not bound to do more than keep the premises in substantial repair, and was under no obligation to insure the lessor against natural wear and decay, and a verdict was given the latter for $45. Harris v. Goslin, 3 Harr. (Del.) 338.

the lease for the surrender of the premises by the tenants in as good condition as when received applies to the building itself. The exception relating to injury of the building by fire, while it would excuse the tenants from repairing or rebuilding, would not justify them in imposing burdens upon the landlord arising strictly from the tenants' occupancy and use of the premises; hence the injury by fire to the goods of defendants was a misfortune they had to assume themselves. A part of this was the injury to the furniture still belonging to them, and which, under the terms of the lease as well as upon reasonable considerations of justice, it was their duty, rather than the landlord's, to remove. It would follow that the tenants, under the privilege to take away their goods, could not enjoy it so far as beneficial, and leave a part of their damaged property in the building to encumber plaintiffs' possession, and the expenses incurred by the landlord in removing the rubbish which defendants left and declined to take away is a legal obligation against them.

Order affirmed.

A tenant was held not liable for the expense of laying a new floor in an improved manner, when at the end of his term it was in a decayed condition. Soward v. Leggett, 7 Car. & P. 613.

So, a tenant was held not bound to put up new woodwork if the old was entirely destroyed by natural decay. Crawford v. Newton, 36 Week. Rep. 54.

Arguendo, it was conceded in Thomas v. Conrad, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1630, 71 S. W. 903, that, under a covenant to surrender the premises in as good order as when received, natural decay and injury excepted, the lessees were under no obligation to replace a roof which had become so worthless by natural decay that it could not be repaired.

But a tenant, who had covenanted to keep premises in good and tenable repair, and to so give them up, was held liable for pulling down some of the buildings, although they were old and wretched hovels in a ruinous condition. The court held that the fact that the buildings were ruinous was no answer to the covenant to keep in repair, because the tenant was thereby bound to keep them as nearly as possible in the tenable state in which they were when leased. Woolcock v. Dew, 1 Fost. & F. 337.

Sturges v. Knapp, 31 Vt. 1, is somewhat of an exception, unless it may be distinguished on account of being railroad property. The covenant of lessees of a railroad to return the road at the termination of the lease in as good condition as it was at the commencement of the term, natural wear only excepted, was construed to import that the road was to be kept in good running condition during the term and returned in that condition, and that all structures which, by decay or accident, became unsafe for use must be renewed at the expense of the lessees.

And in Percival v. Cooke, 2 Car. & P. 460, 31 Revised Rep. 677, the executors of a deceased incumbent, while held not bound to put a rectory house into a finished state of repair, were held bound to restore what was actually in decay, and to make such repairs as were actually necessary for the preservation of the premises. The relation of a rectory incumbent to the premises, however, is slightly different from that of the ordinary tenant.

c. Repairs necessitated by reasonable use.

"Wear and tear," "reasonable use and wear," "reasonable and ordinary use," are phrases used in covenants and by the courts to signify the deterioration premises suffer during a tenancy by reason thereof when the tenant is a reasonably careful and prudent man. A number of decisions unanimously hold that for such deteriorations, even in the absence of an express exception in the lease, the tenant cannot be held liable, unless, of course, he is expressly bound by covenant in that respect. What acts are permissive within the terms "reasonable and ordinary use" and "wear and tear," when such exceptions are made in the lease, and whether the condition of the premises at the end of the tenancy is consistent with a reasonable and ordinary use, are questions of fact for the jury. It is stated in Haas v. Brown, 21 Misc. 434, 47 N. Y. Supp. 606, that if the damage ensues from a reasonable use of the premises a tenant is not liable therefor under a covenant to quit and surrender them in good condition at the end of the term; and that the question as to reasonable use is one of fact to be submitted to the jury.

And it was held in Jennings v. Bond, 14 Ind. App. 282, 42 N. E. 957, where the lessee was permitted to sublet a portion of the premises to be used as a printing office, that the lessor could not recover for discolored, shaken, and cracked walls and damaged floors, under lessee's covenant to turn over the premises at the end of his term in as good condition as they were in at the time of the making of the lease, because the injuries alleged to have been done to the building were no greater than were incident to the conduct of the business carried on with the consent of the landlord; and the covenant above referred to, the court stated, must be taken with the limitation that the landlord will permit such wear and tear of the premises as is incident to the use to which it is put.

A lease contained a covenant to deliver up at the end of the term in good repair all the trees in an orchard on the premises, reasonable use and wear only excepted. It appearing that, while the tenant had cut down some of the trees which were decayed and past bearing, he had planted an equal number, and therefore that the lessors were likely to get back the premises at the end of the term in better condition in respect to trees than at the granting of the lease, it was held that the acts of the tenant in reference to the orchard must be considered allowable within the exception "reasonable use and wear." Doe ex dem. Jones v. Crouch, 2 Campb. 449.

But barking and plowing up young apple trees by cultivating a crop among them was held in Thompson v. Cummings, 39 Mo. App. 537, not permissible under a covenant to deliver up the premises in as good condition as when received, ordinary wear and tear excepted.

It was held a proper question for the jury whether the use had been reasonable, where a lessee rented dwelling-house premises to be used for the purposes of a public school, covenanting to surrender them at the expiration of the lease in the same condition they were in at the commencement, reasonable use and wear thereof as a public school and damages by the elements excepted, when the evidence showed that upon the termination of the lease the premises were left with broken window panes, battered doors, missing balusters, filthy walls, and the cellar was filled with refuse. McGregor v. Board of Education, 107 N. Y. 511, 14 N. E. 420.

So, in Browning v. Garvin, 48 App. Div. 140, 62 N. Y. Supp. 564, it was held a proper question for the jury whether tenants had not unnecessarily damaged floors, stairs, and brick work in removing their property from a building after a fire, when they had covenanted to surrender possession in as good condition as the property was at the commencement of the term, reasonable use and wear thereof and damage by fire or the elements excepted.

It was held error in Smith v. Stagg, 15 Jones & S. 514, for the judge to charge unqualifiedly that the defendant was bound to surrender premises in as good condition as they were when he took them, where the covenant sued on provided that they should be surrendered in as good condition, etc., damages by the elements, reasonable wear and tear, excepted.

Where there was a conflict of evidence as to whether the condition of a leased building at the end of the term was occasioned by the acts and omissions of the tenants, or by the natural deterioration and decay of the building itself. It was held that the burden of proof was upon the landlord to establish that the want of repair was not caused by the reasonable use, wear and tear, of the premises. Hawkins v. Ringler, 47 App. Div. 265, 62 N. Y. Supp. 56.

d. Effect of condition of property at commencement of term.

The nature and condition of the property when leased are a most material consideration in determining the amount and kind of repairs properly required from the tenant. This was recognized by Lord Esher, in Proudfoot v. Hart, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 42, 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 389, 63 L. T. N. S. 171, 38 Week. Rep. 730, 55 J. P. 20, and the following rule was formulated by him: "The age of the house must be taken into account, because nobody could reasonably expect that a house two hundred years old should be in the same condition of repair as a house lately built; the character of the house must be taken into account, because the same class of repairs as would be necessary to a palace would be wholly unnecessary to a cottage; and the locality of the house must be taken into account, because the state of repair necessary for a house in Grosvenor square would be wholly different from the state of repair necessary for a house in Spitalfields. The house need not be put into the same condition as when the tenant took it; it need not be put into perfect repair; it need only be put into such a state of repair as renders it reasonably fit for the occupation of a reasonably minded tenant of the class who would be likely to take it."

Earlier cases had recognized the same doctrine.

In Gutteridge v. Munyard, 1 Moody & R. 334, 7 Car. & P. 129, an action brought for failure to yield up the premises in repair, where it appeared that the buildings were between two and three centuries old, Tindal, Ch. J., in commenting upon the evidence to the jury, said that where a very old building is demised, and the lessee enters into a covenant to repair, it is not meant that the old building is to be restored in a new form at the end of the term, or of greater value than it was at the commencement of the term; that the tenant is bound by reasonable applications of labor only to keep the house as nearly as possible in the same condition as when it was demised.

And, under a covenant to keep and deliver up premises in good repair at the end of the tenancy, it was held in Payne v. Haine, 16 Mees. & W. 541, 16 L. J. Exch. N. S. 130, that, if the premises were old and in bad repair at the time of the demise, the tenant was bound to put them in good repair as old premises, since he could not keep them in good repair without putting them into it. The court says: "The cases all show that the age and class of the premises let, with their general condition as to repair, may be estimated, in order to measure the extent of the repairs to be done. Thus, a house in Spitalfields may be repaired with materials inferior to those requisite for repairing a mansion in Grosvenor square; but this lessee cannot say he will do no repairs, or leave the premises in bad repair, because they were old and out of repair when he took them. He was to keep them in good repair, and in that state, with reference to their age and class, he was to deliver them up at the end of the term."

So, the court declared in Harris v. Jones, 1 Moody & R. 173, that the tenant was only bound to keep up the house as an old house, not to give the landlord the benefit of new work, and that the question for the jury was whether the covenant to yield up the premises at the end of the term in good, substantial condition had been substantially complied with, not strictly and literally.

And a covenant to keep and deliver up premises in good and tenantable repair was held, in Stanley v. Towgood, 3 Scott, 314, 3 Bing. N. C. 4, 2 Hodges, 132, 6 L. J. C. P. N. S. 129, to be complied with by keeping the premises in substantial repair according to their nature; and as to that question the state of repair at the time of the demise was held material.

Also in Mantz v. Goring, 4 Bing. N. C. 451, 6 Scott, 277, 1 Arnold, 198, 7 L. J. C. P. N. S. 204, an action for breach of covenant to keep in repair, the general state of the premises at the commencement of the term, whether new or old, was held to be a material consideration.

So in Burdett v. Withers, 7 Ad. & El. 136, 2 Nev. & P. 122, W. W. & D. 444, 6 L. J. K. B. N. S. 219, 1 Jur. 514, an action for breach of a covenant to keep and yield up premises in good repair, it was held that evidence to show the previous state of the premises was proper.

Winn v. White, 2 W. Bl. 840, goes on the theory that an agreement by a tenant to leave a farm in as good condition as he found it is an agreement to leave it in tenantable repair if it was in that condition at the commencement of the lease.

Where a lessee took a house and furniture in a clean state, and agreed to leave them as he found them, he was held bound to use the furniture in a tenantlike manner, and to clean it in a reasonable way before he left it. Stanley v. Agnew, 12 Mees. & W. 827, 13 L. J. Exch. N. S. 197.

It was held, incidentally, in Jaques v. Gould, 4 Cush. 384, that whatever repairs might be necessary to keep the premises in as good condition as they were in when the lessee took possession, except as excepted in the lease, the lessee was bound to make, where the lessee covenanted to deliver up the premises at the end of the term in as good order and condition, reasonable use and wear, fire, and other unavoidable casualties, excepted, as the same then were, or might be put into by the lessor.

A new trial was granted in Roberts v. Freeborn, 14 Daly, 529, 2 N. Y. Supp. 56, an action for breach of a covenant to surrender the premises in as good condition as they were in at the time of the letting, in order to determine more carefully what the condition of the premises at the time of the letting was, since it did not appear but that rotten beams, and holes in the floor, for which the defendant lessee had been adjudged liable to repair, were in existence prior to the commencement of his tenancy.

In Belcher v. McIntosh, 2 Moody & R. 186, 8 Carr. & P. 720, where the premises were old and dilapidated, the court said in its instructions to the jury that the agreement, which was that the lessee should put the premises into habitable repair, was not that the tenant should give the landlord new buildings at the end of his tenancy, but that he should take the premises out of their former dilapidated condition, and deliver them up fit to be occupied for the purposes for which they were used.

A covenant to repair and make good any damages occurring through neglect on his part was held not to bind the tenant to restore the premises upon the termination of his lease to any better condition than he found them; and, therefore, where, at the beginning of the term, the wall paper was defaced by nail holes, and was patched up by pasting paper over the holes, and the woodwork was only slightly renovated, the tenant was not held liable for extensive renovations made by the landlord after the termination of the lease, consisting of repapering and refinishing the woodwork, etc. Smith v. Maxfield, 9 Misc. 42, 29 N. Y. Supp. 63.

In an action after the expiration of the term to recover the cost of repairs which it was plain the tenant should have made under a covenant to make all necessary repairs and surrender the premises in as good state and condition as reasonable use and wear will permit, damages by the elements excepted, it was held that such covenant bound the tenant to make only such repairs as were necessary to its use of the premises, and did not bind it to make all the repairs which the premises needed at the time of the making of the lease. White v. Albany R. Co. 17 Hun, 98, 8 N. Y. Week. Dig. 86.

The jury were told in Haldane v. Newcomb, 12 Week. Rep. 135, 9 L. T. N. S. 420, an action on a contract to leave in repair, that they were to consider evidence as to the state of repair of the premises at the time of the demise only so far as it went to show the age, character, and class of the buildings, their general condition, and the extent to which the tenant had performed his covenant to repair.

In West v. Hart, 7 J. J. Marsh. 258, the covenant, which was "to keep the farm and buildings in good repair, and leave them in the same good order at the end of said term of three years," was distinguished from the covenant in Brashear v. Chandler, 6 T. B. Mon. 150, and construed to mean that the premises were to be kept and delivered up in the same state of good repair that they were in at the time of the making of the lease.

But in Brashear v. Chandler, 6 T. B. Mon. 150, a covenant which provided that the lessee was to deliver up the farm "in good tenable repair in every respect" was construed to mean that the farm was to be put into good tenable repair whatever its situation might have been when rented and when delivered up, that the buildings should be fit to dwell in with comfort, the inclosures should be sufficient to protect and secure the crops, and the premises should be tenable in every respect.

e. Repairs in particular.

1. Papering, painting, and whitewashing.

It will be observed that the courts, in determining tenants' liability to make particular repairs, apply the principles shown in the decisions above set out.

In Crawford v. Newton, 36 Week. Rep. 54, an action to recover for breach of a covenant to keep the inside of the premises in tenable repair and so deliver them up at the end of the term, it was proved that a tenant had not painted or papered the house during the tenancy, that parts of the woodwork were worn away or decayed, and that holes were left in the wall from which the tenant's fixtures had been removed. In holding that the tenant was not bound to do any painting or papering which was required only for the purposes of ornamentation, under a covenant to keep the inside of the house in tenable repair, Cave, J., says that tenable repair does not mean anything in the way of decorative repair, and that "paper is decorative repair. No doubt if a man takes a house which is papered new for him for three years, he must return the house with the paper not stripped off, or torn off, or any thing of that kind, but subject only to the fair wear and tear of the paper. Where he takes a house for a term of years, and there is nothing to do but to keep the inside in tenable repair, and he remains there so long that the paper in the natural course of things becomes useless for a future tenant, he is not bound to put on a new paper, although he may do it if he likes to please himself. It is not one of those things necessary to keep the house in repair. The house is just as much in repair whether it has paper on the walls or whether it has not. The house is none the less fit for being papered afterwards, none the less fit for being dealt with by the landlord afterwards, if the tenant thinks fit to strip the paper off the walls, and to have the simple walls uncovered by paper at all. In the absence of a covenant that he shall paper and paint, I do not see what is to prevent him doing that, provided his term is not so short a term that it amounts to an absolute destruction of the paper he found there."

In regard to the extent of a tenant's obligation to repaper under a covenant to leave premises in good tenable repair, Lord Esher says, in Proudfoot v. Hart, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 42, 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 389, 63 L. T. N. S. 171, 38 Week. Rep. 730, 55 J. P. 20: "I agree that he is not bound to repaper simply because the old paper has become worn out, but I do not agree with the view that, under a covenant to keep a house in tenable repair, the tenant can never be required to put up new paper. Take a house in Grosvenor square, if, when the tenancy ends, the paper on the walls is merely in a worse condition than when the tenant went in, I think the mere fact of its being in a worse condition does not impose upon the tenant any obligation to repaper under the covenant, if it is in such a condition that a reasonably minded tenant of the class who take houses in Grosvenor square would not think the house unfit for his occupation. But suppose that the damp has caused the paper to peel off the walls, and it is lying upon the floor, so that such a tenant would think it a disgrace, I should say then that the tenant was bound, under his covenant to leave the premises in tenable repair, to put on new paper. He need not put up paper of a similar kind—which I take to mean of equal value—to the paper which was on the walls when his tenancy began. He need not put up a paper of a richer character than would satisfy a reasonable man within the definition." In regard to an ornamental ceiling, the same justice says: "Take, again, the case of a house in Grosvenor square having an ornamental ceiling which is a beautiful work of art. A tenant goes in and finds such a ceiling in the house, and in course of time the gilding becomes in such a bad condition, or so much worn off, that the ceiling is no longer ornamental. I should think that a reasonable tenant, taking a house in Grosvenor square, would not require a gilded ceiling at all. If that be so, on the mere covenant to leave the premises in tenable repair, I should think that the tenant who has entered into that covenant was not bound to regild the ceiling at all."

In regard to the extent of a tenant's obligation to repaint the inside woodwork, under a covenant to leave the premises in good tenable repair, Lord Esher says, in Proudfoot v. Hart, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 42, 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 389, 63 L. T. N. S. 171, 38 Week. Rep. 730, 55 J. P. 20: "If the paint is in such a state that the woodwork will decay unless it is repainted, it is obvious that the tenant must repaint. But I think that his obligation goes further than that. A house in Spitalfields is never painted in the same way as one in Grosvenor square. If the tenant leaves a house in Grosvenor square with painting only good enough for a house in Spitalfields he has not discharged his obligation. He must paint it in such a way as would satisfy a reasonable tenant taking a house in Grosvenor square."

Similarly, Cave, J., in Crawford v. Newton, 36 Week. Rep. 54, says, in regard to painting, that the rule is somewhat different from that as to papering; that "the inside of a house is quite as good, although not so pleasant and as sound, whether it is papered or not. That is not the case with regard to the painting. Painting is partly for decoration, but it is also for the protection of the woodwork. If the tenant does not paint as an ordinary tenant would do, and under those circumstances the woodwork becomes destroyed, or the painting which was on is left in such a condition as to require more than ordinary repair and expense in renewing it, that seems to me to be a defect and is a want of tenable repair."

The contention in Maxon v. Townshend, 2 Times L. R. 717, 2 Q. B. Div., was that, under a covenant to deliver up premises well and sufficiently repaired in regard to specified repairs named in the lease, the lessee was bound to repaper and repaint the house at the end of the term before yielding it up. The court said that the tenant's duty in this regard was purely a question of circumstances, and, accepting the evidence of a surveyor who had surveyed the house with the covenants in his hand, allowed the lessor the amount estimated by that witness as sufficient.

In regard to the extent of the tenant's liability to whitewash, under a covenant to leave in good tenable repair, Lord Esher says, in Proudfoot v. Hart, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 42, 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 389, 63 L. T. N. S. 171, 38 Week. Rep. 730, 55 J. P. 20: "As to whitewashing, one knows it is impossible to keep ceilings in the same condition as when they have just been whitewashed. But if, though the ceilings have become blacker, they are still in such a condition that a reasonable man would not say, 'I will not take this house because of the state of the ceilings,' then I think that the tenant is not bound, under his covenant to leave the house in tenable repair, to whitewash them."

2. Other repairs.

Leaving cracked glass in windows was held to be a breach of a covenant to leave premises sufficiently repaired, in Pyot v. St. John, Cro. Jac. 329.

And in Holbrook v. Chamberlin, 116 Mass. 161, 17 Am. Rep. 146, a lessor was held entitled to recover the value of glass broken during the term of the lessee, who had covenanted to surrender up in good repair, and who had assigned his interest in the lease.

Where the lessees had covenanted to keep and "deliver up the premises in good order and repair," a defense was held insufficient, to an action for rent, brought after they had vacated, and for damages for repairs made necessary by their negligence, which set forth that the premises were in an uninhabitable condition owing to defective drainage, on account of which they vacated the premises before the end of their term. Hollis v. Brown, 159 Pa. 539, 28 Atl. 360.

The tenant was held not liable for the expense of laying a new floor in an improved manner, when at the end of his term the old one was in a decayed condition. Soward v. Leggett, 7 Car. & P. 613.

And Cave, J., in Crawford v. Newton, 36 Week. Rep. 54, says that, "if the whole of the woodwork is gone and decayed, the defendants are not bound to put new woodwork up. The tenant was bound to keep the house in repair. When that can be done by repairing a piece of a door, or anything of that sort, he is bound to do it; but when the whole flooring is rotten he is not bound to put in a new flooring, and when the whole of the inside has gone he is not bound to put up a new inside to the house."

But where the covenant was to keep in tenable repair, Lord Esher, in Proudfoot v. Hart, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 42, 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 389, 63 L. T. N. S. 171, 38 Week. Rep. 730, 55 J. P. 20, declared that, if a floor was rotten when the tenancy commenced, it was the tenant's duty to put it into tenable repair, and, if it was perfectly rotten at the end of the tenancy, he must put down a new floor, although, if he can make it go by repairing it, he may satisfy his obligation in that way.

The covenants as to the condition the property was to be left in, in Scott v. Haverstraw (Clay & Brick Co. 62 Hun, 620, 16 N. Y. Supp. 670), were construed to bind the lessee to leave upon the premises a fully equipped brick yard covering the whole premises with smooth regular surfaces; and to erect and leave a steam engine for the manufacture of brick with suitable buildings and all machinery required therefor; and to leave all sheds and other improvements in good order and condition.

This decision was affirmed in 135 N. Y. 141, 31 N. E. 1102. The court there said, in regard to the covenant to leave the surface of the yard in a smooth condition, which was violated by the lessee leaving it broken, that the condition of the surface stipulated for was necessary in order to manufacture bricks successfully in the manner in general use when the lease was made, and that the lessor's purpose was to have the yard at the expiration of the term in the condition in which business could be successfully prosecuted; and that the fact that, since the lease was executed, other methods for making brick had been devised which rendered the smooth condition of the yard unnecessary, did not change the construction to be put upon the covenant, nor the lessee's liability under it.

Failure to repair a pavement was held to be a breach of a covenant to leave the premises sufficiently maintained and repaired, in Pyot v. St. John, Cro. Jac. 329.

Lessees were held under no obligation to replace a roof which had become so worthless by natural decay that it could not be repaired, in Thomas v. Conrad, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1630, 71 S. W. 903, although they had covenanted to surrender the premises in as good order as when received.

8. Alterations.

Carrying away a shelf, although it was not fixed to the premises, was held to be a breach of a covenant to leave in sufficient repair at the end of the term, in Pyot v. St. John, Cro. Jac. 329.

Tenants were held liable for having opened two doorways in the walls of the leased premises, in Gange v. Lockwood, 2 Fost. & F. 115, when they had covenanted to surrender the premises at the end of the term free from all dilapidations.

Where a lessee was permitted by the lease to make alterations, but had agreed to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term in as good condition as reasonable use and wear would permit, damages by the elements excepted, it was held, in Re Jewell, Fed. Cas. No. 7302, that, if alterations were made which affected injuriously the condition of the building as it was before making the alterations, it should at the expiration of the lease be restored to its former condition in respect to the changes so made.

Under a lease which allowed the lessee to alter the buildings, but required him to place them in the same condition at the expiration of the lease as they were in at the commencement of the term if asked to do so by the lessor; but stated no time at which the lessor must give notice to the lessee to do so.—It was held, in Reed v. Harrison, 186 Pa. 337, 46 Atl. 415, that the fact that the lessor failed to give notice of his desire that a building be restored to its original condition until three weeks after the termination of the lease did not relieve the lessee from his obligation to comply with his agreement in that respect.

1. Fire or unavoidable accident.

1. In general.

The duty of a tenant in case of the destruction of the premises is as follows:

tion of the leased premises by fire or unavoidable accident, when he has covenanted to yield them up at the end of the term in good condition, or has made any other agreement of a similar effect, is not yet definitely settled by the decisions. In the absence of any exception in the lease which can be construed so as to include destruction by fire or accident, the cases are not in harmony as to the tenant's liability. A numerous array, including the older authorities, goes on the theory laid down in Broom, Legal Maxims, 233, that, "where there is a general covenant by the lessee to repair and leave repaired at the end of the term, the lessee is clearly liable to rebuild in case of the destruction of the premises by accidental fire, or by any other unavoidable contingency, as lightning, or an extraordinary flood. And the principle on which this rule depends is that, if a party, by his own contract, creates a duty or a charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good, if he can, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity; for, if he had chosen to guard against any loss of this kind, he should have introduced it into the contract by way of exception; and, accordingly, an exception of accidents caused by fire and tempest is now usually introduced into leases, in order to protect the lessee."

Thus, a covenant to keep a house in good and sufficient repair, and so leave the same, was held, in Chesterfield v. Bolton, 2 Comyns, 627, to bind the lessee to rebuild the house when it was burned down by accident.

And, according to Pym v. Blackburn, 3 Ves. Jr. 34, 38, a lessee, having covenanted to leave the premises in good and sufficient repair, is bound to rebuild in case of fire.

So, a covenant to keep in repair during the term was held to require the lessee to rebuild in case of accidental fire, in Bullock v. Dommitt, 6 T. R. 650, 2 Chitty, 608, 3 Revised Rep. 300.

And according to Ely v. Ely, 80 Ill. 532, if a lessee enters into a covenant to keep the building in repair at his own expense, and to deliver it up at the end of the term in as good order and condition as when he received it, without making any exception of loss by fire, he is under the obligation to reconstruct the building in case it is burned.

It is declared in Bigelow v. Collamore, 5 Cush. 231, to be a well-settled principle of law, that when a lessee covenants to keep the demised premises in repair, and at the termination of the lease to surrender them in as good condition as they were in at the commencement of the term, if the buildings are destroyed, although without the fault of the tenant, he will be bound to rebuild, or make the loss good to the lessor.

A lessee who covenanted to surrender and yield up the premises in as good condition as they were in at the date of the lease, reasonable use and wear thereof excepted, was held bound, in Phillips v. Stevens, 16 Mass. 238, to rebuild the house and barn destroyed by fire during the term.

It was held, incidentally, in Schmidt v. Pettit, 1 MacArth. 170, that a covenant in a lease that the tenant will deliver the premises at the expiration of the lease in as good order as they were in at the commencement of the term binds the lessee to rebuild in case the premises are destroyed by fire.

So, Priest v. Foster, 69 Vt. 417, 38 Atl. 78, supports the doctrine that when a lessee agrees to return the leased property in as good condition as it was in when he took it, he is liable in damages for failure to do so, notwithstanding the property was destroyed by fire.

And in Hoy v. Holt, 91 Pa. 88, 36 Am. Rep. 659, a covenant to return mill property in reasonably good condition and repair was held to bind the tenant to do so, even though the mill was destroyed by fire. This decision was upon the ground that, when a party, by his own contract, creates a duty or charge upon himself, he is bound to make it good notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract.

Following Hoy v. Holt, it was held in Gettysburg Electric R. Co. v. Electric Light, Heat, & Power Co. 200 Pa. 372, 49 Atl. 952, to be the duty of the lessee to restore buildings which had been destroyed by fire when it had covenanted to "keep and maintain all of said property leased to it in good repair, and at the termination of this lease restore the same to the said party of the first part in good condition."

On the ground that the law of the question was doubtful, the court, in Ross v. Overton, 3 Call. (Va.) 309, 2 Am. Dec. 552, refused to set aside an award of arbitrators that a lessee who had covenanted to deliver up mill property, with all improvements, at the expiration of the term in proper tenable repair was bound to comply with his covenant, although the mill house was entirely demolished by an extraordinary and unexpected movement of the ice, which the lessee was powerless to prevent.

The covenant of lessees of a railroad to return the road at the termination of the lease in as good condition as it was in at the commencement of the term, natural wear only excepted, was construed in Sturges v. Knapp, 31 Vt. 1, to import that the road was to be kept in good running condition during the term, and returned in that condition, and that all structures which, by decay or accident, became unsafe for use must be renewed at the expense of the lessees.

In Pasteur v. Jones, 1 N. C. (Conference) 194, a suit in equity, where the lessee, in compliance with a covenant to build and leave in repair, had put buildings upon the land, which were afterwards destroyed by fire, it was held that the lessee was liable for the value of the buildings, or that he must rebuild. But in this case the consideration for the use of the land was that the lessee should leave upon the premises the building specified, and the value of the structure destroyed was about what the lessee ought to have paid, and what the lessor would have been entitled to, for the use of the land during the time it had been occupied by the lessee.

A distinction is made in Nave v. Berry, 22 Ala. 382, between a covenant "to repair and deliver up" and one simply "to deliver up," on the ground that, while the former binds the lessee to rebuild in case of loss by fire during the term, the latter is simply an obligation against holding over; and, if the buildings are burned or destroyed during the term without the fault of the lessee, he is not bound to rebuild or pay for the improvements so destroyed. In the case at bar the covenant was merely "to deliver up."

A number of cases make a distinction between a covenant to keep in repair and one to surrender in good condition, or words to like effect, on the ground that the lessee is bound to restore the premises in any event under a covenant to repair, but is not liable in the case of accidental fire or injury when he merely agrees to surrender up in good condition.

So, in Warner v. Hitchins, 5 Barb. 666, a distinction is made between a covenant to repair and one to surrender in good, or the same, condition, on the ground that the former imposes a much more extended liability, and is the proper one where the lessee assumes to keep and make the premises good from whatever cause the injury may arise, whether from unavoidable accident or negligence; and that the latter is the one adopted when the object is to secure the utmost care and diligence of the lessee in protecting and preserving the property; and, therefore, in the absence of an express covenant to repair, it was held that the tenant was not liable, under a covenant to surrender up the possession of the premises at the expiration of the lease in the same condition they were in at the date of the lease, to put new buildings in place of those destroyed by accidental fire during the term.

Following Warner v. Hitchins, it was held in Howeth v. Anderson, 25 Tex. 557, 78 Am. Dec. 538, that a lessee is not liable for the loss of the premises by accidental fire under a covenant for their redelivery at the end of the term in good order, excepting usual wear and tear and unavoidable accidents.

And in Wainwright v. Silvers, 13 Ind. 497, a vendor in possession of the premises as tenant, who had agreed to deliver up the premises in as good repair as they were in at the time of the agreement, was held not liable to restore a dwelling house accidentally destroyed by fire. The court says: "The law as between landlord and tenant, we understand to be that the tenant is not responsible for buildings accidentally burned down during his tenancy, unless he has expressly covenanted or agreed to repair. It is not sufficient to charge him that he agreed or covenanted to surrender the premises at the end of his term in the same repair or condition they were in at the time of the contract.

Similarly, the legal effect of a covenant to keep demised premises in repair, and at the determination of the lease to surrender them in as good condition as they were in when the lease was made, was declared, in Abby v. Billups, 35 Miss. 618, 72 Am. Dec. 143, to require the lessee to return the leased premises as agreed, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity; and, therefore, a corporation which had bound itself by such an agreement was held bound to make good all damages resulting from a fire, although the result of accident.

But in Levey v. Dyess, 51 Miss. 501, the court draws the following conclusions after a review of the authorities: That the lessee is not responsible for the accidental, casual destruction by fire of the property demised, unless he has made himself so by a covenant to repair, or keep in repair, or its equivalent; and that a covenant to redeliver or restore to the lessor in the same plight and condition, usual wear and tear excepted (or other words of like import), does not bind the covenantor to rebuild in case of casual destruction by fire, or impose the burden of the loss upon him.

While admitting that without an express covenant to rebuild the lessee is under no obligation to do so when the premises are destroyed by fire, the court held, however, that the following covenant could be construed only to impose on the lessee the obligation to rebuild the mill, which was destroyed by fire, though without negligence on his part: "The lessee shall maintain all of the machinery and buildings of said mill in as good condition and repair as the same now are in, and return the same to the lessor at the expiration of said lease in as good condition as the same are now in, reasonable wear and tear excepted. . . . That he (lessee) will maintain all the said mill, machinery, and buildings in as good condition and repair as the same are now in, and return the same to lessor at the expiration or termination of this lease in as good condition as the same are now in, reasonable wear and tear from ordinary use alone excepted." Armstrong v. Maybee, 17 Wash. 24, 61 Am. St. Rep. 898, 48 Pac. 737.

A recovery was allowed against the estate of a lessee for a failure to keep property in repair, only so far as it was caused by something else than ordinary wear and unavoidable casualties, in Bail v. Wyeth, 8 Allen, 275, where the lease provided, by a written clause, that the property was to be kept in repair and maintained in good condition by the lessee, and, by a printed clause, that the lessee would quit and deliver up the premises at the end of the term in as good order and condition (reasonable use and wearing thereof, fire, and other unavoidable casualties excepted) as the same now are, or may be put into by the said lessor. It was held that the exceptions mentioned were intended to qualify both of the covenants to repair and to deliver up the premises.

A number of decisions, in harmony with the doctrine shown in the cases last above set out, are to the effect that, under a covenant to surrender up in good condition, or words to like effect, even in the absence of a clause exempting the lessee from liability in case of the destruction of the leased premises by unavoidable accident, he will be held liable under such circumstances only in case of his own negligence or fault.

Thus, a vendor in possession of the property as tenant, who had covenanted to give up the possession of the premises in as good condition as the same were then, any natural wear excepted, was held bound to restore the buildings upon their being destroyed by fire through his negligence, carelessness, or misconduct, or to suffer a reduction in the purchase price equal to the amount it would cost to rebuild. Gibson v. Eller, 13 Ind. 124. Had the building been consumed accidentally, the court gave as its opinion that the vendor would not have been bound to put up new buildings in place of those destroyed.

And where the evidence showed culpable negligence on the part of lessees, they were held liable for the destruction of buildings on the leased premises by fire when they had covenanted to return the premises at the close of the season in good order with the exception of the usual wear and tear. Klock v. Lindsay, 28 Can. S. C. 453.

Miller v. Morris, 55 Tex. 412, 40 Am. Rep. 814, adheres to the doctrine that a covenant to restore premises in good running order, ordinary wear and tear excepted, does not bind the lessee to rebuild in case of casual destruction of the property by fire, or impose the burden of the loss upon him if the fire was not occasioned by his negligence.

Where lessees who leased a river landing covenanted to deliver it up at the expiration of the lease in good order and condition, and to make good all damages thereto, except the usual wear and proper use of the same, it was held in Waite v. O'Neil, 72 Fed. 348, that the lessees were not bound to restore the premises after their destruction by an extraordinary flood, when they could not have prevented the ravages of the river,—at least without the expenditure of enormous sums of money,—and when they could not restore the premises to their original condition without an expenditure of money far in excess of the value of the property leased.

Kelly v. Duffy (Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 410, 11 Atl. 244, goes on the theory that in an action brought after the termination of the lease on the covenant to surrender premises at the expiration of the term in as good order and condition as they were in at any time during the term, ordinary decay and inevitable casualty only excepted, where the premises were destroyed by fire, lessee is not liable if he made every practicable effort which, under the circumstances, ought to have been made to save the building; and that whether he did so or not is a question for the jury.

Another class of cases goes still further away from the old English rule first above shown, and refuses to hold a lessee liable in the absence of a clear and express covenant to rebuild, in case of casual destruction of the leased premises by fire or unavoidable accident, on the ground that it is unjust to interpolate into the lease by implication a meaning which was foreign to the minds of the parties at the time of its execution.

The earliest and clearest exponent of this doctrine is Pollard v. Shaffer, 1 Dall. 210, 1 L. ed. 104, 1 Am. Dec. 239, where it was held that a tenant who had covenanted to deliver up the premises in good repair was excused from compliance therewith when the buildings were destroyed by a hostile army. The court was of the opinion that, in order to bind the lessee under such circumstances, the covenant ought to be special and express, and so clear that no other meaning could be put upon it. The court says, arguendo: "Neither party has been guilty of any default; the injury has been done by a common enemy, whom both together could not possibly resist or prevent, and the premises would have been thus damaged in the possession of the plaintiff himself. Suppose, when the lease was executed that the lessee had been asked, 'Is it your meaning, that, in case the buildings shall be destroyed by an act of God, or public enemies, you are to rebuild or repair them?'—His answer would have been, unquestionably, 'No; I never entertain such an idea.' Should the like question have been put to the lessor, his answer would certainly have been, 'No, I do not expect anything so unreasonable.'"

In Maggort v. Hansbarger, 8 Leigh, 532, the covenant was to return the property with its appurtenances. During the term several buildings on the premises were consumed by fire, accidentally or by some unknown incendiary. The court held that the tenant was not bound to rebuild in the absence of an express covenant so clear as to leave no doubt that he intended to take that duty upon himself.

In view of a state statute providing that, in the construction of instruments creating or conveying interest in real estate, it shall be the duty of the courts to carry into effect the true intent of the parties so far as such intent can be collected from the whole instrument, and so far as such intent is consistent with the rules of law, the court declared itself released from the English common-law rule, and held that an express agreement of a lessee to keep leased premises in good repair, and at the expiration of the term to surrender them in as good condition as they were in when he entered, natural decay, wear and tear, excepted, did not bind him to rebuild buildings destroyed by a hurricane. Wattles v. South Omaha Ice & Coal Co. 50 Neb. 251, 36 L. R. A. 424, 61 Am. St. Rep. 554, 69 N. W. 785.

And in Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446, it was declared that, under a covenant to surrender possession of the premises in the same condition they were in when the lessee entered into possession, or, in other words, in the absence of an express covenant to do so, the lessee is not liable to repair or restore premises injured or destroyed by unavoidable accident, or act of God or the public enemy.

In Halbut v. Forrest City, 34 Ark. 246, the theory is advanced that where there is an agreement to redeliver the premises in any prescribed condition of good order it is a question of the real intention and meaning of the parties whether or not the tenant meant to assume the position of an insurer against a casual destruction of the premises by fire, and that the circumstances and probable intention of the parties are properly considered in this respect. The court says that the tendency of the more recent decisions is adverse to extending the responsibility of the tenant when the covenant is not special and express, and so clear as to leave little doubt that he really meant to take the risk of an insurer.

In other cases where the lessee covenanted to return the property in good condition (or words to that effect), "loss by fire or unavoidable accident excepted," or "damages by the elements excepted," the cases turn on whether the injury suffered comes within the exception.

Thus, a tenant covenanting to yield up premises in as good condition as when entered upon, loss by fire or inevitable accident or ordinary wear excepted, was held liable for the expense of replacing a window broken by a stone accidentally kicked by a passing team, on the ground that such an injury to the premises was not an inevitable accident, it being possible for the tenant to have protected the window by a blind or wire netting. Peck v. Scoville Mfg. Co. 43 Ill. App. 360.

It was said, arguendo, in Kramer v. Cook, 7 Gray, 550, where by the lease the lessee was to restore the premises at the end of the term in as good order and condition, reasonable use and wearing thereof, fire and other unavoidable casualties, excepted, as they were in when he took possession, that the falling of the wall by reason of not being properly shored up was not an unavoidable casualty, and that the duty of repair would be on the lessee, and not on the lessor.

The partial destruction of a building by fire was held to be within the statutory provision that a mere agreement of a lessee to repair or leave in repair will not bind him to restore buildings destroyed by fire or other casualties. Sun Ins. Office v. Varble, 103 Ky. 758, 41 L. R. A. 792, 46 S. W. 486.

In a covenant to deliver up the premises in like condition as when taken, reasonable use and wear thereof and damages by the elements excepted, "damages by the elements" was held to include the loss of the buildings by fire occurring without the fault of the lessee. Van 64 L. R. A.

Wormer v. Crane, 51 Mich. 363, 47 Am. Rep. 582, 16 N. W. 686.

Where lessees had covenanted to deliver the premises at the expiration of the lease in as good condition as they were in at the commencement of the term, reasonable wear and tear and accidents by fire excepted, it was held in Evans v. Skelton, 16 Can. S. C. 637, that a fire which occurred without the fault of the lessees was an accident within the terms of the lease.

A lessee who had agreed to deliver the premises at the expiration of the term in as good order, state, and condition as they might be found in at the commencement of the same, reasonable wear and tear and "accidents by fire" excepted, was held not liable in damages for the destruction of the building by a fire the origin of which remained a mystery, because, in the absence of fault or negligence upon the part of the lessee, such a fire would be considered an accident within the terms of the lease, and because the landlord had not proved that it was the lessee's fault which caused the fire. Ford v. Phillips, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 22 C. S. 206.

It is said obiter, in Turner v. Townsend, 42 Neb. 376, 60 N. W. 587, that perhaps a tenant at the expiration of his lease would not be compelled to restore, or pay for the restoration of, a window which had been blown out by a storm, as it might be that a storm would be considered an inevitable accident within the meaning of the tenant's covenant to yield up the premises at the expiration of the term in as good condition as when received, loss by fire or other unavoidable accidents excepted.

2. Injuries caused by third persons.

The fact that injuries to the premises were caused by third parties makes no difference in the lessee's liability to leave the premises in good repair, if he has covenanted to do so.

Thus, lessees who had covenanted to yield up the premises in as good state and condition as they were in at the commencement of the term, reasonable use and wear thereof and damages by the elements excepted, were held liable to replace or pay for a large plate glass which was cracked at the time they surrendered the property. Their liability was held not affected by the fact that the crack in the glass was not caused by any act or omission of their own, on the ground that, having to do all necessary repairs, they were, therefore, absolutely responsible for an omission to do so, no matter what caused the injury aside from any fraud of the lessors. Cohn v. Hill, 9 Misc. 326, 30 N. Y. Supp. 209.

So, a tenant was held liable for the value of plumbing work which was cut out and stolen by persons unknown after the tenant had moved out near the end of the term, in Regan v. Luthy, 16 Daly, 413, 11 N. Y. Supp. 709.

The damage suffered by the destruction of a leased building by the negligent acts of a third party was incidentally held recoverable against the lessee under a covenant that the buildings should revert to the lessor without damage, in Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co. 1 Denio, 91.

And a covenant in a lease to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term in as good condition as the reasonable use and wear thereof will permit, damages by the elements excepted, was held, in Parrott v. Barney, 1 Sawy. 423, Fed. Cas. No. 10,773, not to protect the lessee from liability for waste resulting from accidents occurring without his fault, through the wrongdoing of third parties.

And in Myers v. Hussenbuth, 32 Misc. 717, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1026, which was an action for waste against a tenant on account of accidental injuries to the premises by third parties, the court said that the obligation of the tenant to surrender the premises at the end of the term in as good condition as they were in at the commencement of the term, reasonable wear and tear and damages by the elements excepted, was not confined to cases of ordinary and gradual decay, but extended to accidental injuries; and a judgment in favor of the tenant was reversed, and a new trial ordered.

But a tenant was held not liable, under his covenant to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term in good condition, for serious damages inflicted upon the leased property by the municipal authorities, when he diligently invoked the aid of the court in the attempt to prevent the wrong. Beekman v. Van Dolsen, 63 Hun, 487, 18 N. Y. Supp. 376.

g. Injuries caused by imperfect construction.

Lessees were held not liable for the cost of rebuilding a dwelling house upon the demised premises under their covenant to yield up the premises unto the lessors in such good and substantial state and condition as the lessors were bound to deliver up the same premises to their superior landlord upon the expiration of their lease thereof, when it appeared that the dwelling house rebuilt, which was at least one hundred years old, had been originally placed upon a platform of timber on muddy soil, and that the rotting of the timber caused the walls to bulge, so that after the termination of the lease the building had to be pulled down on account of its dangerous condition. The theory of this holding was that, the original construction of the house being faulty, whatever happens by natural causes to such a house in the course of time is "results from time and nature, which fall upon the landlord," and the failure of a tenant to do anything in regard to them is not a breach of a covenant to repair or leave in repair. Lister v. Lane [1893] 2 Q. B. 212, 62 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 583, 4 Reports, 474, 69 L. T. N. S. 176, 41 Week. Rep. 626, 57 J. P. 725.

And lessees who covenanted to deliver up mill property at the expiration of their tenancy in as good order and repair as they found it, natural wear and tear and fire excepted, were held not liable to repair the mill when, during the term, it fell down in consequence of a defect in its construction unknown to them, and while they were using it with reasonable and proper care. Hess v. Newcomer, 7 Md. 325.

But in Lockrow v. Horgan, 58 N. Y. 635, an action to recover for repairs and for improvements removed by the tenant, where a lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessee to make such improvements as he might require, also to make all necessary repairs, and to keep the same in tenable order at his own cost, and to leave all the improvements upon the premises at the expiration of the lease, the defense was that the premises became untenable because of the settling of the rear wall of the building owing to the original defective construction of the foundation, and the tenant had; therefore, abandoned them; but the court held that, under the covenants referred to, the tenant was bound to make repairs irrespective of the cause of the defect, and that the settling of the wall could not be considered within the exceptions mentioned in the covenant to surrender up in good condition, viz., reasonable use and wear and damages by the elements.

h. Buildings erected during term.

From the few cases on the question, it seems that a covenant to leave in repair applies, not only to buildings in existence at the time the lease was executed, but also to all buildings subsequently erected upon the premises during the tenancy.

Thus, a covenant to leave in repair, it was held, in Brown v. Blunden, Skinner, 121, extended to a malt house erected by the lessee after the commencement of the term, on the ground that the covenant was a continuing one. And in Lant v. Norris, 1 Burr. 287, a covenant to leave in repair was held to apply, not only to buildings upon the premises at the time the lease was given to lessee, but to all those that might be erected during the term, when the lessee had covenanted to spend a certain sum of money within the stated time in erecting and rebuilding buildings upon the premises.

So with reference to a covenant to erect buildings and leave them in repair. Pasteur v. Jones, 1 N. C. (Conference) 194.

A tenant who, with the permission of the landlord, erected buildings upon waste land adjoining the leased premises, and continued in possession of them until the end of the term, was held liable to yield up those buildings in repair to the same extent that he would be liable to do so under his covenant in regard to the leased premises; and an allowance against his estate for dilapidations of the buildings erected was held proper. White v. Wakley, 26 Beav. 17, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 77, 4 Jur. N. S. 988, 6 Week. Rep. 791.

A tenant, who had covenanted to erect three houses and keep them in repair, and also to deliver up in sufficient repair all houses thereafter to be erected upon the premises, was held bound to leave in repair five houses, when he erected that number instead of three. Douse v. Earle, 3 Lev. 264, 2 Vent. 126.

But in Cosgrave v. Hammill, 173 Pa. 207, 33 Atl. 1045, an allegation in an affidavit of defense in an action against the lessor for breach of a covenant was declared "simply impudent" which set forth that leased premises were to be yielded up in as good repair as when received, and that, on the contrary, the same were in a very dilapidated condition, had been allowed to become so with intent to defraud, and that to put them in good and sufficient repair would require the expenditure of a certain amount. The reason for the court's criticism of this allegation was that it appeared that the premises, when leased, were a vacant lot, and that the only building on it was to be thereafter erected by the lessee of a size, style, cost, and subsequent use entirely in his own discretion.

i. Liability of tenant holding over.

A tenant holding over under a prior lease was held bound to leave the premises in a state of repair required by the covenants of that lease. Ponaford v. Abbott, Cab. & El. 225.

It was held in Haeussler v. Holman Paper-Box Co. 49 Mo. App. 631, that the grantee of a reversion could recover against a tenant who was holding over after the expiration of the lease, and, therefore, was a tenant from month to month, for all breaches of the covenants of the original lease which could be held applicable to a month-to-month tenancy; and, therefore, that he could recover for a breach of covenant to leave the premises in the condition in which they were received, natural wear and decay and effects of fire excepted.

j. Liability of assignee of lessee.

A covenant to surrender up in good condition seems in the few cases reported to be regarded as one running with the land, and therefore the courts hold the assignee of the lease to the duties of the assignor in this respect.

Incidentally, in Cook v. Champlain Transp. Co., 1 Denio, 91, the assignee of the lessee was held liable to the lessor for the destruction of a building, under a covenant that the buildings should revert to the lessor without damage, etc.

A covenant to occupy and leave premises in tenantable repair at the expiration of the term was held, in Shelby v. Hearne, 6 Yerg. 512, to run with the land; and the court stated that an assignee of the reversion may sue the lessee if the premises be out of repair at the end of the term.

The action in Harris v. Goslin, 3 Harr. (Del.) 338, was brought against the assignee of the lessee at the end of the term, under a covenant to keep up all repairs of a mill.

k. Removal of rubbish.

The question discussed in BOARDMAN v. HOWARD has, so far as discovered, come up very infrequently; but, with one exception, the effect of the decisions reported is in harmony with the result reached in the above case. The decisions in several instances, however, it will be observed, have been based upon breaches of more explicit covenants than a general one to leave the premises in good condition; and, therefore, in a sense each decision based upon the breach of such a covenant stands upon its own merits, and is not entirely in point with BOARDMAN v. HOWARD, or any other case based upon a covenant not entirely similar. Thus, in Fleischman v. Toplitz, 25 Abb. N. C. 304, 10 N. Y. Supp. 471, Affirmed in 134 N. Y. 349, 31 N. E. 1089, the lessee had covenanted to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term in good order and repair, ordinary wear and tear and injury by the elements excepted, and also, at his own expense, to comply with all the rules and orders of the board of health. It was held that he was bound to remove the carcasses of a number of horses which were upon the premises at a time when it was destroyed by fire, their removal having been ordered by the board of health; but it was held that the landlord was bound to remove the debris of the burned building in order to enable the lessee to remove the carcasses.

An agreement that the tenant was not to permit or allow bats to be thrown into a river near bulkheads, so as to destroy or interfere with free navigation or use of the water, or to make it in any degree more shallow, was held, in Scott v. Haverstraw Clay & Brick Co. 135 N. Y. 141, 31 N. E. 1102, to require the tenant at the end of the term to remove any bats thrown, or which had fallen, into the water in violation of this covenant, or to pay to the landlord the reasonable expense of removing them.

Box Co. 40 Mo. App. 631, that the grantee of a reversion could recover for a breach of covenant to leave the premises in the condition in which they were received, excepting natural wear and decay or the effects of fire. The breaches complained of included a failure to remove rubbish and ashes.

Under a covenant providing that "peaceable possession of the said premises shall be given to said party of the first part in as good condition as they now are, all rubbish and spawls to be removed, the usual wear and inevitable accidents excepted," it was contended that the lessee was bound to remove all spawls and rubbish which might be on the premises at the expiration of his term, including any that might have been there when the lease was made; but this contention was not sustained on the ground that the words "all spawls and rubbish to be removed" were but a part of the general clause intended to amplify the expression that the lessee return the premises "in as good condition as they now are," and that to require the lessee to remove all spawls and rubbish placed there by his predecessors would be to require him to leave the premises in very much better condition than when he secured them. Copinger v. Armstrong, 8 Ill. App. 210.

But in Thorndike v. Burrage, 111 Mass. 531, where there was a covenant to "peaceably yield up, in good, tenantable repair, reasonable wearing and use thereof excepted," the court briefly held, without giving its reason, that leaving ashes and rubbish on the premises at the expiration of the tenancy was no breach of the agreement.

The question of the right to remove fixtures is not discussed in this note, except when the right is contested on the ground that its exercise will violate a covenant to leave the premises in some specified condition or degree of repair, or when an action is prosecuted for injuries occasioned to the premises on account of the manner in which fixtures were removed. Cases discussing merely whether a covenant to leave specified portions of the premises in good repair applies to objects in question are not included.

In holding that a tenant at will could remove a padlock and some loose boards, the court, in Whiting v. Brastow, 4 Pick. 311, said that, according to later decisions in England and this country, a tenant, at the expiration of his estate, might remove such improvements as were placed there by him, the removal of which would not injure the premises or place them in a worse plight than they were in when he took possession.

So, the right to remove a frame addition was denied in Friedlander v. Ryder, 30 Neb. 783, 9 L. R. A. 700, 47 N. W. 83, not on the ground that it was attached to the freehold, but because it was so annexed to the main building that its removal would greatly injure the demised premises. The court stated that the modern decisions are to the effect that a tenant can only remove such improvements, erected by him, the removal of which will not materially injure the premises, or put them in a worse condition than they were in when he took possession.

And a tenant was allowed to remove a tile floor and electric-light apparatus, in Ross v. Campbell, 9 Colo. App. 38, 47 Pac. 465, when by so doing the premises were left in as good condition as they originally were in.

A lessee who had covenanted to surrender the leased premises and all appurtenances in as good state as reasonable use would permit was allowed to remove trade fixtures placed on the premises by himself, consisting of buildings and machinery, but was assessed a certain amount for a failure to keep and leave the premises in the condition specified. Brown v. Reno Electric Light & P. Co. 55 Fed. 229.

It is declared in Pellenz v. Bullerdeck, 13 La. Ann. 274, that, under the Louisiana law, a tenant has a right to remove improvements and additions, provided he leaves the property in the state in which he found it; but, where the additions are made with lime or cement, or the like, the lessor should be notified by the lessee of the intention to remove, for he has the right to retain them by paying a fair price.

Tenants, under a covenant to yield up in repair, were held, in Foley v. Addenbrooke, 13 Mees. & W. 174, 14 L. J. Exch. N. S. 169, to have the right to remove the machines and articles specified in their lease, doing as little damage as possible, and leaving the premises in a state fit to be used for a similar purpose by another tenant.

Damages done to premises in removing machinery which the tenant had the right to remove under his lease were held not recoverable in Hunt v. Potter, 47 Mich. 197, 10 N. W. 198, when it did not appear that he did not exercise due care and caution.

But a tenant who had covenanted to yield up the premises in good and sufficient repair was denied the privilege of removing any part of a veranda which he had erected, the lower part of which was attached to posts which were fixed in the ground. Penry v. Brown, 2 Starkie, 403.

And in Murray v. Moross, 27 Mich. 203, an action for breach of a covenant to deliver premises up at the end of the term in like condition as when taken, it was held that the tenant would have no right to remove a box stall which he had put up in the barn on account of injuries occasioned thereto by his horses, if its removal would injure the freehold and prevent its return in like condition as when taken.

Where a lease provided for the surrender of the premises at the expiration of the term "in as good state and condition as reasonable use and wear thereof will permit, damage by the elements alone excepted," and did not reserve or grant the right to remove buildings, it was held, in West Coast Lumber Co. v. Apfeld, 86 Cal. 335, 24 Pac. 993, that the tenant had no right, at the expiration of the lease, to remove a building permanently erected upon the leased premises.

A lessee who had covenanted to deliver up a mill in as good condition as when received, natural wear excepted, was held under no obligation to leave a boiler in the mill at the end of his tenancy, which he had put there to take the place of one which had become entirely worthless by age. Mason v. Fenn, 13 Ill. 525.

A tenant entitled by his lease to remove trade fixtures was held to have waived that right by taking a subsequent lease which contained no reservation of the right, and covenanted to keep the premises in good repair and deliver them up in as good condition as when received. Sanitary District v. Cook, 169 Ill. 184, 39 L. R. A. 369, 61 Am. St. Rep. 161, 48 N. E. 461, 44 L. R. A.

And a lease giving the lessee the right to remove buildings was held abrogated in that respect by a later one which did not reserve the right, but provided for the surrender of the premises at the expiration of the term, "reasonable use and wear thereof, and damages by the elements, excepted." Jungerman v. Bovee, 19 Cal. 354.

So, in Watras v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694, it was held that a lessee who, under a former lease, had the right to remove trade fixtures, lost that right under a subsequent lease making no reference to the old one, and reserving no right in the fixtures, but covenanting to deliver up the premises at the end of the term in as good condition "as the same now are."

m. Other cases.

In a few decisions, the covenants agreed upon, or the circumstances involved, present situations which do not allow the cases to come within any of the classes or subdivisions made.

The court declared, in McBride v. Daniels, 92 Pa. 332, that where a tenant agreed to take all proper care of a farm the same as a careful and prudent farmer should of his own property, and return the same at the end of the lease in as good condition as when received, except natural wear and unavoidable accidents, if he permitted Canada thistles to grow and go to seed on the farm, or pastured the meadows with sheep to such an extent as to destroy them, or did not leave as many acres in grass as he had agreed, each of these causes presented a proper subject for damages.

A lessee of a wharf, who had covenanted to keep and return it in serviceable condition, was held not liable, in Meyers v. Myrrell, 57 Ga. 516, for the expense incurred by the lessor in repairing the wharf in compliance with the demand of the city authorities that it be done for the purpose of preventing "injury to the river," when it did not appear that the wharf had not been kept and returned in serviceable condition, or that the repairs were called for by the municipal authorities "for the safety or convenience of vessels lying at the wharf," for which purposes lessee had also covenanted to repair.

An outgoing tenant was held liable for waste in Watherell v. Howells, 1 Campb. 227, on the ground of having plowed up strawberry beds which were in full bearing at the time, notwithstanding his claim that he had paid a sum of money for the beds in question to the person who assigned the lease to him; but the court held that the lessor's reversionary estate had been injured by the plowing up of the beds before they were exhausted, which it could scarcely be doubted had been done maliciously.

The court asks the question in Spafford v. Meagley, 1 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 364, whether a covenant to keep fences in repair during the occupancy requires the tenant to leave them in repair at the expiration of his lease. And in answering this question in the affirmative it is said: "Although it may be supposed to have been the leading object of the parties to secure the preservation of the crops, yet it may be presumed the lessor intended the premises should be kept in a suitable condition for immediate and future use at the close of the term. Although the contract does not, in words, require that he should restore the premises in as good condition as he received them, yet he is bound to keep them in this condition while he occupied them. If he had done this he would have left them in the condition he found them. A covenant to keep in repair is the same as to deliver up in repair."

n. When right of action accrues.

The old common-law rule is stated in general in Sheppard's Touchstone, 173, as follows: "If one covenant to leave a wood in the same plight he finds it, and he cut down trees, in this case the covenant is broken presently, for it is now become impossible to be performed by his own act; but if in this case some of the trees be blowed down with the wind, or the like, by this the covenant is not broken, for it is now become impossible to be done, by the act of God, and in this case the covenantor is not bound to supply it. And so, likewise, of a covenant to repair houses, or if one covenant to sustain houses or sea banks, or covenant to leave them in as good case as one doth find them, and the houses be burnt, or thrown down by tempest or the like, or the banks be overthrowa by a sudden flood, or the like accident,—in this case the covenant is not broken by this accident only; but, if the covenantor doth not repair and make up these things again in time convenient, the covenant will be broken. And if houses be let to me for years, and I covenant to leave them in as good plight as I find them, and I throw down the houses, this is no breach of the covenant, for I may re-edify them, and therefore no action will lie upon this covenant until the end of the term."

The weight of authority undoubtedly is in favor of the doctrine that no action lies for a breach of a covenant to leave in good condition, until the expiration of the tenancy.

Thus, in holding that no action can be brought for the breach of covenant to surrender the premises in good condition until the expiration of the tenancy, the court says in Agate v. Lowenbein, 4 Daly, 262, that until that time the tenant has a locus penitentiae to put the premises into the required condition.

And according to Hoskinson v. Bradford, 1 Pittsb. 165, the right of action does not arise until the end of the term for breach of a covenant to leave the land in good order, because such a covenant is not broken until the land is left out of order.

It is said, obiter, in Kling v. Dress, 5 Robt. 521, that no action lies until after the end of the term, on a covenant to leave premises in good condition, even if the lessee pulls down the buildings.

A lessee who had covenanted to keep the leased premises in good order and repair during the continuance of the lease, and at the expiration thereof to surrender the property in a like good order and repair, was declared, in Payne v. James, 42 La. Ann. 230, 7 So. 457, to have the privilege of delaying the making of the necessary repairs until any time before the expiration of the lease; and, therefore, the court stated that the time for action on the part of the lessor did not arrive until the expiration of the lease.

The rule is recognized in Haas v. Brown, 21 Misc. 434, 47 N. Y. Supp. 606, that an action to recover under a covenant to surrender up the premises in good condition at the expiration of the term may not be maintained until the termination of the lease.

a lease for damages done to the premises by the original lessees was held erroneous in Montague v. Jamison, 16 Ky. 1. Rep. 238, on the ground that, since the lease required the lessees to leave the premises in a stated condition, the assignees, at the end of the term, might have left the property in the condition required by the lease; and, if they did not do so, the lessor's remedy was then for a breach of the contract.

It was held that an action to recover under a covenant to deliver up premises in good order, for an amount expended by the landlord in repairs, could not be had before the end of the term, because no obligation arose under such a clause until that time. Rosenbloom v. Finch, 37 Misc. 818, 76 N. Y. Supp. 902.

And, similarly, in Wright v. Tileston, 60 Minn. 34, 61 N. W. 823, when it appeared that, at the time lessor made repairs to property rendered necessary by the violence of the elements the lessee's term had not expired, it was held that the lessor could not, after the expiration of the lease, attempt to recover the amount expended in an action for breach of covenant to yield up in good condition; but the action must be regarded as one in tort, for negligence in the care of the premises.

However, some cases recognize the doctrine laid down in Sheppard's Touchstone, above referred to, that, if the damage done by the lessee is something that cannot be repaired, lessor need not delay until the expiration of the tenancy in order to sue for breach of a covenant to leave in good condition.

Thus, although an action against a lessee before the end of the term upon a covenant to deliver the premises at the termination of the lease in as good condition as when received was held prematurely brought in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Bettagast, 79 Tex. 256, 15 S. W. 228, the right to recover during the running of the lease for cutting trees and carrying away the timber was not denied.

And an action brought prior to the expiration of the lease to recover a sum of money as damages for broken panes of glass, against the guarantor of the lessee, who had covenanted to surrender the premises leased in good condition, was held premature in Fratt v. Hunt, 108 Cal. 288, 41 Pac. 12, on the ground that no cause of action for a breach of that covenant could arise until the time came for a return of the property; but, as to the question of property destroyed and lost, the court conceded that a cause of action in damages would arise at the date of its destruction, regardless of the time of the expiration of the lease; for, even though the lessee's stated time for a performance had not yet arrived, if he voluntarily placed it out of his power to perform, he committed a breach of the contract, and was liable at once.

A distinction is made in Schieffelin v. Carpenter, 15 Wend. 400, between a covenant to keep the premises in good condition and repair and at the expiration of the term to yield them up in good repair, and a covenant only to leave in good condition. The court declares the law to be well settled that, under a covenant to keep the premises in good condition and repair, and at the expiration of the term to yield them up in like good repair, the landlord need not wait until the expiration of the term before bringing an action for the breach, under an idea that the tenant may, before he leaves the premises, put them in good condition. If the covenant is only to leave the premises in as good condition as the tenant found them, however, the court admits that an action will not lie until the end of the term.

To the same effect, it is said in Snowhill v. Reed, 49 N. J. L. 292, 60 Am. Rep. 615, 10 Atl. 737, that "where the covenant is simply to yield up the possession of the premises at the expiration of the term, there can be no breach until the term is ended, for the tenant has the whole term within which to repair. Although the lessee is liable to an action before the expiration of his term on a covenant to keep the premises in good repair, on a covenant to leave them in as good state as he found them no action will lie until the end of the term."

Whether, on a covenant to leave in good condition at the end of the term, an action may be brought prior thereto, but at the actual termination of the tenant's tenancy, when the latter vacates before the expiration of the period named in the lease, is discussed in the following cases:

In Snowhill v. Reed, 49 N. J. L. 292, 60 Am. Rep. 615, 10 Atl. 737, a lessee who leased premises for the term of one year entered into an agreement with the lessor by which it was agreed that, in consideration of the tenant's relinquishing possession before the end of the term, the landlord would release the tenant from the payment of a specified portion of the rent. After the surrender of the premises in pursuance of this arrangement the lessor commenced an action for breach of a covenant in the lease, that upon its expiration the tenant would deliver up the premises in as good repair as they were at the commencement of the lease, reasonable wear and tear and damages by fire, war, and trespass only excepted. It was proved that the tenant, while in possession, had removed and destroyed counters and shelving fixtures, and painted a sign in large letters on the building, and had permitted the walls of the room to be stained by heaping tobacco against them. The question was whether the covenant referred to could be broken before the end of the term so that an action would lie; but the court held that the time for its performance was the time of the expiration of the lease, whether by surrender or by the efflux of time. One judge dissents on the ground that the tenant had the full term specified in the lease in which to put the premises in the condition specified by the covenant, and, therefore, that the covenant was not broken when the surrender was made and accepted; and that the effect of a surrender by mutual consent is to terminate the relation of landlord and tenant, and with it all covenants in the lease which had not then matured.

Upon appeal to the court of errors and appeals, reported as Reed v. Snowhill, 51 N. J. L. 162, 16 Atl. 679, eight stood for reversal and one for affirmance. The ground of this decision was that the words, "on the expiration of said lease," in the covenant, contemplated the end of the full term; that the tenant had until that time to put the premises in the condition specified, and that, if the parties made any subsequent agreement, and their intention in this regard was changed, it should not be left as a doubtful inference, but should appear in clear terms; and, since it did not so appear in the agreement of surrender, the compliance with the terms of that agreement operated to cut off any further rights under the covenant in question which had not yet matured and become actionable.

An action brought after the vacation of the premises, but before the end of the term, for deteriorations committed by the lessee during his occupancy, was held premature in Amiot v. Bonin, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 23 C. S. 42, on the ground that no cause of action could arise in that respect until the termination of the lease agreed upon between the parties.

But the court, in Marshall v. Rugg, 6 Wyo. 270, 33 L. R. A. 683, 44 Pac. 700, 45 Pac. 480, refuses to follow Reed v. Snowhill, 51 N. J. L. 162, 16 Atl. 679, and holds that, when a lease is terminated before the end of the term by agreement of the parties, the lessor does not lose his right to recover for a failure of the tenant to comply with a covenant to turn over the property at the expiration of the lease in as good order and condition as when he entered upon it.

So, a lessee covenanted to leave 4 acres of the land fallowed and plowed. The lease was for ten years, but he was given the privilege, upon a year's warning to surrender before that period, which he afterwards did without leaving the ground in the condition agreed. It was held that the landlord, by accepting the surrender, did not waive the tenant's obligation to comply with the covenant; although, had the covenant been to leave the ground plowed and fallowed at the end of ten years, it would have been otherwise. Austin v. Moyle, Noy, 118.

The lessor's right to an injunction when tenants, in violation of a covenant to surrender up the premises in good condition, just before the end of the term commenced pulling down and carrying away the materials of several buildings, and threatening to do so as to the whole, has been upheld in one case, London v. Hedger, 18 Ves. Jr. 355. The court held that the covenant in the lease would not preclude an injunction from issuing on behalf of the lessor.

Necessity of notice to repair.

A previous notice to repair was held to be unnecessary to an action for a breach of a covenant to leave in repair, in Wood v. Day, 7 Taunt. 646, 1 J. B. Moore, 389.

And in Harriet v. Butcher, Cro. Jac. 644, a previous notice to leave in repair was held unnecessary, for, as the court says, a tenant ought to leave it sufficiently repaired without notice at his peril; and, where a lease provides for a three months' notice to make repairs before any liability to make them falls upon the tenant, such a notice was held to refer only to repairs necessary to be made during the term.

o. Measure of damages.

1. In general.

While several rules have been advocated for the measure of the damages in actions for breach of covenants to leave premises in any specified condition, the one upon which the great majority of the decisions has settled as the proper one is that the lessee is liable to the extent of the amount required to do what he covenanted to do, but did not do.

Thus, the proper measure of damages in actions for failure to leave premises in repair was held, in Woodhouse v. Walker, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 408, 49 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 612, 42 L. T. N. S. 770, 28 Week. Rep. 765, 44 J. P. 666, to be the sum which was reasonably necessary to put them in the state of repair in which the tenant for life ought to have left them.

Lopes, L. J., in Ebbetts v. Conquest [1895] 2 Ch. 377, 73 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 56, gives, arguendo, the following rule: "Where the term has come to an end, and the action is on the covenant to leave in repair, the measure of damages is the sum it will take to put the premises into the state of repair in which the tenant ought to leave them according to his covenant."

In an action against a tenant's estate for dilapidation, where the tenant had covenanted to keep the premises well and substantially repaired, and to so leave them at the end of the term, the court said that the tenant was bound to give up possession of the premises in as good a state of repair as when he took possession; and, therefore, if they were in a state of tenantable repair, he was bound to deliver them up in such repair at the end of the term, and, for failure to do so, that the landlord was entitled to charge the tenant's estate with such a sum as was necessary to put the premises into a proper tenantable state of repair. Brown v. Trumper, 26 Beav. 11.

In Davies v. Underwood, 2 Hurlst. & N. 570, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S. 113, 3 Jur. N. S. 1223, 6 Week. Rep. 105, Watson, B., says that the great object of a covenant to leave premises in repair is not to put money into the pockets of a lessor, but to enforce the performance of the acts stipulated for; and, therefore, that the damages recovered are usually such as are sufficient to put the premises into repair. A lessee was held entitled, upon the forfeiture of his lease, to recover damages against a sub-lessee for a failure to leave the premises in proper repair as the latter had covenanted to do, and to recover substantial damages to the amount necessary to make good the defect in the premises.

The rule as to the measure of damages upon a breach of covenant to leave premises in repair at the end of the term was held, in Joyner v. Weeks [1891] 2 Q. B. 31, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 510, 65 L. T. N. S. 16, 39 Week. Rep. 583, 55 J. P. 725, to be that the lessee must pay what the lessor proves to be a reasonable and proper amount for putting the premises into a state of repair in which they ought to have been left.

Where a lessee covenanted that, upon the termination of the lease, he would deliver up certain parts of the property in as good repair as the same were in at the commencement of the lease, or pay a sum sufficient to put said parts in repair, it was held that the measure of damages was a sum sufficient to make the repairs stipulated for, and that, if this could only be done by the use of new materials, no deduction would be allowed the tenant on that account, as, if he had complied with the covenant, he could have supplied the new materials at his own cost, and, having failed to do so, the landlord must be allowed the cost of doing what he should have done. Burke v. Pierce, 27 C. C. A. 462, 55 U. S. App. 59, 83 Fed. 95.

In Watriss v. First Nat. Bank, 130 Mass. 343, an action brought after the termination of the lease for breach of contract to yield up in good condition, in that the lessee removed fixtures that were part of the freehold, the measure of damages was held to be the sum which would put the premises in the condition in which the tenant was bound to leave them, allowing for reasonable wear and tear. 64 L. R. A.

The true measure of damages was held, in Morgan v. Hardy, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 770, to be the one laid down in the 4th edition of Mayne on Damages, 253, that, where the action is brought upon the covenant to repair at the end of the term, the damages are such a sum as will put the premises into the state of repair in which the tenant was bound to leave them. And it was held that the tenant's liability could not be limited by the fact that, owing to the buildings being older than they were at the beginning of the lease, or relatively inferior as compared with improvements in the neighborhood, or, looking at their probable future occupation by tenants, of an inferior grade, they might obtain as good a rent or be sold as high, omitting some repairs in the way of restoration, and doing some at a cheaper rate than would be required by adhering strictly to the covenant.

In Scott v. Haverstraw Clay & Brick Co. 62 Hun. 620, 16 N. Y. Supp. 670, the measure of damages for the tenant's failure to comply with his covenant was held to be the reasonable cost and expense of replacing everything which ought to have been left according to his agreement.

The measure of damages for the failure upon the part of the lessee to replace partitions, and restore a building to the same good condition that it was in at the beginning of the lease, as he had covenanted to do, was held, in Willoughby v. Atkinson Furnishing Co. 93 Me. 185, 44 Atl. 612, to be the amount of money necessary to do what the lessee had covenanted to do, but did not do.

Where a tenant covenanted to yield up the possession of the premises at the end of the term in as good and sufficient repair as when received, but allows the property to become dilapidated, and the landlord, with the tenant's consent, enters upon the premises before the end of the term and makes extensive repairs, the tenant is liable under his covenant, in an action brought after the lease is terminated, only for repairs necessary to put the property in the condition in which he covenanted to leave it; and, therefore, the measure of damages is the cost of the repairs made by the landlord, which the tenant failed to make in compliance with his covenant to return the property in as good condition as he found it in. Darlington v. De Wald, 194 Pa. 305, 45 Atl. 57.

In regard to the extent of the tenant's liability for the cost of repairs made by the landlord after the termination of the lease, which he himself should have made under a covenant to leave in good, tenantable repair, Lord Esher says, in Proudfoot v. Hart, L. R. 25 Q. B. Div. 42, 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 389, 63 L. T. N. S. 171, 38 Week. Rep. 730, 55 J. P. 20: "If he leaves the floor out of repair when the tenancy ends, and the landlord comes in, the landlord may do the repairs himself and charge the costs as damages against the tenant; but he is only entitled to charge him with the necessary cost of a floor which would satisfy a reasonable man taking the premises. If the landlord puts down a new floor of a different kind, he cannot charge the tenant with the cost of it. He is entitled to charge the cost of doing what the tenant had to do under his covenant; but he is not entitled to charge according to what he has himself in fact done."

It is pointed out in Davenport v. United States, 26 Ct. Cl. 338, that there is no fixed rule of law or of fact between repairs which are necessary because of ordinary wear and tear and those needed because of the improper use made of the premises by the lessees; that the determination of the amount necessary for repairs is a matter of judgment and discretion after an examination of the nature and character of the different items of repairs; and that, while the lessor is entitled to receive his property in good condition, wear and tear excepted, he is not entitled to charge the lessee with all the decay and damage that may have happened during the continuance of the lease.

A different rule than the one shown in the above cases is advocated in Daggett v. Webb, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 415, 70 S. W. 457, where the court held the rule of damages in cases where the tenant covenants to keep the premises in as good condition as they were in when he received them, ordinary wear and tear excepted, and to so deliver them to the owner or reversioner at the end of the lease, to be the difference in value of the premises with the improvements in the condition as received by the lessee, ordinary wear and tear excepted, and the value of the premises at the expiration of the lease without them.

And, similarly, it was held in Fagan v. Whitcomb (Tex. App.) 14 S. W. 1018, that the proper measure of damages in an action by a landlord against a tenant for injury to premises during a lease, where the landlord had not made any repairs, was not what it would be worth to put the property in statu quo, but the injury to the market value of the reversion.

Where it appeared that during the running of a lease the tenant paid a certain sum into court in satisfaction of an action against him for breach of a covenant to repair, but made no repairs at that time or thereafter, it was held, in Henderson v. Thorn [1893] 2 Q. B. 164, 62 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 69 L. T. N. S. 430, 41 Week. Rep. 509, 5 Reports, 404, 57 J. P. 679, an action brought at the end of the term for breach of a covenant to leave in repair, that the landlord could not recover the full sum claimed as damages for the failure to leave the premises in repair, but that he must subtract therefrom the amount previously paid to him, as well as an allowance for such depreciation as would have occurred had the covenant to repair been performed on the first occasion between that date and the end of the term. The theory of this holding was that the amount paid in satisfaction of the former action must be considered as damages for injury to the reversion, and not as the sum then required to put the premises in repair.

In a few instances the lessor has been allowed, in addition to the amount necessary to put the premises into the agreed condition of repair, an additional sum as recompense for the time the premises necessarily stood idle after the termination of the tenancy while repairs were being made.

Thus, in Birch v. Clifford, 8 Times L. R. 103, Q. B. Div., which was an action after the expiration of the tenancy for damages for breach of covenant to deliver up the premises in good repair, and the damages claimed were the amount necessary to put them in repair, and also an additional sum for the time during which the premises would be useless owing to the repairs not having been done, the court held that the lessor was entitled to the compensation which he claimed, but stated, in 64 L. R. A.

gard to the amount claimed for the period during which the premises would be useless, that it probably would not be assessed at the full amount of the rent for the time taken in doing the repairs; and a sum which the parties had agreed upon between themselves was allowed.

Damages suffered by the landlord on account of his inability to rent premises in consequence of the state of dilapidation in which they were left, in addition to an amount expended in repairs, was allowed in Woods v. Pope, 1 Scott, 538, 1 Bing. N. C. 467, 6 Car. & P. 782.

And in a case reported by the Monthly Law Digest & Reporter from Département du Nord, Valenciennes (1893), judgment was rendered for a loss of rent since the tenant had left the premises, as well as the amount necessary for repairs.

2. Effect of demolition of premises by lessor.

In a few instances it has been urged that if, after the termination of the tenancy and upon the premises again coming into the lessor's hands, he caused them to be demolished for purposes of his own, that fact ought to operate to reduce the liability of the lessee for a failure to leave the premises in any condition or degree of repair agreed to by covenant; but without an exception, so far as discovered, the courts have held the lessee's liability unaffected by circumstances of that nature.

In Joyner v. Weeks [1891] 2 Q. B. 31, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 510, 65 L. T. N. S. 16, 39 Week. Rep. 583, 55 J. P. 725, it was held that the rule that a lessee who had covenanted to leave premises in repair at the end of the term must pay the reasonable and proper amount necessary for putting the premises into the state of repair in which they ought to have been left, was not affected in the present instance by the fact that the landlord had redemised the premises on terms that were not affected by the want of repair; and that he had agreed that part of the premises might be pulled down. Lord Esher, M. R., came to the conclusion that, if anything could prevent the application of the rule above referred to, it could only be something in the condition of the premises which affects the relation between the lessor and the lessee in respect of them, and that contracts made between lessor and a third person must be disregarded.

A tenant, who had covenanted to keep and yield up premises in repair, was held liable, after the expiration of his tenancy, for an amount estimated to be necessary to put them into repair, notwithstanding that before the expiration of the lease the landlord had entered into a verbal agreement to grant third parties a lease of the premises, and, in conformity with that agreement, the buildings were pulled down shortly after the tenant's lease came to an end. Rawlings v. Morgan, 18 C. B. N. S. 776, 34 L. J. C. P. N. S. 185, 11 Jur. N. S. 564, 12 L. T. N. S. 348, 13 Week. Rep. 746.

The fact that the landlord, upon resuming possession of leased premises, proceeded at once to pull down and reconstruct part of the buildings, was held in Inderwick v. Leech, Cab. & El. 412, 1 Times L. R. 95, to make no difference in his right to bring an action against the tenant for breach of covenant to deliver up demised premises in repair. M. M. M.

SUPREME COURT OF INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS, Plff. in Err.,

(.....Mich.....)

1. Accidental death of an assured, resulting from taking poison to frighten his wife into giving him money, is not within the provision of the policy that it does not include assurance against self-destruction or suicide.
2. Negligence of an assured, resulting in his death, is not within the provision of a life insurance policy that it does not include assurance against self-destruction or suicide.

(March 8, 1904.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Saginaw County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a mutual benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dickinson, Stevenson, Cullen, Warren, & Butzel, for plaintiff in error:

The proviso includes every case in which assured kills himself by a voluntary act, the ordinary and direct tendency of which is to produce death, and the physical consequences of which he has sufficient mental capacity to foresee.

Pierce v. Travelers' L. Ins. Co. 34 Wis. 389.

The decedent cannot escape the responsibility in law of the inevitable probabilities and certainties resulting from a conscious act. He cannot be heard to deny his assumption of such consequences.

Mr. W. F. Denfeld, for defendant in error:

Unless there are stipulations to the contrary in the policy, in accident insurance, as in life and fire insurance, injury by negligence is covered by the contract.

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that a stipulation against liability for death from suicide, sane or insane, will not defeat recovery on a policy of insurance, although insured died from an overdose of morphine voluntarily taken, where it is not shown that self-destruction was intentional, see Brown v. Sun L. Ins. Co. 51 L. R. A. 252.

A death cannot be a suicide and also an accident, and, unless the terms of the policy warranted it, a charge of negligence would be error.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the widow of one Oliver Courtemanche, and beneficiary in a certificate of membership in the defendant society, a mutual benefit association. This policy contained the following limitations upon, or exceptions to, liability, viz.: "(1) Except as provided in subsections 2 and 3 of this section, the contracts for benefits heretofore or hereafter undertaken by the supreme court do not include assurance against self-destruction or suicide, whether the member be sane or insane. (2) Any brother who commits suicide shall ipso facto avoid all his benefit certificates, and ipso facto forfeit all benefits whatsoever to which his beneficiary or beneficiaries, heir or heirs, or legal personal representative or representatives would otherwise have been entitled, under the constitution and by-laws, to receive from the supreme court, or from any branch of the supreme court; . . . " subsection 1 being printed on the policy. In an action brought upon this certificate, the plaintiff recovered death benefits to the amount of $1,000, that being the face of the policy. The defendant has asked us to review the cause upon error.

The most important question arises over a claim that, if the death was due to the voluntary taking of carbolic acid by deceased, not with the intent of causing death, but to frighten his wife into giving him money, she could not recover. The evidence was practically conclusive that the deceased died from taking carbolic acid, and there was proof from which the jury might have reached either of three conclusions: (1) That it was a case of suicide in the ordinary sense; (2) that the drug was taken under the belief that it was another and harmless drug; (3) that it was knowingly and intentionally taken for the purpose of frightening the wife, and not with an intention to cause death. The court instructed the jury that in the latter case the beneficiary would not be precluded from recovering upon the policy, and error is assigned upon this instruction.

Counsel for defendant cite, in support of their contention, the case of Lawrence v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 5 Ill. App. 282. In that case the deceased came to his death from repeated doses of laudanum, the first prescribed by a druggist, and others taken upon deceased's own judgment, after severe vomiting, under the belief that he had vomited up a portion of that taken. The policies contained the following provision: "If the said person upon whose death the policy matures shall die in consequence of a duel, or of the violation of law, or by disease, violence, or accident brought about by intoxication, or shall impair his health by narcotics, or alcoholic stimulants, . . . the company shall be released from all liability on account of this contract. It is hereby declared and agreed that the self-destruction of the person, whether voluntary or involuntary, and whether he be sane or insane at the time, is not a risk assumed by the company in this contract; but in every such case the company will, upon demand made and the surrender of this policy, accompanied with satisfactory proofs of such death, within sixty days after its occurrence, pay the net reserve held upon it by this company at the beginning of the year in which death occurs, calculated by the present legal standard of the state of New York, first deducting therefrom any indebtedness which shall have accrued to the company on account of this contract." The court said: "The present appeal, then, must be decided precisely as though the defendant had expressly admitted that the deceased, at the time of his death, was sane; that his death was involuntary, and that it occurred without negligence on his part, and as the wholly unexpected, and therefore accidental, result of means which he was using in good faith for the purpose of alleviating his physical suffering. The question, then, is, whether the accidental death of a sane person is within the meaning of the foregoing condition of the policies in suit, simply because some act of the deceased, performed with no design or intention of producing death, but for an entirely innocent purpose, and without negligence, happens to be the proximate cause of his death. We are clearly of the opinion that a purely accidental death can in no proper sense be termed an act of self-destruction. In all the cases where construction has been given by the courts to conditions in life policies relating to the death of the insured by his own hand, the terms 'suicide,' 'self-destruction,' and 'death by his own hand,' have been held to be practically synonymous. To say of a purely accidental death that it was a 'suicide,' or a 'death by his own hand,' would be simply an abuse of language. That which is purely accidental or fortuitous can no more be charged to the account of the person whose act happens by the occasion of the accident than to that of anyone else. It is only where death results from an express design on the part of the deceased, or from some act which, though performed with no intention of producing death, is of itself culpably negligent, that the deceased can be charged with the responsibility of self-destruction. If a person in the pursuit of a proper object, and in the exercise of due care, should accidentally fall into a body of water and be drowned, or should unwittingly expose himself to the smallpox or the yellow fever, not knowing at the time of the existence of the contagion, and die of the disease, it would in no proper sense be a case of self-destruction. If in either case, however, he should be culpably negligent in exposing himself to danger, although not intending to destroy his life, he would be, in the common judgment of men, the efficient instrument of his own death. . . . Upon principles quite analogous to the foregoing, it may be held that in case of a sane person, where there is an absence both of intention and culpable negligence, the death of the insured must be regarded as accidental, and not within a proviso against self-destruction. With this construction, full effect may be given to all of the words of the condition in the policies under consideration. Voluntary self-destruction obviously can mean nothing more than the taking of one's life purposely and intentionally. Involuntary self-destruction would then include all those cases where a person, without intending to accomplish his own death, carelessly and negligently does acts which may naturally and probably result, and do in fact result, in death. The condition would thus be held to include all cases where there exists on the part of the insured any direct and immediate legal or moral responsibility for his own death. To go beyond this, and relieve the insurers from liability in all cases where the acts of the insured, without design or negligence on his part, do in fact contribute to shorten or terminate his life, would in most cases render life policies of very little value to the insured."

The foregoing indicates that the court was of the opinion that death through culpable negligence would not be covered by the terms of the policy. That this was at most a dictum appears from the following conclusion of the opinion: "It follows that the defense in this case rests solely upon a charge against the insured of culpable negligence. This fact seems to be recognized by the learned counsel for the defendant, and accordingly they have endeavored in their argument to demonstrate the negligence of the insured from the evidence in the case. If they desired to avail themselves of this defense, they should have allowed the question of negligence to be presented to the jury; but, having withdrawn it from the only tribunal legally competent to decide it, they are not now in a position to insist that any negligence has been proved."

The case was again tried, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff. The court charged, in substance, that the plaintiff should recover, unless the death was the result of "either gross carelessness, or circumstances constituting him a suicide," and continued as follows: "The jury are further instructed, on the subject of negligence and gross carelessness, that, so far as the defense in this case depends thereon, that the burden of proof rests upon the defendant; and that gross carelessness consists of something more than the omission to do that which, under the circumstances of a case, an ordinarily careful man would have done to avoid injury."

The appellate court criticised the charge in this language: "It is plain that these instructions place upon the language of the 64 L. R. A.

policy an interpretation quite different from the one adopted by us on the former appeal. In our view, the exemption of the insurance company from liability depends, not upon the degree of the negligence of the insured, but upon its culpability. Indeed, we are unable to see how the ordinary division of negligence into degrees, such as slight, ordinary, and gross, can have any application here, though it may serve a very useful purpose in cases where the doctrine of contributory or comparative negligence is invoked. The true inquiry here is whether the death of the insured was the proximate result of his own negligent act, and whether such act was, under all the circumstances of the case, a culpable act. . . . The words 'voluntary' and 'involuntary' must be regarded as being used in the policy in a sense somewhat analogous to that in which they are employed in the criminal law. They do not include cases of death by accident or 'misadventure,' but they must be held to include all cases where death results immediately and proximately from the culpable negligence of the insured. Doubtless, also, if death should ensue from the performance by the insured of an unlawful or criminal act, it would be a case of involuntary self-destruction within the meaning of the policy. It follows from what we have said that the instructions limiting the effect of the condition of the policy under consideration to cases of gross negligence, and attempting to apply to this case the rules ordinarily applicable to that degree of negligence, were erroneous." [8 Ill. App. 491.]

It would seem to us, from the discussion in that case, that the defendant had nothing to complain of in the charge, for to our minds culpability implies something more than any degree of negligence; however, that does not seem to have been the view taken, and we must consider the case as holding that, while no degree of negligence without culpability will relieve a defendant, any degree of culpability will, and we do not see how there was any culpability, other than mere negligence of some degree, shown in that case. The provisions of this policy are not as broad as that involved in the Illinois case, which states that "self-destruction, though involuntary, is not a risk assumed by the company," while the policy before us excepts "assurance against self-destruction or suicide."

We approve the doctrine that losses by insurance companies through fire, accident, or death cannot be avoided, under ordinary provisions, although they are due to want of care. Any other doctrine would make insurance nearly valueless, especially accident insurance; and if there is any doctrine applicable to cases arising upon contracts of insurance, akin to that of contributory negligence in actions of tort, we are not aware of it. Upon the other hand, there is some apparent force in the claim that insurance companies and those who contract with them do not anticipate that the insured will intentionally, deliberately, and unnecessarily incur the hazard of death by poison to coerce another into the payment of money to him, or for any other reason.

This is a peculiar case. Perhaps none could arise where the act of the deceased (if defendant's claim is true) could present a more pusillanimous act. We can imagine cases in which acts of great hazard and danger would be heroic, and of which we should be reluctant to say that policies were avoided because the insured intentionally and understandingly faced almost certain death, as in the case of succoring the drowning or the burning. Between these two extremes all kinds of cases can be imagined where risks are taken for pleasure, for profit, or from humanitarian motives, and we see no way of distinguishing between them, unless it be upon moral grounds. Perhaps the word "culpability" is a proper one to use if not enlarged to include negligence, in which no moral question is involved, but we think such a question would be more appropriately raised under a provision excepting cases of death caused while engaged in an unlawful act,—a provision found in most policies, and regarding which the authorities are numerous.

We are cited to the case of Ritter v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 169 U. S. 157, 42 L. ed. 699, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 300, in support of the proposition that the act of the insured should preclude recovery. The question in that case was whether a recovery could be had in a case of suicide while sane, in the absence of a provision in the policy excepting such cases. It was held that recovery could not be had in such a case, upon the ground that the parties did not contemplate insurance against deliberate, intentional self-destruction. The case is compared to and classed with the wilful burning of insured property, and several similar cases are cited and discussed, viz.: Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, where the beneficiary murdered the insured; Hatch v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 120 Mass. 550, 21 Am. Rep. 541, where a married woman died from an unlawful operation voluntarily submitted to; Supreme Commandery, K. of G. R. v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 46 Am. Rep. 332, where it was held that suicide was an exception to the contract of insurance, though not specifically made so by the policy: also the case of Amicable Soc. v. Bol- land, 4 Bligh, N. R. 194, 2 Dow & C. 1, cited in support of the doctrine that, as a general proposition, "the law will not enforce contracts and agreements that are against the public good, and therefore are forbidden by public policy." In that case the assured was executed for forgery. In disposing of the case the court said: "It appears to me that this resolves itself into a very plain and simple consideration. Suppose that in the policy itself this risk had been insured against,—that is, that the party insuring had agreed to pay a sum of money year by year, upon condition that, in the event of his committing a capital felony, and being tried, convicted, and executed for that felony, his assignees shall receive a certain sum of money,—is it possible that such a contract could be sustained? Is it not void upon the plainest principles of public policy? Would not such a contract (if available) take away one of those restraints operating on the minds of men against the commission of crimes,—namely, the interest we have in the welfare and prosperity of our connections? Now, if a policy of that description, with such a form of condition inserted in it in express terms, cannot, on grounds of public policy, be sustained, how is it to be contended that, in a policy expressed in such terms as the present, and after the events which have happened, we can sustain such a claim? Can we, in considering this policy, give to it the effect of that insertion, which, if expressed in terms, would have rendered the policy, as far as that condition went at least, altogether void?"

Counsel persuasively apply the same test to this case, and urge that a policy which in express terms should contemplate and provide insurance against the danger resulting from the voluntary taking a chance of death, as in this case, would be void, as opposed to public policy. If the proofs showed that this was an experiment to determine whether death would follow the taking of the drug, showing that the contingency of death was not overlooked, it is possible that we might be justified in saying that such act, if followed by death, was not within the intent of the parties to the contract; but there is nothing in this case to indicate a design to take life, or that deceased thought that he was courting danger of death. We cannot suppose that anyone would approve such an act as taking poison to coerce a wife, through sympathy or fear, but we are not sure that the test applied in the Bolland Case can be safely treated as an infallible one. We are unable to find any case where this has been so held, or any where the rule has been applied, except where the act has been criminal or accompanied by an intention to produce death. In the Alabama case cited it is said: "The doctrine asserted in Fauntleroy's Case [4 Bligh, N. R. 194, 2 Dow & C. 1] that death by the hands of public justice, the punishment for the commission of crime, avoids a contract of life insurance, though it is not so expressed in the contract, has not, so far as we have examined, been questioned, though the case itself may have led to the very general introduction of the exception into policies. The same considerations and reasoning which support the doctrine seem to lead, of necessity, to the conclusion that voluntary, criminal self-destruction—suicide, as defined at common law—should be implied as an exception to the liability of the insurer, or, rather, as not within the risks contemplated by the parties, reluctant as the courts may be to introduce, by construction, or implication, exceptions into such contracts, which usually contain special exceptions." Again: "The fair and just interpretation of a contract of life insurance made with the assured is that the risk is of death proceeding from other causes than the voluntary act of the assured producing, or intended to produce, it;" and that "the extinction of life by disease, or by accident, not suicide, voluntary and intentional, by the assured, while in his senses, is the risk intended; and it is not intended that, without the hazard of loss, the assured may safely commit crime."

If one points a loaded pistol at himself, with no intention to fire, his death, being caused by its unintentional discharge, would be accidental, and not suicidal, and the beneficiary under such a policy as this should be allowed to recover, for the death, though self-destruction in one sense, in another was not, the immediate cause being the unexpected and accidental discharge, and not the pointing of the pistol, which was in itself a harmless, though perhaps a risky, act. The death in such case is a fortuitous result, not even a probable one, and such deaths are covered by policies. The case in question cannot be distinguished in principle from the foregoing, except in the greater degree of danger of a fatal result, or in the nature of the motive actuating the deceased. In the former the victim would believe he would be safe as long as he did not pull the trigger; in the latter that he would not die if he limited the dose taken to an amount that would be insufficient, ordinarily, to cause death. A fatal result in either case, being unintended, and unexpected, would be accidental, regardless of the motive which should prompt the act. It should be stated that such a death might not be covered by a policy which by its terms excepts cases where death or accident is due to voluntary exposure to danger, as in the Illinois policies discussed.

From the foregoing it would seem to follow that negligence is not a reason for relieving the insurer, and the motive certainly would not be in some of the instances we have mentioned. We do not see that the fact that the motive alleged here was to work upon the sympathy or fears of his wife would make the death of the insured any the less accidental, or that the act was a criminal one, and we are of the opinion that the court did not err in declining to direct the jury that they should treat this claim as a sufficient defense, if proved.

Upon the trial the defendant's counsel introduced in evidence a letter written by plaintiff to defendant's lawyer, at his suggestion. Plaintiff testified: "After the death of my husband, I talked with Mr. Elliott G. Stevenson, of Detroit, once at Mr. Allen's office in this city, and once in Bay City. The talk I had with him at Saginaw led up to the writing of the letter that is introduced in evidence. I didn't see him at a meeting of the Foresters. I don't know what he came to Saginaw for. It was something about the Foresters, and I knew he was in town, and I made it my business to see him, because I wanted to see what he had to say about paying that insurance, and he told me that the executive council was to meet in a short time, a week or two afterwards, and he would see what he could do for me, and he told me to write him a letter a short time before, so he would have that to put before the council, whatever it was, to show if I could give any excuse for it; if I knew of any reason at all why he should have committed suicide, or anything of the kind." The letter is as follows:

Mr. E. G. Stevenson.

Dear Sir:

My husband, Oliver Courtemanche, was a member of Court Valley 232, of East Saginaw, and died Sep. 28/98. The Corinors jury brought in a verdict of Sueside while Under the Influence of Liquor which was Intirely False and unjust as he had not been Drinking at all that Day. Dr. F. W. Freeman who conducted the Post Mortem also sais that there was not a Drop of Liquor or Beer of any kind in his stomach and if he took Carbollic Acid as they say he did I honistly and Firmly do not think it was with the Intentions of Killing himself but rather to scare me into giving him Money he had given three different People his cheque and had no Money in the Bank and he knew he would get into trouble over it and I had told him that I would not help him eny more and Borrow Money for him and he had borrowed all He could and so I presume he thought he would have to do something more Desperet than usual In Order to Scare me Into getting the Money for him And so tryed that way of doing it and took more than he Intended for there is no reason that I know of why he should want to Kill Himself We had not quarreled And always got along well together and there was nothing that trubbled him that I can find out outside of those cheques and surly Twelve Dollars the Amount of three cheques wasent worth killing onesself for and I know he did not Intend to do It for he always spoke and acted as if he had a horror of suicide. It is Nearly a year and two Months since he Died but the Foristers havent Paid me the Thousand Dollars the amount his Policy calls for and I should very much like to have it as he carried no other Insurance and it is all I have in the world and I have Myself to suport and It would be very nice to know I had something for a Rainey Day. Will you kindly present this to the supream council at there next Meeting and ask them to Please Pay Me and I will be sincerely grateful to You and Them.

(Signed) Mrs. Emma Courtemanche.

Counsel requested the court to charge:

"The letter written by plaintiff in this case, in which certain admissions are made by her in respect to quarrels and the issuing of checks fraudulently, and the possible desire on the part of her husband to do something more desperate than usual, was proper evidence in this case against the plaintiff, and you shall consider such admissions for what they are worth in arriving at the question as to whether the plaintiff's intestate did not, for these reasons, and with the motive therein stated, take the carbolice acid or drug in question, and for no legitimate purpose."

This was not all of the request, the remainder being as follows: "If you find that he did so take the drug, and that, contrary to his expectation, the dose was fatal, even though such thought was farthest from his mind, nevertheless death resulting from such act would be suicide, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this case save such amount as defendant has offered to pay in open court."

Having determined that the rule is not as stated in the last-quoted portion of the request, it is manifest that the court did not err in refusing a request of which it was a part. We think it unnecessary to discuss the other questions raised.

The judgment is affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

v.

DETROIT, YPSILANTI, & ANN ARBOR RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. An express agreement with the promoters of a corporation for compensation for services rendered for its benefit will not prevent reliance on an implied one to recover the value of the services from the corporation in case it accepts the benefit of the services but repudiates the agreement.
2. Employment for a year is a fulfillment of a contract to give an attorney permanent employment in consideration of services rendered in the formation of a corporation, since the contract is indefinite and terminable at the will of either party.

(Grant, J., dissents from proposition 1.)

(March 8, 1904.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of services alleged to have been rendered by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

Some time in the summer or fall of 1897, three men, Messrs. Russell, Angus, and Liggett, entered into a scheme for the organization of an electric railway to run from Detroit to Ann Arbor. There already existed a street railway in Ypsilanti, another in Ann Arbor, and a third between those two cities. The scheme was to unite those three, and extend the road to Detroit. Plaintiff was an attorney at law in the city of Detroit, and had been engaged in practice for about eleven years, the first three and one half years of which he was a clerk in the law office of Hon. Don M. Dickinson, and after that engaged in practice by himself or in partnership with others. He was known to Mr. Russell, one of the promoters. It was deemed necessary to have legal advice and the services of an attorney in preparing and drawing papers. Plaintiff claims that the three original promoters agreed to employ him. The agreement rested in parol, and, as stated by plaintiff, is as follows: "Mr. John A. Russell came to me first, and told me of the enterprise they had on hand, which was to build a road between Detroit and

NOTE.—For other cases in this series as to contracts for permanent employment, see Carrig v. Carr, 35 L. R. A. 512, and note; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Mathews, 39 L. R. A. 467; and Rhoades v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 55 L. R. A. 170.

Ann Arbor; and told me that Mr. Angus and Mr. Liggett were in with him, and wanted to know whether I could handle the law business,—what kind of an arrangement they could make. They said that they would have no bonds or stock for me, but wanted to know if I would take it on consideration of being made permanent attorney. After some consideration I said that I would, provided the expenses would be paid. Then I was introduced to Mr. Angus and Mr. Liggett by Mr. Russell, and I made an arrangement with them to the same effect,—that I was to go ahead and do all the legal business connected with the enterprise, help them to secure franchises, do anything on that line they called upon me to do until the enterprise would be a success, or in such condition it was sure of success. In the meantime I would be paid my expenses, and if it was not a success I was not to get any compensation; but if it was a success I was to be made permanent attorney of the road. . . . There was no different arrangement under which I performed these services."

Mr. Angus was introduced as a witness for the plaintiff, and testified that he did not recollect that there was any condition to the appointment of Mr. Sullivan. He further testified:

Q. What compensation was he to receive if the project was successful?

A. My connection with it was, Would I consent to his becoming attorney for the company?

Q. Permanent attorney, after the organization of the company?

A. I do not recollect any permanent.

Q. That he should be appointed attorney. You did not mean to terminate in a year?

A. No, I had not anything special in mind as to length of time. It did not occur to me at that time.

Q. He was to be the regular employed attorney; that was your understanding?

A. Yes, I think that I will put it that way. I think I will say it was. . . . The substance of what was said to him, to the best of my recollection, is that I would be favorable to his appointment as attorney for the company.

Mr. Liggett was produced by the defendant, and denied any such contract as is claimed by the plaintiff, but testified that his understanding from the talk with Mr. Russell was that plaintiff was doing the work for Mr. Russell. Mr. Russell was not produced as a witness. Plaintiff had no other talk with any stockholder or officer of the company in regard to his employment or this alleged contract. Under his own testimony the contract was made with these three promoters, and was never divulged to any other stockholder or officer of the corporation until after his employment under the resolution hereinafter referred to had terminated. In his conversation with Hawks at that time he only claimed that he had made the arrangement with Angus and Russell. Mr. Russell told Mr. Hawks that he had employed Mr. Sullivan, and that his (Sullivan's) services were a part of what he (Russell) was putting into the company,—“a part of his contribution to the enterprise.” Mr. Hawks received no information of any different arrangement until he received the letter of March 15, 1898, when Mr. Russell sold his stock in the company—980 shares—to Mr. Hawks. In the letter offering to sell he said: “Inasmuch as I have been active in securing the franchises and doing preliminary work for this company which has necessitated the making of promises of various natures in return for assistance rendered, I desire, as a further consideration that these promises made by me, which I will no longer be able to carry out, be composed along the following lines: (1) Mr. J. E. Sullivan, who did all the preliminary law work for the company gratuitously in consideration of permanent employment as attorney of the company for and after March 1st, to be guaranteed such employment for the period of one year at the rate of $1,500 per year, payable monthly.”

On March 15, 1898, the board of directors, six in number, passed a resolution, reading as follows: “That J. Emmet Sullivan be employed as the attorney for the period of one year from and after March 1, 1898, at an annual salary of $1,500, payable in monthly instalments; this payment to be in full settlement of services to date and for the coming year.” At the organization of the company, November 2, 1897, four other men became stockholders of the corporation, and signed the articles of incorporation, among whom was Mr. Hawks, who afterwards became president of the company. Mr. Russell became its secretary. There were at the time of the adoption of the above resolution six directors, three of whom were Hawks, Russell, and Angus. Of these six directors only two—Russell and Angus—had any knowledge of the arrangement made with the plaintiff. Mr. Sullivan was paid $125 per month during the year. He afterwards attended to some suits, and did some other business, for which he received $600. After the expiration of the year for which he was employed he made claim to Mr. Hawks for $15,000 for services rendered to the company from November 2, 1897, to March 1, 1898. The company denied liability, and thereupon plaintiff brought this suit upon the common counts in assumpsit. He rendered no bill of items to the defendant, and his bill of particulars filed in the suit recited the services in drawing the articles of association, bond and mortgage, and other papers, giving advice, attending meetings of the directors, and negotiating the purchase from the three companies, etc., for which he claimed the lump sum of $15,000. He recovered a verdict and judgment for $9,028.12.

Mr. Otto Kirchner, with Messrs. Corliss, Andrus, Leete, & Joslyn, for plaintiff in error:

The appointment of plaintiff by defendant as its attorney for one year at a salary of $1,500, which has been fully paid, did, in law, operate as a complete accord and satisfaction of plaintiff's claim. Such an appointment was a permanent appointment within the true intent and meaning of the parties.

Messrs. Elliott G. Stevenson and Leo M. Butzel, with Messrs. Sullivan, Bland, Cook, & Van Syckle, for defendant in error.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The theory of the declaration and of the right of recovery in this case is that plaintiff had no express contract with the defendant, but that he rendered services for it under such circumstances that the law implies a contract, and presumes a promise by the defendant to pay for the services so rendered, and of which it has had the benefit. Plaintiff's own evidence conclusively establishes the fact that he had no contract, either express or implied, with the defendant, until the contract of employment of March 15th, but that he made an express contract with the three original promoters of the scheme to perform the services for which he now seeks to recover, upon their agreement that they should make him the permanent attorney of the company. He had no other agreement, and at no time until more than a year after the services were rendered did he make any claim to any of its officers of the contract which he now asserts was made. These promoters could make no contract for the defendant, which was not then organized. That contract could not bind the corporation until it was known to and approved by it. The knowledge of Messrs. Russell and Angus, after they became directors, was not the knowledge of the corporation. The only knowledge possessed by Mr. Hawks, its president, was that plaintiff was the personal employee of Mr. Russell. This statement did not, of course, bind the plaintiff, but shows that Hawks had no knowledge of plaintiff's alleged contract. When, under plaintiff's version of the contract, did he begin to render services for the defendant? Certainly not until the corporation was organized. But his contract with these three promoters was that the scheme should be a success, not that the company should be organized. If the promoters had secured options for the purchase of the three companies then in existence and franchises from the townships along the proposed line before the organization of the company, and it had not been organized until all his services in carrying out his contract has been performed, would the corporation with new stockholders and new directors have been liable, either under the express contract or under an implied contract for his services, performed under the special contract? The promoters evidently thought it wise to organize the company early as one of the means to assist in carrying out the scheme. But plaintiff performed services no more for the corporation in one case than in the other. He made his contract with the promoters. He knew he could not enforce it against the corporation. If he chose to make a contract which he could not enforce against the promoters, under Durgin v. Smith (Mich.) 94 N. W. 1044, it is his misfortune. But whether he could enforce his contract with them is immaterial here. The circuit judge correctly instructed the jury that plaintiff could not recover in accordance with that agreement, but instructed them that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, he was entitled to recover what his services were reasonably worth. The fatal error of the charge and of the plaintiff's theory is that he had an express contract with the promoters which precludes any possibility of an implied contract with the corporation. Plaintiff, a lawyer, must have known that the contract could not bind the future corporation, unless, after it was formed, it knew of its existence and ratified it.

If we understand the argument of counsel correctly, it is that the defendant never ratified the contract made with the three promoters before the organization of the company, but, having received the benefit of his services rendered under that contract, the law implies a promise on its part to pay, not in accordance with the contract, but on a separate and distinct implied contract. If defendant had ratified the contract and appointed plaintiff its attorney in accordance therewith, and that was carried out for a year, and then broken by the defendant, the only remedy of plaintiff would be an action upon the contract for the breach thereof. If, as he contends, his employment was virtually for life, or for the life of the corporation, he could not, in the event of a subsequent violation of the contract by the defendant, recover upon the basis of an implied contract the value of his services previously rendered. After six years such claim would be barred by the statute of limitations. A contract will be implied only when no express contract exists. If A makes an express contract with B to perform services for C, C is not liable on an implied contract because he received the benefit. The two contracts cannot exist together, governing the same transaction. "As in physics two solid bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, so in law and common sense there cannot be an express and an implied contract for the same thing existing at the same time. This is an axiomatic truth. It is only when parties do not expressly agree that the law interposes and raises a promise." Walker v. Brown, 28 Ill. 378, 383, 81 Am. Dec. 287. So, plaintiff could not have an express contract with these three promoters that they, in consideration for his services in assisting to successfully accomplish the scheme, would make him the permanent attorney of the company, and at the same time have an implied contract with the company to pay him for the same services. Lyndon Mill Co. v. Lyndon Literary & Biblical Inst. 63 Vt. 581, 25 Am. St. Rep. 783, 22 Atl. 575; Royston v. McCulley (Tenn. Ch. App.) 52 L. R. A. 899, 59 S. W. 725; Thorp v. Bateman, 37 Mich. 68, 26 Am. Rep. 497; Boughton v. Boughton, 111 Mich. 27, 69 N. W. 94. In Walker v. Brown, S., assuming to act for himself and for defendants, made a contract with plaintiff to perform certain work. The work was done, but S. had no authority to bind defendants. Thereupon plaintiff sought to recover from defendants upon an implied contract for the value of the work, which was beneficial to them. The court held that the express contract, executory in its provisions, totally excluded any implication of an implied one. In Lyndon Mill Co. v. Lyndon Literary & Biblical Inst. the defendant received the benefit of certain lumber furnished under an arrangement between some of the directors of the two companies. The contract was a personal one between the directors. Plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant upon the ground that it had the benefit of the lumber furnished, and that the law implied a promise to pay. The court held that the express contract excluded any liability on the part of defendant. In Thorp v. Bateman the defendant made an express contract with Thorp by which Thorp's infant daughter was to live with Bateman until she became of age. Bateman's wife died, and Thorp then took his daughter away. Bateman sued Thorp upon an implied contract. It was held that, if Thorp violated the express contract, "its existence and the breach thereof cannot be the foundation for an implied assumpsit of a wholly different character." This is not the case of Davis v. Strobbridge, 44 Mich. 157, 6 N. W. 205, where the vendor in a parol land contract, which had become valid by part performance, repudiated it, and the vendee was allowed to recover as his damages that part of the purchase price which he had paid and the value of the improvements put upon the land.

It is manifest from the record that the verdict was rendered upon an entirely false basis. The late Edwin F. Conely, then living, and a witness for defendant, testified to the value of such services as the plaintiff rendered. He was permitted, on cross-examination by the plaintiff's counsel, to state what services such as these rendered by the plaintiff would be worth upon the contingency that he was to receive nothing if the scheme did not succeed. Witness replied, "Well, I should say $7,500." This is the precise amount of the verdict, with interest added. The motion to strike this testimony out should have been granted. Plaintiff could not recover upon the contingent contract with plaintiff, and therefore all evidence of this contingency was incompetent, and should have been eliminated from the consideration of the jury.

If the above views are correct, there would be no occasion to discuss any other question. But my brethren do not agree with me in holding that the plaintiff, having made an express contract, cannot, under the circumstances, rely upon an implied one. It therefore becomes necessary to determine another question, which I proceed now to discuss.

The other important question raised is, Assuming that plaintiff had a contract as claimed, was it performed on the part of the defendants by his employment for a year? When he entered upon his employment, and as well during the entire year, he believed that he was employed under his agreement with the three promoters; that the company had ratified that agreement, and that he was made the permanent attorney for the company.

Upon this point he testified as follows:

I received $125 a month, and receipted for it each month. I understood that I was to receive $1,500 a year, and did not stop to inquire whether any resolution to that effect had been passed at all. I considered that I had an agreement for permanent employment, and did not need a resolution, and did not stop to inquire.

Q. Did not inquire how the $1,500 had been fixed?

A. I knew how that was fixed.

Q. When did you first know that?

A. The arrangement I had was to get $1,200 a year and $300. I was sworn on the last trial, and testified that $1,200 had been mentioned, and office rent in the first year. The $300 over $1,200 was in lieu of office rent. That is the way I took it. I was content with that. I did not get any office rent from them.

Q. Don't you know, as a matter of fact, the salary was fixed at $1,500 a year because your friend, Mr. Russell, had asked that you be employed one year at $1,500?

A. I did not state what they say on the last trial—

Q. Did anybody confer with you as to fixing the salary at $1,500 in lieu for your services and in lieu of your office rent?

A. No, sir; they did not.

Q. Simply began to pay at the rate of $1,500 a year?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Never questioned it?

A. Never questioned it. I thought they were carrying out their agreement with me.

Q. Never asked why it was done, or what resolution was passed?

A. I did not have to, because I had an agreement.

Q. Answer the question, Did you or did you not?

A. I did not.

He also testified that when, at the expiration of the year, he was informed by Mr. Hawks that his services were no longer required, he told Mr. Hawks, "I said my arrangement with you was that I was to be permanent attorney for the road, and he said, 'No such thing;' and I said there was; and I said, 'I made it to Mr. Angus and Russell.'" Mr. Russell was not called as a witness by plaintiff, though he had no connection whatever with the company. Mr. 64 L. R. A.

Russell placed his construction of his agreement with plaintiff in the letter written to Mr. Hawks March 15th, in which he said, in substance, in consideration of Mr. Sullivan's doing preliminary work he had agreed to give him permanent employment as attorney of the company, and requested that he be employed for one year at a salary of $1,500 per year. On the same day the directors met, and passed the resolution of employment, in accordance with the terms of that letter. This was the first notification to the company of the plaintiff's alleged agreement. Whether, under these facts, the resolution amounted to ratification of the agreement of Mr. Russell with plaintiff, it is probably unnecessary to determine. If the agreement was ratified, plaintiff's only remedy, as above stated, would be upon the contract for a violation thereof. Hobbs v. Brush Electric Co. 75 Mich. 550, 42 N. W. 965.

Upon the assumption that plaintiff had a binding contract for permanent employment, and was employed for one year at a salary of $1,500, which has been fully paid, counsel for defendant insist that this was a permanent employment within the true intent and meaning of the parties, and that it operated as a complete accord and satisfaction of his claim. Counsel for defendant cite in support of its contention Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Offutt, 99 Ky. 427, 59 Am. St. Rep. 467, 36 S. W. 181; Perry v. Wheeler, 12 Bush, 541; Elderton v. Emmens, 4 C. B. 479, 16 L. J. C. P. N. S. 209, 11 Jur. 612; Lord v. Goldberg, 81 Cal. 596, 15 Am. St. Rep. 82, 22 Pac. 1126; Roddy v. McGetrick, 49 Ala. 159. In Elderton v. Emmens the contract was identical with this, except that there was no contingency of success. It was urged that the word "permanent" implied an appointment, if not for life, at least for so long a time as the society should require the services of a solicitor and the plaintiff gave no cause for dismissal. The court took a contrary view, saying: "Whether the expression 'permanent attorney and solicitor' means an employment for life, or so long as the company shall exist, or what, we have no means of judging." The court held that it meant no other than a general employment, and said that, if it had been the intention of the parties to give to the word "permanent" the sense contended for by the plaintiff, the agreement would have contained a variety of stipulations that were not found in it. In Roddy v. McGetrick the plaintiff contracted for permanent employment as clerk for the defendant at a salary of $75 per month. The court instructed the jury: "If the employment was not for a month, a reasonable construction would be for a year, in the absence of a construction by the parties." This instruction was sustained. In Perry v. Wheeler a clergyman was elected permanently to the rectorship of a church. The contract was held to be for an indefinite period, and terminable at the will of either party. In Lord v. Goldberg it was "agreed by and between plaintiff and defendants that, in consideration of his entering into their employment as such solicitor, and using all his efforts to secure certain named persons as customers, and to extend their business, 'they would give him permanent employment so long as he should use his best efforts to extend their business, paying him at the rate of $20 per week, and increase his salary as the business increased.'" It was held that such contract was for an indefinite time, and continued only until either of the parties should wish to sever the relation. It further appears in that case that plaintiff was in the employ of another party in the same business, and that he gave up that employment under his contract with the defendants. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Offutt the railroad company employed the plaintiff, agreeing to keep him in its service so long as he did faithful and honest work. The contract was held terminable by either party at any time. In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 846, the railway company entered into an agreement with the city of Marshall by which the city donated to the construction of the road $300,000 and 66 acres of land in consideration that the railway company "agreed to permanently establish its eastern terminus and Texas offices at the city of Marshall, and to establish and construct at said city the main machine shops and carworks of said railroad company." The company carried out the contract by constructing its shops and establishing its offices at Marshall as provided. At the expiration of eight years Marshall ceased to be the eastern terminus of the road, and the company removed some of its shops. It was held that the contract for permanent establishment was complied with by the establishment of the terminus and the offices and shops contracted for with no intention at the time of removing or abandoning them. It was there said: "If, however, the city desired . . . to make sure that these establishments should forever remain within the limits of the city of Marshall, and that the railroad company should be bound to keep them forever, such extraordinary obligation should have been acknowledged in words which admitted of no controversy. It would have been very easy to have inserted into this contract language which forbade the company from ever removing the terminus of the road to some other point, or from ever removing or ceasing to use the depot or the car and machine shops, and thus have made the obligation perpetual." A permanent abode is a home, which a party may leave as interest or whim may dictate, but which he has no present intention to abandon. Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170. Permanent employment means "employment for an indefinite time, which may be severed by either party." Bouvier, Law. Dict. Such contracts, in the absence of special considerations, conditions, and circumstances, are not construed to continue indefinitely, but are terminable at any time by either party. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 16. The term "permanent employment" has, under special circumstances and conditions, been construed to mean continuous or indefinite employment, not terminable at the will of either party.

Counsel for plaintiff cite and rely upon Carnig v. Carr, 167 Mass. 544, 35 L. R. A. 512, 57 Am. St. Rep. 488, 46 N. E. 117; Stearns v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 112 Mich. 653, 71 N. W. 148; Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan, 6 Ind. App. 109, 51 Am. St. Rep. 289, 32 N. E. 802; Carter White Lead Co. v. Kinlin, 47 Neb. 409, 66 N. W. 536; McMullan v. Dickinson Co. 63 Minn. 405, 65 N. W. 661, 663. In Carnig v. Carr the contract was that if the plaintiff, an enameleer, would give up his business, and enter that of the defendant in the same occupation, he would furnish him permanent employment at stipulated wages. After employment for several months defendant discharged plaintiff, though he had plenty of work of that kind for him to do. The court said: "To ascertain what the parties intended by 'permanent employment,' it is necessary to consider the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract, its subject, the situation and relation of the parties, and the sense in which, taking these things into account, the words would be commonly understood." Applying this rule of construction, the court found that the contract meant employment so long as the defendant was engaged in the business of enameling, and had work which the plaintiff could do and desired to do, and so long as plaintiff was able to do the work satisfactorily. It was held not to mean life employment. In Stearns v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. plaintiff was seriously injured while in the employ of the defendant, and brought suit against the defendant for damages. The defendant settled with him by paying him $175, and making an agreement to employ him in the capacity of baggage master during his entire life or his ability to do the work. The basis of liability in that case was the surrender and cancellation of a claim against the company. Such cases are Harrington v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 60 Mo. App. 223; Pennsyl- vania Co. v. Dolan, and Carter White Lead Co. v. Kintin. In McMullan v. Dickinson Co. the contract which the court sustained was in writing, and provided that the defendant should employ the plaintiff as an assistant manager; said employment to continue during the time of the business of said corporation, not exceeding the term and existence of said corporation, and so long as plaintiff should own and hold in his own name 50 shares of the capital stock, fully paid up, in said corporation. Counsel for plaintiff seek to bring this contract within the above cases cited by them for the reason that the plaintiff agreed to render some services for which he was not to be compensated unless the enterprise was a success; in other words, that he rendered services in consideration that he was to be made permanent attorney. Plaintiff gave up no occupation or business, as did plaintiff in Carrig v. Carr. On the contrary, he maintained his law business the same as usual, during the same time, at the same place, and in the same office. He gave up none of his other work. He released no claim and gave no past consideration for the contract, as was done in Stearns v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. and similar cases. He did not agree to devote his entire time as a manager or assistant manager, nor agree to hold any stock in the corporation, as did plaintiff in McMullan v. Dickinson Co. He had no claims for damages or otherwise to release, as did the plaintiffs in the other cases cited. Immediately after his employment he drew the articles of association, and the defendant was duly organized. According to his own statement and theory of the contract, he then became the attorney for the defendant, with the understanding that, if the defendant secured the franchises contemplated, the company should make him its permanent attorney. This employment, under his theory, dated from the organization of the company. All the services to be rendered were services as the attorney for the company. All the services contemplated and provided for were current and future services. The life of the corporation was thirty years. Legal services would be required during the term of its existence. It follows that this contract was either a contract binding for thirty years upon the defendant, or else it was terminable at the will of either party. The contract is unusual, and it certainly should be made to clearly appear that the parties intended to make it. If that was in fact their intention, they were singularly unfortunate in the use of language necessary to bind a corporation to employ a lawyer for thirty years. It is significant that neither of the three persons with whom plaintiff alleges he made the contract supposed they were making such a one as plaintiff now claims. If the clergyman in Perry v. Wheeler had agreed to preach four months upon trial, with the agreement that, if his preaching were found satisfactory, the church would employ him permanently, would that have changed the construction of the contract? If plaintiff in Roddy v. McGettrick had agreed to work as clerk for four months on trial, with an agreement for permanent employment if his work was satisfactory, would the holding have been different? If the lawyer in Elderton v. Emmens had agreed to do the legal work of the company for four months with the agreement that, if his legal services were satisfactory, the defendant would employ him as permanent attorney and solicitor for the society, would the court have given a different construction of the word "permanent?" I find it impossible to conclude that the parties who made this contract contemplated that the plaintiff was to be employed for thirty years, or as long as he was able to do the legal work of the defendant. I think the case falls clearly within the authorities first above cited, and that the employment under the above resolution was a full compliance with its terms.

The judgment is reversed, and, inasmuch as it is impossible for the plaintiff to make out any different case upon a new trial, I think none should be granted.

Hooker, Ch. J., and Montgomery and Moore, JJ., concur in the reversal of the case upon the last point stated in the opinion. Carpenter, J., did not sit.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover a fine for violation of a city ordinance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of GANTT, J., delivered in division No. 2, which was as follows:

This is a civil action by the city of St. Louis to recover a fine of $100 for the violation of § 5 of a city ordinance of said city, numbered 18,407, approved April 6, 1896, which said section is in these words: "No dairy or cow stable shall hereafter be erected, built, or established within the limits of this city without first having obtained permission so to do from the municipal assembly by proper ordinance, and no dairy or cow stable not in operation at the time of the approval of this ordinance shall be maintained on the premises unless permission so to do shall have been obtained from the municipal assembly by proper ordinance. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500." The complaint charged that defendant, in the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, on the 16th day of November, 1898, and on divers other days and times prior thereto, was the occupant of certain premises, known as 7208 and 7210 North Broadway, in said city, and did then and there erect, build, and establish on said premises a dairy and cow stable, without first having obtained permission so to do from the municipal assembly by proper ordinance, and furthermore did at said times and place maintain said dairy and cow stable without having obtained permission from said municipal assembly of said city by proper ordinance, and that said dairy and cow stable was not in operation at the time of the approval of said ordinance No. 64 L. R. A.

18,407, to wit, April 6, 1896, contrary to the said ordinance. The defendant was found guilty in the police court, and appealed to the court of criminal correction. In the last-mentioned court he moved to quash the complaint on nine grounds, as follows: "(1) Because the statement does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute any offense under the ordinances of the city of St. Louis. (2) Because § 5 of said ordinance No. 18,407 is unconstitutional and void for the reason that it operates to deprive a person of property without due process of law. (3) Because said § 5 is void as being unreasonable and oppressive to the citizen and the property owner. (4) Because said section is void, there being no power or authority granted to the municipal assembly by the charter of the city of St. Louis to pass the same. (5) Because said section is retrospective in its nature and application, and therefore in violation of the rights of private property. (6) Because said § 5 is void, being a delegation of the powers of the municipal assembly. (7) Because said section is in violation of § 30, art. 2, of the Constitution of the state of Missouri. (8) Because said § 5 is in violation of § 4 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri. (9) Because said § 5 is void as being in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; 'nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'" The court of criminal correction overruled this motion, and thereupon entered his plea of not guilty, and the cause was submitted to that court upon an agreed statement of facts, without a jury; and the court found defendant guilty of a violation of said ordinance, and fined him $100, from which he appeals to this court.

The agreed statement of facts is in these words: "It is hereby agreed and stipulated by and between the parties to the above-entitled cause, by their respective attorneys, that said cause may be submitted and tried upon the following statement of facts, to wit: The plaintiff, the city of St. Louis, is a municipal corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Missouri; and defendant is, and was on the 16th day of November, 1898, the occupant of certain premises, known as 7208 and 7210 North Broadway, in the city of St. Louis, state of Missouri, upon which premises at said time stood a dwelling house and frame stable, which had been erected and built prior to the occupancy of said premises by defendant. At the time of the approval of ordinance No. 18,407 of said city, said premises, buildings, and stable were occupied and in use by a certain party, other than this defendant, for the purpose of operating a dairy and maintaining a cow stable; and this defendant was at the same time operating a dairy and maintaining a cow stable on premises known as No. 6305 Bulwer avenue, said city and state. Some time in the month of March, 1898, the said premises at Nos. 7208 and 7210 North Broadway were abandoned as a dairy and cow stable, and the dwelling house thereon was occupied by a private family for residence purposes only; and no dairy or cow stable was maintained on said premises from March, 1898, until some time in September, 1898. In September, 1898, defendant moved his cows (about thirty in number) from premises No. 6305 Bulwer avenue, onto premises Nos. 7208 and 7210 North Broadway, said city, placed them in the old stable, and did proceed to conduct upon said premises a dairy establishment, and produce from said cows milk, and sell the same to his customers for profit, and was so doing on the said 16th day of November, 1898, without having first obtained permission so to do from the municipal assembly by proper ordinance, as provided by § 5 of ordinance No. 18,407 of the city of St. Louis, approved April 6, 1896. It is hereby stipulated and agreed by the parties to this cause, by their respective attorneys, that the printed ordinance, marked 'exhibit A,' which is attached to and made a part of this agreed statement of facts, is a full, true, and correct copy of said ordinance No. 18,407, and may be considered in evidence in this cause."

The transcript in this case is somewhat difficult to understand. It is either all record proper, or all bill of exceptions. There is nothing in the nature of the record proper, showing a trial, the entry of judgment, the filing of any of the motions, or the action taken by the court thereon. There is nothing in the transcript showing any copy of the affidavit for appeal, the bond for appeal, or the order granting an appeal to this court. At the same time these matters are set forth as if in a bill of exceptions, signed by the judge of the trial court.

1. The city of St. Louis is a municipal corporation existing under a charter framed and adopted by the qualified voters therein on the 22d day of August, 1876, which took effect October 22, 1876 (State ex rel. Boach v. Sutton, 3 Mo. App. 388), pursuant to the provisions of §§ 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 of article 9 of the Constitution of Missouri of 1875, and has all the force and effect of a charter which emanates from the general assembly (Kansas City v. Marsh Oil Co. 64 L. R. A.

140 Mo. 458, 41 S. W. 943). By the 6th paragraph of § 26 of article 3 of the said charter the mayor and the municipal assembly of St. Louis are given power within the city, by ordinance not inconsistent with the Constitution or any law of this state or the charter itself, "to prohibit the erection of soap factories, stock yards, and slaughter houses, pig pens, cow stables and dairies, coal oil and vitriol factories, within prescribed limits, and to remove and regulate the same; and to regulate or prevent the carrying on of any business which may be dangerous or detrimental to the public health." On April 6, 1896, the mayor and municipal assembly passed the ordinance set out in the accompanying statement, making it a misdemeanor for any person thereafter to erect, build, or establish or maintain within the limits of said city any dairy or cow stable, without having first obtained permission so to do from the municipal assembly by a proper ordinance, and prescribing a penalty for a violation thereof. At the outset it will be observed that express power is conferred upon the mayor and municipal assembly to prohibit and to remove and regulate cow stables and dairies within prescribed limits. To the mayor and assembly is confided the power of fixing and prescribing the limits within which no dairy or cow stable shall be built or maintained in the city of St. Louis. As the grant in the charter is express, we are relieved from any discussion to demonstrate that the dairy business is of a character that brings it within the police power of the state, and properly subjects it to rigid rules of regulation, and even absolute prohibition, in large and populous cities. Indeed, few occupations are so peculiarly liable to cause injury, by the sale of impure milk to people who purchase milk as a necessary article of food, or which are more generally regarded as nuisances, even under favorable circumstances. That the people of the state could delegate this power to the municipality is no longer open to dispute. It clearly falls within the proper function of municipal government. As the people of the state have conferred the power upon the city without restriction, it was entirely within the discretion of the mayor and assembly to prescribe the limits, and it was competent to fix the boundaries of the city as the prescribed limits, and this was done by ordinance No. 18,407. Counsel for defendant insists that the municipal assembly must have first designated certain districts within the city by metes and bounds, within which no dairy or cow house should be erected or maintained, but the charter does not so command. It nowhere limits the prohibited territory to less than the whole city. Counsel for defendant cites Re Linchan, 72 Cal. 114, 13 Pac. 170, as sustaining his position. But reference to that case will show that the charter power was "to exclude from certain limits" the obnoxious occupations, and the city council had merely defined a district, bounded by certain streets, in which it should be unlawful for any person to keep more than two cows, and the supreme court upheld the ordinance. No question of the power of the city of San Francisco to make such an ordinance applicable to the whole of said city arose in that case, and nothing in the decision supports the proposition now advanced,—that the city of St. Louis must necessarily prescribe a district therein less than its municipal boundaries; and we have no doubt of the power, under the charter, to make the prescribed limits coextensive with the city limits, and this we construe this ordinance to have done. But learned counsel for defendant argues that because the city has not made the prohibition absolute, and prevented all persons from erecting or maintaining dairies and cow stables anywhere in the city, but has deemed it proper to say that no person should erect or maintain a dairy or cow stable without permission first obtained by a proper ordinance, this ordinance is void; that it provides for special privileges to one man, by special ordinance, which it might deny to another man, his next door neighbor. We think his position is entirely untenable. The charter confers, not only the power to prohibit, but to remove and regulate; and it was entirely competent for the assembly to decline to prohibit dairies altogether, but to impose upon all persons desiring to erect or maintain a dairy or cow stable the duty to first obtain permission from the mayor and assembly by a duly enacted ordinance. Having absolute power to prohibit, it could make its own conditions. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. v. Kirkwood, 159 Mo. 239, 53 L. R. A. 300, 60 S. W. 110. As was said in St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. loc. cit. 46, 41 Am. St. Rep. 630, 24 S. W. 770: "Regulation means a rule or order prescribed for management or government. . . . So that paragraph 6 of § 26 of article 3 of the charter empowers the city (by ordinance, of course, for that is the only way the city can legislate) to prescribe rules whereby slaughter houses may be erected or operated, or whereby such erection or operation may be checked or restrained, either partially or in toto." But in that case the defendant was acquitted because, although the city had plenary powers in this regard, it had not seen fit to exercise them by an ordinance making it a misdemeanor to carry on or operate a slaughter house "without first having obtained permission so to do from the municipal assembly by proper ordinance." In this case the city has passed just such an ordinance, and made it coextensive with the boundaries of the city; and just such an ordinance met the approval of this court in St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 47, 24 S. W. 772; the only difference being that in the last-mentioned case it was forbidden to erect a slaughter house within 300 feet of any dwelling house, whereas in this ordinance dairies are prohibited throughout the city unless the assembly shall first permit them by proper ordinances. We are asked to declare this ordinance void, in the face of the unrestricted power in the charter, because, forsooth, the assembly may at some time discriminate against one man and favor another. We cannot and shall not indulge any such presumption against the integrity of the municipal assembly, but shall, as was said in St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 50, 24 S. W. 772, assume that the municipal assembly, before granting permission, will inquire and determine whether the place and the neighborhood is a proper one in which to allow a dairy to be maintained, and will act impartially. "Such favorable presumptions are constantly indulged in regard to legislative action." State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Mead, 71 Mo. 272. It is at once apparent that no ironclad rule can fit every case. The assembly may well determine that the keeping of a dairy in the outskirts of a city, where the population is sparse and the areas large, would not be a nuisance; whereas to permit a dairy in the thickly populated portion of the city, or near a schoolhouse, church, or hospital, would seriously endanger the public health, and, in the exercise of its plenary powers, permit it in the one case, and prohibit it in the other, without being obnoxious to the criticism of partiality. Under the charter it is given legislative discretion in this matter. In our opinion, the ordinance prescribed the limits, and it was entirely proper and lawful to require every person desiring to erect or maintain a dairy to obtain permission by a proper ordinance, and such an ordinance is the only defense to an action like this. St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 47, 24 S. W. 772. We can see no more objection to such an ordinance than could be urged against the granting of a franchise to run a street railroad on a particular street. A railroad laid in a street without authority is a nuisance, and yet it has never been held that an ordinance, to be valid, must permit everybody to maintain railways in all the streets. It is a matter within the authority of the assembly.

2. As to the objection that the ordinance violates the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it is sufficient to say that it does not contravene that amendment, because it operates upon all persons alike, and that every man holds his property subject to the maxim that he must so use it as not to injure his neighbor. Nothing in that amendment has shorn the states of their police power to prohibit or regulate unwholesome trades and occupations. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394; Tiedeman, State & Federal Control of Persons & Property, p. 731; Re Linehan, 72 Cal. 114, 13 Pac. 170; State v. Broadbelt, 89 Md. 565, 45 L. R. A. 433, 73 Am. St. Rep. 201, 43 Atl. 771; 2 Kent, Com. 340; St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 47, 24 S. W. 772; Eichenlaub v. St. Joseph, 113 Mo. 395, 18 L. R. A. 590, 21 S. W. 8. Nothing in the Constitution of the United States or of this state secures to any man the right to maintain a nuisance to the discomfort and peril of the health of his neighbor.

It is not deemed necessary to answer seriatim all the objections urged to the constitutionality of this ordinance. We have considered them all, and are satisfied they are not tenable or sound. There is nothing retrospective in the application of this ordinance to defendant. It was adopted in 1896. He began, without the permission of a proper ordinance, to carry on and maintain this dairy at the premises mentioned in the complaint in 1898,—long after the ordinance was in force.

The ordinance is leveled at the maintenance of a dairy,—the keeping of cows for the sale of milk; and the mere fact that the premises had once been so occupied prior to 1896, but subsequently abandoned for such a use, did not authorize defendant to start up a new dairy on said premises without the necessary condition precedent of a lawful ordinance. Accordingly we hold his conviction was proper, and the judgment is affirmed.

BURGESS, Ch. J., concurs in these views.

We are dealing in this case with the right of property, and not with the question of nuisance.

v.

(207 Pa. 447.)

1. Employees of a mining partnership, who are charged with the care and management of its property, do not act within the scope of their employment in causing, long after the commission of the crime, the arrest, for the purpose of vindicating the law, of one who is suspected of having set fire to a building belonging to the partnership, so as to render the partnership liable for malicious prosecution in case the arrest proves to have been without justification.
2. The whole question of the existence of probable cause is not submitted to the jury in an action for malicious prosecution by a modification of an instruction directing them that, if defendant had knowledge of certain facts, he had probable cause, by adding the qualification "unless the jury find" that other facts existed which ought to have convinced defendant, as a reasonably prudent man, that he could not honestly rely on the facts enumerated.
3. A verdict cannot be directed for defendant in an action for malicious prosecution if his good faith is called in question by testimony, notwithstanding the existence of facts which might constitute probable cause.

(January 4, 1904.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Washington County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Reversed.

The point which became the basis of the second assignment of error, together with the modification thereof, was as follows:

If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant Miller had reasonable ground for believing the fire was of incendiary origin; that the plaintiff had been discharged by him; that subsequent to his discharge he had made threats against the defendants, or any of them, and had said he would do the worst dirt to them he could; that he requested Fred Konitz to inform him in case he found out anything the defendants had against him, in order that he might skip out of the state, all of which was communicated to Miller shortly after the fire; that he was reported to the defendant Miller as having been seen at Ellsworth the day before the barn was burned; that Bert Mathers told the defendant Miller that the plaintiff had offered him (Mathers) $100 to burn the barn, and upon his refusal to do so had said he knew a man whom he could get to do it; that subsequent to the arrest of the plaintiff, and prior to the hearing, while he and Mathers were in the lockup at Charleroi, plaintiff advised Mathers to say at the hearing that, if he had said anything which tended to incriminate himself or the plaintiff while at Ellsworth, he was drunk, stating that the evidence of a drunken man would not be regarded,—then the defendant Miller had such reasonable grounds to believe the plaintiff guilty as would justify him in his actions, and no verdict should be rendered against him. Answer: Affirmed. Unless the jury find that there have been other facts satisfactorily proved in this case which ought to have convinced Miller, as a reasonably prudent man, that he could not honestly rely on the facts enumerated in this point.”

Messrs. R. W. Irwin and A. M. Todd, for appellants:

The mere fact that one is superintendent and another a paymaster of a company will not, of itself, give them the authority to institute a criminal proceeding so as to make the company liable for their action.

The defendants had a right to present a point embodying the facts of which they claim to have had knowledge at the time the prosecution was instituted, and ask the court to say to the jury whether or not those facts, if found to exist by the jury, would constitute probable cause. It was the province of the jury to determine whether or not those facts were proved, and it was the duty of the court to say whether or not the facts embodied in the point, if proved, would constitute probable cause.

The facts embodied in the point, if proved in the case, constituted probable cause for the prosecution; and consequently the proof of those facts made an absolute defense against the plaintiff's action.

The facts which are substantially undisputed in this case, which were known to the defendants, are much stronger than the facts in Mahaffey v. Byers, 151 Pa. 92, 25 Atl. 93; Bernar v. Dunlap, 94 Pa. 329; McCarthy v. DeArmit, 99 Pa. 63; and Fisher v. Forrester, 33 Pa. 501,—in each of which cases this court held, as a matter of law, that there was probable cause for the prosecution.

Mr. James A. Wiley also for appellants. 64 L. R. A.

Messrs. W. S. Parker and Winfield Mollvaine for appellee.

Fell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was arrested for setting fire to the barn of J. W. Ellsworth & Co., a partnership engaged in selling and mining coal. After his discharge on the entering of a nolle prosequi by the commonwealth, he brought this action for malicious prosecution, and obtained a verdict against the police officer who made the information on which the warrant was issued, the superintendent of the business and the paymaster at whose instance the arrest was made, and against the partnership. It did not appear from the testimony that any member of the partnership had assented to or authorized the prosecution, or had any knowledge of it. The arrest was not made until three months after the barn had been burned, and whatever the superintendent and paymaster did in relation thereto was wholly at their own instance. If the partnership is liable in this action, it is because of an act of its agents, done in the course of their employment. The instruction on this branch of the case is the subject of the first assignment of error. It was, in substance, that if the care and management of the property—especially of the barn and its contents, which were burned—were committed to the superintendent and paymaster, it was their right on behalf of the company, when the barn was burned, to engage actively in ferreting out the perpetrator of the crime, and to make an information; and if, in so acting as representatives of the company, they instituted an unfounded prosecution, their principal would be liable. The superintendent and paymaster, while called officers of the company, were in fact employees or agents of the partnership, charged, doubtless, with the management and care of its property at the mine, and the question raised by the assignment is whether the arrest of the plaintiff, three months after the barn had been burned, by their procurement, was an act within their implied power, done in the course of their employment.

Undoubtedly a principal may be held liable for the act of his agent in instituting a malicious prosecution. But the act of the agent becomes that of the principal only when expressly authorized, or when his authority to act may fairly be inferred from the nature and scope of the employment. Generally, the duty of superintendence does not carry with it the duty to arrest or prosecute. The inference of authority to do either does not arise from the mere fact of the agency. The authority may be implied when the arrest is made by the agent in the absence of the principal for the protection of property that is in danger, and in some cases it has been inferred when the arrest was to recover the property back, or where the crime was at the time being perpetrated. But where the act is done for the punishment of the supposed criminal, or for the vindication of the law, it is not the act of the principal, and does not subject him to liability. This principle has been uniformly recognized in the decisions on the subject, and whatever lack of harmony there is in the cases has resulted from the difficulty of applying it to the particular facts. Railroad companies have been held liable for the unlawful arrest of passengers by conductors for nonpayment of fare (Krulevitz v. Eastern R. Co. 140 Mass. 573, 5 N. E. 500; Kelly v. Durham Traction Co. 132 N. C. 368, 43 S. E. 923); and for arrest for breach of the peace (Ruth v. St. Louis Transit Co. 98 Mo. App. 1, 71 S. W. 1055); and the employer for the arrest by a superintendent for shoplifting, detected, it was supposed, in the act (Staples v. Schmid, 18 R. 1. 224, 10 L. R. A. 824, 26 Atl. 193); and by a floor walker (Mallach v. Ridley, 43 Hun, 336); for the arrest by a manager of a labor agent for passing through a mill and persuading men to quit work (Smith v. Munch, 65 Minn. 256, 68 N. W. 19); for the arrest by a ticket agent of a traveler on the charge of passing counterfeit money (Palmeri v. Manhattan R. Co. 133 N. Y. 261, 16 L. R. A. 136, 28 Am. St. Rep. 632, 30 N. E. 1001; Eichengreen v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 96 Tenn. 229, 31 L. R. A. 702, 54 Am. St. Rep. 833, 34 S. W. 219); for an arrest by a ticket seller on the charge of causing disorder in a theater (Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 488, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1); and in similar cases where arrests were made by watchmen, roadmasters, and others charged with like duties.

On the other hand, the trend of decision is against holding the principal liable when the arrest has been made after the supposed crime had been committed, and not for the protection of his property or interests. In such cases the agent has been presumed to have acted on his own account, for the vindication of justice. There has been no direct ruling on the subject by this court, but the recent case of Croasdale v. Von Boyneburgk, 206 Pa. 15, 55 Atl. 770, in which it was held that the managing owner of a vessel has no implied authority to institute criminal prosecution for embezzlements, is within the principle stated. There are numerous decisions on the question in other jurisdictions. In Pressley v. Mobile & G. R. 64 L. R. A.

Co. 4 Woods, 569, 15 Fed. 199, the company's land agent, who was vested with extensive powers of sale, lease, and collection of income, caused the arrest of the plaintiff on the charge of spoliation of timber lands. It was held that in so doing he was not acting within the scope of his agency, and the company was not liable. In Mulligan v. New York & R. B. R. Co. 129 N. Y. 506, 14 L. R. A. 791, 26 Am. St. Rep. 539, 29 N. E. 952, a ticket agent had been notified by the police to watch out for certain counterfeiters, and caused the arrest of a person whom he thought had tendered him a counterfeit note. In referring to this case it was said in Palmeri v. Manhattan R. Co. 133 N. Y. 261, 16 L. R. A. 136, 28 Am. St. Rep. 632, 30 N. E. 1001: "We held that the company was not responsible in damages, because the agent was not, in what he did, acting within the scope and line of his duty. His acts were not such as could be deemed to be performed in the course of his employment, or such as were demanded for the protection of his employer's interests, but rather those of a citizen desirous of aiding the police in the detection and arrest of persons engaged in the commission of a crime." In Edwards v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. 445, 39 L. J. C. P. N. S. 241, 22 L. T. N. S. 656, 18 Week. Rep. 834, it was decided that a railroad company was not liable for the action of a porter who had temporary charge of its yard in arresting a teamster whom he suspected of stealing lumber. Similar rulings were made in Larson v. Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. 71 Minn. 101, 73 N. W. 711; Tolchester Beach Improv. Co. v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 313, 8 L. R. A. 846, 20 Atl. 188; Travis v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 86 Mich. 288, 49 N. W. 140; Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 381, 100 Am. Dec. 448; and Carter v. Howe Mach. Co. 51 Md. 290, 34 Am. Rep. 311. In Allen v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 65, 40 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 55, 23 L. T. N. S. 612, 19 Week. Rep. 127, 11 Cox C. C. 621, it was said by Blackburn, J.: "There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony, or of recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done. There is no implied authority in a person having the custody of property to take such steps as he thinks fit to punish a person who he supposes has done something with reference to the property which he has not done. The act of punishing the offender is not anything done with reference to the property; it is done merely for the purpose of vindicating justice." The liability of the prinprincipal for the act of his agent in instituting an unfounded prosecution is governed by the general principles of agency, and where there is no express authority, and there has been no subsequent ratification of the act, the ultimate test is whether the agent acted within the scope of his implied authority. In determining this, each case must stand on its own facts, and in some the question will be one of serious difficulty and doubt. But in this case it may safely be said that there was no presumption of authority, from the mere fact of the agency, to make an arrest three months after the supposed crime had been committed, and when there had been the fullest opportunity in the meantime for the agents to confer with their principal.

The second assignment of error is to the answer to the defendants' seventh point. The court was asked to instruct the jury that if, at the time the prosecution was instituted, Miller, one of the defendants, and the superintendent, had knowledge of the facts set forth in the point, he had probable cause for instituting the prosecution. The answer given was: "Affirmed, unless the jury find that there were other facts satisfactorily proved in this case which ought to have convinced Miller, as a reasonably prudent man, that he could not honestly rely upon the facts enumerated in the point." If, as is argued, the effect of this answer was to submit the whole question of probable cause to the jury, it was error, as it always is for the court to say whether a given state of facts constitutes probable cause. But this was not its effect. The jury were not permitted to find whether other facts in connection with those enumerated made out a defense of probable cause, but whether there were other facts that should have convinced Miller that he could not rely on the facts stated. Probable cause is a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a prudent man in believing the accused guilty. It is not determined by the existence of facts alone, but by the prosecutor's belief in them, and the reasonableness of his belief. If he knows that statements tending to implicate the accused are untrue, or if they are impeached by other facts within his knowledge, or are discredited because of the source from which they come, they furnish no ground of defense, because as to the prosecutor they were not a ground of belief. "The prosecutor must himself believe, and the belief must be upon reasonable grounds." Note to Munns v. Dupont, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. (Hare & W.) 265. There were other facts, and the plaintiff's contention at the trial was that they so modified the facts relied on to establish probable cause that no reasonable belief could be based on them.

The third assignment to the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendants cannot be sustained, since the good faith of the prosecution, notwithstanding the facts relied on as indicating guilt, was called in question by the testimony.

We reverse the judgment on the first assignment of error, and judgment is now entered in favor of J. W. Ellsworth & Co. As to the other defendants against whom a verdict was rendered we grant a venire facias de novo.

I. Introductory; scope of note.

The subject considered in this note is restricted to the consideration of statutes, both Federal and state, which are commonly spoken of as anti-trust acts. The common-law rules with reference to contracts in restraint of trade and monopolies will not be gone into to any extent whatever, except as they may incidentally have been referred to by analogy in some of the decisions which appear herein. As is well known, contracts in restraint of trade were not, by the rules of the common law, held to be illegal in the fullest sense of that term; but the true doctrine in respect thereto was that, as such a contract was deemed to be opposed to public policy, courts, both of law and equity, would decline to aid either party to the contract seeking to enforce it against the other. The anti-trust acts, so called, however, make contracts in restraint of trade illegal, and by the Federal acts and most of the state statutes they are constituted crimes.

It will be seen that several of the states have provisions in their Constitutions which either prohibit monopolies, or inhibit the legislature from permitting them by law.

II. *Constitutionality of statute.*a. Under Federal Constitution.

The act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, usually known as the "anti-trust law," is a legitimate exercise of the power of Congress over interstate commerce, and a valid regulation thereof. United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25, Reversing 76 Fed. 895.

The constitutional guaranty of the liberty of the individual to enter into private contracts does not limit the power of Congress, so as to prevent it from legislating upon the subject of contracts in restraint of interstate or foreign commerce. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96.

mote, or only incidentally or indirectly restrict, competition in interstate commerce, while their main purpose and chief effect are to increase the trade and foster the business of those who make them, were not intended to be, and were not, made illegal or punishable by § 2 of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 8200), because such attempts are indispensable to the existence of any competition in commerce among the states.

6. A manufacturer, a corporation, and its employee restricted the sales of its products to those who refrained from dealing in the commodities of its competitors by fixing the prices of its goods to those who did not thus refrain so high that their purchase was unprofitable, while it reduced the prices to those who declined to deal in the wares of its competitors so that the purchase of the goods was profitable to them. The plaintiff applied to purchase, but refused to refrain from handling the goods of the corporation's competitors, and sued it for damages caused by the refusal of the defendants to sell their commodities to him at prices which would make it profitable for him to buy them and sell them again. Held, the restriction of their own trade by the defendants to those purchasers who declined to deal in the goods of their competitors was not violative of the anti-trust act.
7. The owner of goods may dictate the prices at which he will sell them, and the damages which are caused to an applicant to buy by the refusal of the owner to sell to him at prices which will enable him to resell them at a profit constitute no legal injury, and are not actionable because they are not the result of any breach of duty or of contract by the owner.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota

The power of Congress to regulate interstate or foreign commerce includes the power to legislate upon the subject of private contracts in respect to such commerce. Ibid.

See Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 198 U. S. 197, 48 L. ed. 679, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436, Affirming 120 Fed. 721, infra, III. 1.

A discrimination in favor of agricultural products or live stock in the hands of the producer or raiser, made by the Illinois trust act of June 20, 1893, exempting them from the provisions which prohibit a recovery of the price of articles sold by any trust or combination formed in restraint of trade or competition in violation of that act, renders the act repugnant to the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution, in respect to equal protection of the laws. Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431.

And, as an elimination of the unconstitutional portion of the Illinois trust act of June 20, 1893, which exempts agriculturalists and live-stock dealers from the provisions which prohibit combinations in restraint of trade, cannot be made without bringing these classes of persons within the prohibitions of the statute, in contravention of the legislative intent, there- 64 L. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lawler & Arnold, for plaintiff in error:

The defendants were alleged to be a corporation, and its employee and agent did not take them out of the operation of the statute.

The Continental Tobacco Company has established practically a monopoly of plug tobaccos through the instrumentality of the general scheme described in the complaint. It would seem absurd to hold that such agreement is not in contravention of the act, but that the act simply contemplates the original and chief combination in the form of trust or otherwise.

fore the entire act must be held invalid. Ibid.

The right to combine, to form partnerships and joint-stock associations; the right to agree as to prices and productions; the right to fix prices, to raise and lower them as business men may require,—is not oppressive to the public, nor unjust to the individual, nor contrary to public policy. It is an essential right, as part of the liberty of the citizen, of which no legislature can deprive him. This is what is made criminal by the anti-trust law of Texas of March 30, 1889, and, because it does so, it is repugnant to that part of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, because it deprives citizens of the right to make contracts which are necessary and valid in order to conduct their business as they properly may, inasmuch as the same statute exempts 80 per cent of the whole population from the pains and penalties of the act. It is class legislation, and is also under the inhibition of the same amendment to the Federal Constitution, which declares that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Re Grice, 79 Fed. 627.

Y. Supp. 91; Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by the plaintiff, Joseph P. Whitwell, to recover treble damages from the Continental Tobacco Company, a corporation, and from one of its employees, George E. McHie, under the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), on the sole ground that the defendants refused to sell the manufactured products of the tobacco company to him at prices which would enable him to resell them to others at a profit, unless he refrained from buying, selling, or handling plug chewing tobacco made by independent manufacturers who were competing with the tobacco company for the trade of the country. All the parties to the suit were engaged in interstate commerce, and the products in question were the subjects thereof. The main question which the case presents is, May one engaged in commerce among the states lawfully select his customers, and sell only to those who do not buy or sell the wares of his competitors, or is such a restriction of his own trade by a manufacturer or merchant and his employees a "contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade" or an "attempt to monopolize any part of trade," within the meaning of the act of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200)?

An analysis of the averments of the complaint to which the court below sustained a general demurrer will demonstrate the fact that the crucial question in this case has been correctly stated. The material facts which those averments disclose are these: The plaintiff is a jobber of tobacco, and of the products of tobacco, at St. Paul, Minnesota. The tobacco company is a manufacturer and merchant, and McHie is its agent and employee. The tobacco company owns and controls most of the valuable and leading brands of plug and chewing tobacco in the United States, and fixes the market prices thereof. The company and its agent, McHie, had long been, and on May 1, 1902, still were, in the practice of selling its goods to jobbers in this way: They allotted to an intending purchaser an amount of its goods which he was required to buy during each succeeding period of four months. This allotment was much in excess of the amount which he would be able to sell during that time. They fixed the prices of the goods comprising the allotment so high that if the purchaser paid the prices thus fixed, he could not make any profit by buying and selling the commodities. They required each purchaser to refrain from dealing in plug chewing tobaccos made by independent and competing manufacturers. If the purchaser complied with this requirement, they invariably reduced his allotment to the amount he was able to sell, and paid back to him such a percentage of the aggregate price of the goods he bought that the han-etc.—is not a violation of the Constitution of the United States. State ex rel. Monnett v. Buckeye Pipe Line Co. 61 Ohio St. 520, 56 N. E. 464.

Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the act of April 19, 1898 (93 Ohio Laws, 143), which create criminal offenses, prescribe proceedings thereunder, and provide penalties for the violation of any of the provisions of the 1st section of the act by a combination of capital, skill, or acts, by two or more persons, firms, partnerships, corporations, or associations of persons, or any two or more of them, to create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce, are in violation of the Constitution of the United States, being without regard to whether such combination deprives individuals or the public of any legal right. Gage v. State, 24 Ohio C. C. 724.

Article 5313 of Sayles's Anno. Civ. Stat., forbidding contracts in restraint of trade, or to prevent competition in the sale of various commodities, is not forbidden by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and also provides that no state shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. Texas Brewing Co. v. Durrum (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 880.

In State v. Shippers' Compress & Warehouse Co. 95 Tex. 603, 69 S. W. 58, the court, after saying that in Houck v. Anheuser-Busch Brew- 64 L. R. A.

ing Asso. 88 Tex. 189, 30 S. W. 869, it had held the anti-trust law of 1889 to be constitutional; and that there was no such difference between that law and the act of 1895 as would affect that question; and that it believed that its decision was correct; and that the law was not in contravention of the Constitution of the state or of the United States,—further said that in the case of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431, the United States Supreme Court held that a statute of the state of Illinois, in all essential particulars the same as the act of 1895, was in conflict with the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, because it excepted "agricultural products and live stock while in the hands of the producer or raiser;" and that, recognizing the superior authority of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the question, and in obedience to its decision, it should hold that, in so far as the law of 1895 comes within the terms of the Connolly Case, it is invalid, and will not support an action by the state to recover a penalty for a violation of the law, nor will it, in suits between corporations or individuals, support a defense based upon the fact that the right of action originated in a violation of the anti-trust law; but that, to the extent that the statute of the state is not embraced in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, it should adhere to its former decision, that it is constitutional and valid, and, therefore, en-dling of these commodities was, by reason of this repayment alone, made profitable to him. If the purchaser refused to comply with this requirement, they refused to reduce the amount of his allotment or the prices of his goods, so that the business was unprofitable to him. The plaintiff had long participated in this method of transacting business, had been handling the products of the tobacco company in accordance with it, and had an established business in the purchase of tobacco and its products, and in the sale of them throughout the states of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, when on May 1, 1902, the defendants made an allotment to him for the succeeding four months, and offered to furnish their commodities to him in accordance with their established practice. He, however, refused to refrain from handling the goods of independent manufacturers who were competing with the defendants. Thereupon the latter refused to reduce the allotment which they had made to him, or the prices thereof, so that the handling of the goods of the tobacco company would be profitable to the plaintiff, and he did not purchase, or agree to purchase, their goods. He was unable to procure them elsewhere, and sustained damages in the sum of $280.

No other facts are stated in the complaint. There are, however, allegations that the defendants combined and conspired to regulate and to raise the prices of their goods, and to control the output thereof, with the intent to monopolize trade and commerce among the states of Minnesota and North Dakota and South Dakota; that they combined to arbitrarily fix the prices of their goods, independently of their natural market value, and to refuse to sell them on equal terms to all intending purchasers; and that they did all these things in restraint of trade and commerce among the states. But the only way in which the plaintiff avers that these defendants restrained or attempted to monopolize interstate trade, or disclosed their intent to do so, was by restricting the sale of their own goods to customers who refrained from handling the wares of their competitors by making their sales on the terms which have been stated. The general averments of the intent, purpose, and effect of the acts of the defendants may therefore be laid aside here. They serve no purpose save to foreshadow the argument of counsel relative to the legal effect of the facts which the complaint sets forth. They neither state, nor aid in the statement of, any cause of action, because they disclose no fact, and the only question here is whether the facts stated in the complaint constitute a cause of action. The only facts thus stated are that the tobacco company and its employee refused to make sales of its products to the plaintiff, or to others who desired to purchase, on terms that would be profitable to them, unless they refrained from dealing in the goods of its competitors. Was this act, or the course of dealing which it illustrates, a violation forceable by the state. The court said, further, that in the case of Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 44 L. ed. 657, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518, the Supreme Court of the United States had held that the state, under the law of 1889, might revoke a license to do business in the state, and affirmed the judgment of a state court to that effect, which it could not have done except by holding the statute to be constitutional in so far as it reserved the right to the state to revoke the license because of the violation of the anti-trust law; and that there was no difference between that case and the present. The court, however, affirmed the judgment below against the state for the reason that the acts of the defendant were not a violation of the anti-trust act.

In Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. State, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 44 S. W. 936, which was an action by the state to cancel the permit of the defendant to do business in the state on account of an alleged violation of the laws against trusts by the company, its agents, and employees, the court held that a contract between an oil company organized under the laws of another state and parties dealing in, buying, and selling oils, whereby the company agreed to sell oil only to such parties in their respective districts, and the parties respectively agreed to sell only the oil of that particular company, was void as in violation of the acts of May 30, 1889, and April 30, 1895, which inhibit contracts in restraint of trade.

A writ of error was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the Supreme Court, in affirming the judgment, decided that the right of a foreign corporation to engage in business within a state other than that of its creation depends solely upon the will of such other state, except with respect to business of a Federal nature. That a forfeiture of the permission to a foreign corporation to do business in the state for a violation of the provisions of the Texas act of 1889, under which the permit was given, and which provides for the forfeiture, does not violate any contract obligation, as the provision for the forfeiture was a part of the obligation. And that a repeal of the Texas act of 1889, permitting foreign corporations to do business in the state, does not result from the provision of the Texas act of 1895, exempting labor organizations, on the ground that this provision is unconstitutional, since, if it were so, the entire act would be void, and could not operate as a repeal of the former act; and the judgment of the state court forfeiting the right of the corporation to do business in Texas was affirmed. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas, 177 U. S. 28, 44 L. ed. 657, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 518.

In National Cotton Oil Co. v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 72 S. W. 615, the court said that, while it had been correctly held that certain provisions of the anti-trust statutes were unconstitutional, the supreme court, in the case of State v. Shippers' Compress & Warehouse Co.

of the anti-trust law of 1890? That law provides:

"Sec. 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. . . .

"Sec. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, . . . shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ."

Under this act, every contract, combination, and conspiracy in restraint of trade among the states is illegal. Every person who engages in any such combination violates this law, and a corporation is a person. Act July 2, 1890, chap. 647, §§ 1, 8 (26 Stat. at L. 209, 210, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, pp. 3200, 3202). Hence the real question in every case which arises under this law is whether or not the contract, combination, or conspiracy challenged is in restraint of trade among the states. It has now been settled by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court that this question must be tried, not by the intent with which the combination was made, nor by its effect upon traders, producers, or consumers, but by the necessary effect which it has in defeating the purpose of the law. That purpose was to prevent the stifling or substantial restriction of competition, and the test of the legality of a combination under the act which was inspired by this purpose is its direct and necessary effect upon competition in commerce among the states. If its necessary effect is to stifle, or to directly and substantially restrict, free competition, it is a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, and it falls under the ban of the law. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 339, 340, 342, 41 L. ed. 1007, 1027, 1028, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. Rep. 518, held that so much of these statutes as authorizes the canceling and forfeiture of a charter or permit to do business within the state of Texas is valid, and is not in violation of the Constitution.

b. Under state Constitution.

The competition, the defeating or lessening of which ¶ 4, § 2, art. 4, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code, § 5800), so far as applicable to railroad companies, was designed to prevent, was competition between lines of railroad, viewed with reference to their general business in and through the territory traversed by them, and not competition which might incidentally exist at mere points or particular places. A combination of railroad lines, whatever the form adopted for bringing it about, is not violative of this paragraph of the Constitution, even though it might lessen or defeat competition at some point or points, if, as a general result of the combination, the public at large, as distinguished from the people of special or particular communities, was, in consequence, benefited. State v. Central R. Co. 109 Ga. 716, 48 L. R. A. 351, 35 S. E. 37.

Under a provision of the Constitution of the state of Georgia reciting that "the general assembly of this state shall have no power to authorize any corporation to buy shares or stock in any other corporation in this state or elsewhere, or to make any contract or agreement whatever with any such corporation which may have the effect, or be intended to have the effect, to defeat or lessen competition in their respective businesses, or to encourage monopoly; and all such agreements and contracts shall be illegal and void,"—a purchase by a railway company in Georgia of the contract to construct the line of a competitive company, and of the securities of such competitive company, with a view to prevent the construction of such competing line, is illegal and void, although accomplished indirectly, and constitutes all concerned in such illegal transaction trustees as to assets resulting therefrom for the benefit of persons whose rights have been invaded. Langdon v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 2 L. R. A. 120, 37 Fed. 449; Hamilton v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. 49 Fed. 412.

The provision of the Constitution of Georgia, ¶ 4, § 2, art. 4 (Civ. Code, § 5800), that "the general assembly of this state shall have no power to authorize any corporation to buy shares or stock in any other corporation in this state or elsewhere, or to make any contract or agreement whatever with any such corporation, which may have the effect, or be intended to have the effect, to defeat or lessen competition in their respective businesses, or to encourage monopoly; and all such contracts and agreements shall be illegal and void," is tion, while its main purpose and chief effect are to foster the trade and to increase the business of those who make and operate it, then it is not a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, within the true interpretation of this act, and it is not subject to its denunciation. Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 592, 43 L. ed. 290, 296, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 604, 616, 43 L. ed. 300, 306, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50; *United States v. In Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 592, 43 L. ed. 296, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 45, the Supreme Court said: "The contract condemned by the statute is one whose direct and immediate effect is a restraint upon that kind of trade or commerce which is interstate. . . . To treat as condemned by the act all agreements under which, as a result, the cost of conducting an interstate commercial business may be increased, would enlarge the application of the act far beyond the fair meaning of the language used. There must be some direct and immediate effect upon interstate commerce in order to come within the act." And at page 600, 171 U. S. page 299, 43 L. ed., and page 48, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep., said: "The act of Congress must have a reasonable construction, or else there would scarcely be an agreement or contract among business men that could not be said to have, indirectly or remotely, some bearing upon interstate commerce, and possibly to restrain it. We have no idea that the act covers, or was intended to cover, such kinds of agreements."

In Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 616, 43 L. ed. 306, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54, the court quoted this sentence from the opinion in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 473, 31 L. ed. 508, 510, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564, 566, "There are many cases, however, where the acknowledged powers of a state may be exerted and applied in such a manner as to affect foreign or interstate commerce without being intended to not absolute in its terms, but was designed only to prevent the general assembly from authorizing one corporation to purchase shares or stock in another when doing so may have the effect, or be intended to have the effect, to defeat or lessen competition in their respective businesses, or to encourage monopoly. Trust Co. v. State, 109 Ga. 736, 48 L. R. A. 521, 35 S. E. 323.

And so, under its charter, the trust company of Georgia has authority to buy the shares or stock of any other corporation, provided that in so doing it does not violate the provisions of the Constitution; and a purchase by that corporation of the stock of two street railroad companies for the purpose of permitting them to interchange business and transfer passengers from the lines of one of the roads to those of the other, and, for that purpose, to make any physical connections with the railroads of each other, and to enter into any traffic arrangement, which may be necessary to enable each of said companies to grant transfers or interchangeable tickets over the lines of the other,—is not obnoxious to the provisions of the Constitution, ¶ 4, § 2, art. 4 (Civ. Code, § 5800), although the consolidation defeats competition at some point on their lines, or tends to defeat such competition or lessen it. Ibid.

July 1, 1891, is not in contravention of § 14, art. 2, of the Constitution of the state. Ford v. Chicago Milk Shippers' Assn. 155 Ill. 166, 27 L. R. A. 298, 39 N. E. 651.

The question of the constitutionality of the original act of 1891 is not new, but is one which was passed upon in the case of Ford v. Chicago Milk Shippers' Assn. 155 Ill. 166, 27 L. R. A. 298, 39 N. E. 651; and the decision in that case has been referred to with approval in the case of HARDING v. AMERICAN GLUCOSE Co., and the act was there held to be constitutional. People ex rel. Akin v. Butler Street Foundry & Iron Co. 201 Ill. 286, 66 N. E. 349.

The act of the legislature of Ohio of April 19, 1898 (93 Ohio Laws, 143), prohibiting combinations of capital, skill, or acts in restraint of trade or commerce, limiting or reducing the production, or increasing or reducing the price, of merchandise or any commodity; preventing competition in manufacturing, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of merchandise, products, or any commodity; fixing at any standard or figure whereby its price to the public or consumer shall be controlled or established any article or commodity of merchandise, produce, or commerce intended for sale, etc.,—is not a violation of the Constitution of the state of Ohio. State ex rel. Monnett v. Buckeye Pipe Line Co. 61 Ohio St. 520, 56 N. E. 464; State v. Jacobs, 7 Ohio N. P. 261.

An agreement between several railroad companies, some of which own and control com-operate as commercial regulations," and then said: "The same is true as to certain kinds of agreements entered into between persons engaged in the same business for the direct and bona fide purpose of properly and reasonably regulating the conduct of their business among themselves and with the public. If an agreement of that nature, while apt and proper for the purpose thus intended, should possibly, though only indirectly and unintentionally, affect interstate trade or commerce, in that event we think the agreement would be good. Otherwise there is scarcely any agreement among men which has interstate or foreign commerce for its subject that may not remotely be said to in some obscure way affect that commerce, and to be therefore void."

In United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 568, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 31, the Supreme Court, after reviewing and affirming the case of Hopkins v. United States, and the rule which has been quoted from that case, declared: "An agreement entered into for the purpose of promoting the legitimate business of an individual or corporation, with no purpose to thereby affect or restrain interstate commerce, and which does not directly restrain such commerce, is not, as we think, covered by the act, although the agreement may indirectly and remotely affect that commerce. . . . To suppose, as is assumed by counsel, that the effect of the decision in the Trans-Missouri Case is to render illegal most business contracts or combinations, however indispensable and necessary they may be, because, as they assert, they all restrain trade in some remote and indirect degree, is to make a most violent assumption, and one not called for or justified by the decision mentioned, or by any other decision of this court."

The right of each competitor to fix the prices of the commodities which he offers for sale, and to dictate the terms upon which he will dispose of them, is indispensable to the very existence of competition. Strike down or stipulate away that right, and competition is not only restricted, but destroyed. Hence agreements of competing railroad companies to intrust their power to fix rates of transportation to the same man or body of men (United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540; United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25; United States v. Northern Securities Co. 120 Fed. 721), and contracts of competitors in the production or sale of merchantable commodities to deprive each competitor of the right to fix the prices of his own goods, the terms of the sale, or the customers to whom he shall dispose of them, and either to fix these prices, terms, and customers by the agreement of the competitors, or to intrust the power to dictate them to the same man or body of men (United States v. Jellico Mountain Coal & Coke Co. 12 L. R. R. 753, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 626, 46 Fed. 432; United States v. Coal Dealers' Asso. 85 Fed. 252; peting lines, for the appointment of a common governing committee, or an association (composed of one member from each company) to fix the rates for which freights should be carried to and from points within the state of Texas, is illegal because contrary to art. 10, § 5, of the Constitution of Texas, which provides that "no railroad, . . . or managers of any railroad corporation, shall consolidate the stock, property, or franchises of such corporation with, . . . or in any way control, any railroad corporation owning or having under its control a parallel or competing line," as the language of this provision of the Constitution of Texas evinces that control in any manner and to any extent was intended to be prohibited,—provided it is such as is calculated to enable one railroad, by means of a contract or agreement for interference in the other's affairs, to keep down competition between them. Gulf, C. & S. The provision of § 5 of art. 10 of the Constitution of Texas which prohibits railroad companies of parallel and competing lines from consolidating or purchasing each the other's property, has no application to street railways, as by the term "railroad" in said section is meant a railroad over which freight and passengers are transported from one town or city to another, and not a road on which passengers are transported over the streets of a town or city. 64 L. Tile, Mantel, & Granite Asso. 98 Fed. 817, 106 Fed. 40), necessarily have the effect, either to stifle competition entirely, or to directly and substantially restrict it, because such contracts deprive the rivals in trade of their best means of instituting and maintaining competition between themselves.

In the contract, combination, or conspiracy which is charged against the defendants in this case there is nothing of this character. The tobacco company is a manufacturer and trader, and McHie is its employee. Conceding, for the purpose of the argument only, but not deciding, that there may be a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade between an employer and his employee, no such contract, combination, or conspiracy between them can be a violation of this law, unless it is in restraint of interstate commerce; and the only combination charged against the defendants is their combination to make sales of the commodities of the tobacco company profitable to purchasers to those persons only who refrain from dealing in the wares of their competitors. The two defendants in this case have never been and never intended to be competitors. There has never been any competition, actual or possible, between them, and hence no competition between them is or can be restrained by their combination to conduct the trade of the tobacco company. The contract, combination, or conspiracy charged against them did not restrict competition between them and the independent manufacturers or dealers who, according to the complaint, were their competitors, because it left the latter free to select their purchasers and to fix the prices of their goods and the terms at which they would dispose of them to all intending purchasers.

The tobacco company and its competitors were not dealing in articles of prime necessity, like corn and coal, nor were they rendering public or quasi public service, like railroad and gas corporations. Each of them, therefore, had the right to refuse to sell its commodities at any price. Each had the right to fix the prices at which it would dispose of them, and the terms upon which it would contract to sell them. Each of them had the right to determine with what persons it would make its contracts of sale. Re Greene, 52 Fed. 104, 115; Re Grice, 79 Fed. 627, 644; Walsh v. Dwight, 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91, 93; Brown v. Rounsavell, 78 Ill. 589; Com. v. Grinstead, 111 Ky. 203, 56 L. R. A. 709, 63 S. W. 427; Allgeyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 589, 41 L. ed. 832, 835, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427. There is nothing in the act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), which deprived any of these competitors of these rights. If there had each of such terminal railroad companies owning a bridge across the Mississippi river by which they transported freight and passengers to railroad lines on the other side of the river in the state of Illinois, leased the whole railroad and business of the other of said terminal companies, and thereafter operated both of said terminal railroads, such lease and operation are not a violation of § 17, art. 12, of the Constitution of Missouri, which provides that "no railroad or other corporation, or the lessees, purchasers, or managers of any railroad corporation, shall consolidate the stock, property, or franchises of such corporation with, or lease or purchase the works or franchises of, or in any way control, any railroad corporation owning or having under its control a parallel or competing line," etc. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Terminal Asso. (Mo.) 81 S. W. 895. The decision was adopted by a bare majority, three of the seven judges uniting in a vigorous dissent. The theory of the prevailing opinion was that at the time of the adoption of the provision of the Constitution referred to, and when the convention which framed it was in session, there were in the state corporations engaged in carrying over their railroads freight and passengers from one city to another, and other corporations engaged in transferring the cars brought by a railroad to its terminus in a city to some other point in the same city, or to a common terminus of all railroad traffic in that city; that the characters of the business of the two kinds of corporations were essentially different, although both related to railroad traffic; that the one was railroad business in its ordinary meaning, the other, railroad business of a special character; and that the law might naturally be designed with reference to the one without being intended to affect the other; that at the time the constitutional convention was in session there was a law expressly permitting railroad companies to consolidate their property and interests to this extent, and there was, in fact, according to the averment in the information, such a consolidation of interests by railroad companies in operation in St. Louis. And so, before the court could say that the promoters of the Constitution intended the section referred to, to apply to corporations engaged in strictly terminal business, or to railroad companies uniting in a common terminal system, it must have said that they intended to forbid the formation of a union terminal system as the statute had expressly authorized; and then proceeded to argue that to hold that the language of the section did so would be a forced construction of the same. The view taken by the opinion which expressed the judgment of the dissenting judges was that both of said terminal companies were railroad corporations and within the spirit and letter of the Constitution; that they were in fact competing companies, as competition is just as beneficial between terminal companies as it is be-

been, the law itself would have destroyed competition more effectually than any contracts or combinations of persons or of corporations could possibly have stifled it. The exercise of these undoubted rights is essential to the very existence of free competition, and so long as their exercise by any person or corporation in no way deprives competitors of the same rights, or restricts them in the use of these rights, it is difficult to perceive how their exercise can constitute any restriction upon competition or any restraint upon interstate trade.

The acts of the defendants which are alleged by the complaint in this action to constitute an unlawful restraint upon interstate commerce are nothing more than the lawful exercise of these unquestioned rights which are indispensable to the existence of competition or to the conduct of trade. The tobacco company and its employee fixed the prices of its commodities so high that the plaintiff could not profitably buy them. This was no restriction upon free competition, because it left the rivals of the company free to sell their competing commodities at any price which they elected to charge for them. It would have been no violation of the law under consideration if the tobacco company and its employee had combined to refuse to sell any of its commodities at any price, and to retire from the business in which they were engaged entirely. Much less could it be a violation of this act for them to fix their prices too high for profitable investment by the plaintiff.

tween other railroads; that, as the terminal company last organized was to engage in the same kind and character of business as that of the original terminal company, it did not need any argument to demonstrate that the incorporators of both companies would not have invested millions of dollars in those enterprises if they had not felt that the business of St. Louis would justify them in so doing, nor that they intended to enter the field as a competitor for some of the business which it is alleged up to that time was practically monopolized by the one company. The judge delivering the dissenting opinion proceeded to say further: "When it is considered that these two railroad corporations each owned or controlled a railroad bridge across the Mississippi river connecting the union station in St. Louis, in which all the railroads from the west concentrated, and each connecting with the railroads running into East St. Louis from the north, east and south, and that each had its switches and connections with the various manufacturing plants of the city of St. Louis; and bearing in mind always that, under our Missouri statutes, each was compelled, if required, to connect with other railroads or suffer them to connect with them, and each to carry and accept for shipments all cars in bulk tendered to it for forwarding,—it is impossible to reject the conclusion that, in the sense of the Constitution and our statutes, they were competing lines, and that they came within the purview of the 64 L. R. A.

The tobacco company and its employee sold its products to customers who refrained from dealing in the goods of its competitors at prices which rendered their purchases profitable. But there was no restriction upon competition here, because this act left the rivals of the tobacco company free to sell their competing commodities to all other purchasers than those who bought of the defendants, and free to compete for sales to the customers of the tobacco company by offering to them goods at lower prices or on better terms than they secured from that company. The tobacco company and its employee were not required, like competitors engaged in public or quasi public service, to sell to all applicants who sought to buy, or to sell to all intending purchasers at the same prices. They had the right to select their customers, to sell and to refuse to sell to whomsoever they chose, and to fix different prices for sales of the same commodities to different persons. In the exercise of this right they selected those persons who would refrain from handling the goods of their competitors as their customers, by selling their products to them at lower prices than they offered them to others. There was nothing in this selection, or in the means employed to effect it, that was either illegal or immoral. It had no necessary effect to directly and substantially restrict free competition in any of the products of tobacco, and it did not unlawfully restrain interstate commerce, because it in no way restricted the exercise of the rights of the competitors statute forbidding them to consolidate with each other by outright sale or by the lease and contract alleged in the information. We cannot accept the reasoning that they are not such competing lines as are forbidden by the Constitution to consolidate."

III. Effect and construction of Federal anti-trust law.

a. General purpose.

By the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, combinations are condemned, not only when they take the form of trusts, but in whatever form found, if they be in restraint of trade. That is the effect of the words "or otherwise." While it may be that those words should be deemed to include only forms of like character,—that is to say, some form of contract as distinguished from tort, yet, if that be so, it only emphasizes and makes imperative the inference which otherwise would be sufficiently clear, that the word "conspiracy" should be interpreted independently of the preceding words. The words "or otherwise" were used for the purpose of giving full scope to the antecedent words "contract" and "combination," and then "conspiracy" added merely for the same purpose. Construed literally, the terms used in the body of the act forbid all purposes of or combinations in restraint of trade or commerce; but that construction is controlled by the title, which shows that only unlawful restraints were in-

of the tobacco company to fix the prices of their goods and the terms of their sales of similar products according to the dictates of their respective wills.

It is contended, however, that this selection by the defendants of customers who refrained from selling the goods of their competitors violated § 2 of the anti-trust act, because it was an "attempt to monopolize . . . part of the trade or commerce among the several states." It is admitted that the practice of the defendants was not only an attempt, but a successful attempt, to monopolize a part of this commerce. But is every attempt to monopolize any part of interstate commerce made unlawful and punishable by § 2 of the act of July 2, 1890, chap. 647 (26 Stat. at L. 209, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200)? If so, no interstate commerce has ever been lawfully conducted since that act became a law, because every sale and every transportation of an article which is the subject of interstate commerce is a successful attempt to monopolize that part of this commerce which concerns that sale or transportation. An attempt by each competitor to monopolize a part of interstate commerce is the very root of all competition therein. Eradicate it, and competition necessarily ceases,—dies. Every person engaged in interstate commerce necessarily attempts to draw to himself, and to exclude others from, a part of that trade; and, if he may not do this, he may not compete with his rivals, all other persons and corporations must cease to secure for themselves any part of the commerce among the states, and some single corporation or person must be permitted to receive and control it all in one huge monopoly. The purpose of the act of July 2, 1890, was, however to prevent the stifling of competition, not to destroy it or to foster monopoly, and any construction of any of its provisions which would give it such an effect is unreasonable and inconsistent with the object and spirit of the law. It is an interpretation which fosters the mischief it was passed to remedy, and destroys the remedy provided to abate the evil, while a sound construction would tend to abate the mischief and to promote the remedy. It cannot, therefore be the true meaning of the 2d section of this law that every attempt to monopolize any part of interstate commerce is illegal. The act must, as the Supreme Court has twice declared (Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 600, 43 L. ed. 290, 299, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40; United States v. Joint Traffic Assn. 171 U. S. 505, 568, 43 L. ed. 259, 287, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25), have a reasonable construction. The purpose of the 2d section is the same as that of the first,—to prevent the restriction of competition,—and the two sections ought to receive similar interpretations. The Supreme Court has declared that the true construction of the 1st section is that no contract, combination, or conspiracy is denounced by it unless its necessary effect is to directly and substantially restrict competition in commerce among the states. By a parity of reason-tended. But what constitutes an unlawful restraint is not defined; and, under the familiar rule that such Federal enactments will be interpreted by the light of the common law, the statute, in so far as it is directed against contracts or combinations in the form of trusts, or in any form of a contractual character, should be limited to contracts and combinations such, in their general characteristics, as the courts have declared unlawful. A conspiracy is in itself unlawful, and, in so far as the statute is directed against conspiracies in restraint of trade among the several states, it is not necessary to look for the illegality of the offense in the kind of restraint proposed; and, since it would be unnecessary, it would be illogical, to conclude that only conspiracies which are founded upon, or are intended to be accomplished by means of, contracts or combinations in restraint of trade, are within the purview of the act. It would be to make tautologous words which have distinctly different meanings, and to deprive the statute, in a large measure, of its just and needful scope. Any proposed restraint of trade, though it be in itself innocent, if it is to be accomplished by conspiracy, is unlawful. United States v. Debs, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 163, 64 Fed. 724.

Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the consideration of the statute known as the Sherman anti-trust act is no longer an open question. In the exercise of the power to regulate commerce between the states and with foreign nations, Congress may prevent interference by the states with the freedom of interstate commerce, and may, likewise, prohibit individuals, by contract or otherwise, from impeding the free and untrammelled flow of such trade by the act in question. Congress has seen fit, in the exercise of this right, to prohibit all contracts in restraint of trade. It has not left to the courts the consideration of the question whether such restraint is reasonable or unreasonable, or whether the contract would have been illegal at the common law or not. The act leaves for consideration by judicial authority no question of this character, but all contracts and combinations are declared illegal if in restraint of trade or commerce under the states. Cheapeake & O. Fuel Co. v. United States, 53 C. C. A. 256, 115 Fed. 610, Affirming 105 Fed. 93.

The test of the validity of a contract, combination, or conspiracy challenged under the Federal anti-trust act is the direct effect of such a contract or combination upon competition in commerce among the states. If its necessary effect is to stifle competition, or directly and substantially to restrict it, it is void. But if it promotes, or only incidentally or indirectly restricts, competition in commerce among the states, while its main purpose and chief effect are to foster the trade and enhance the business of those who make it, it does not constitute a restraint of interstate commerce within ing, the correct interpretation of the 2d section must be that no attempt to monopolize a part of commerce among the states is made illegal or punishable by the provisions of that section unless the necessary effect of that attempt is to directly and substantially restrict commerce among the states. The acts of the defendants had no such effect. They evidenced nothing but the legitimate efforts of traders to secure for themselves as large a part of interstate trade as possible, while they left their competitors free to do the same. It was not—it could not have been—the purpose or the effect of the 2d section of this law to prohibit or to punish the customary and universal attempts of all manufacturers, merchants, and traders engaged in interstate commerce to monopolize a fair share of it in the necessary conduct and desired enlargement of their trade, while their attempts leave their competitors free to make successful endeavors of the same kind. The acts of the defendants were of this nature, and they did not violate the 2d section of the law. An attempt to monopolize a part of interstate commerce, the necessary effect of which is to stifle or to directly and substantially restrict competition in commerce among the states, violates the 2d section of this act. But an attempt to monopolize a part of interstate commerce which promotes, or but indirectly or incidentally restricts, competition therein, while its main purpose and chief effect are to increase the trade and foster the business of those who make it, was not intended to be made, and was not made, illegal by the 2d section of the act under consideration, because such attempts are indispensable to the existence of any competition in commerce among the states.

There is another reason why the complaint in this action fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action: The sole cause of the damages claimed in it is shown to be the refusal of the defendants to sell their goods to the plaintiff at prices which would enable him to resell them with a profit. Now, no act or omission of a party is actionable, no act or omission of a person causes legal injury to another, unless it is either a breach of a contract with, or of a duty to, him. The damages from other acts or omissions form a part of that damnum absque injuria for which no action can be maintained or recovery had in the courts. The defendants had not agreed to sell their goods to the plaintiff at prices which would make their purchase profitable to him, so that the damages he suffered did not result from any breach of any contract with him. They were not caused by the breach of any legal duty to the plaintiff, for the defendants owed him no duty to sell their products to him at any price,—much less, at prices so low that he could realize a profit by selling them again to others. The complaint therefore fails to show that any legal injury or actionable damages were inflicted upon the plaintiff by the acts of the defendants, and the judgment below is affirmed.

the meaning of that law, and is not obnoxious to its provisions. It is not the purpose of the act to prohibit, or to render illegal, the ordinary contracts or combinations of manufacturers, merchants, and traders, or the usual devices to which they resort to promote the success of their business, to enhance their trade, and to make their occupations gainful, so long as those combinations and devices do not necessarily have a direct and substantial effect to restrict competition in commerce among the states. Phillips v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 125 Fed. 593.

Where a contract made in the territory of Utah was a violation of the Federal anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, an indictment for a violation thereof which consisted of a combination or contract which was a violation of said statute, while it was in its territorial condition, was dismissed after the territory became a state, the contract being one which was to be altogether performed within the original territory. Moore v. United States, 29 C. C. A. 200, 56 U. S. App. 471, 85 Fed. 463.

The specification by a municipal council, in its resolutions and ordinances for street improvements, that Trinidad lake asphalt shall be the material used, does not constitute such a direct interference with interstate commerce as to be repugnant either to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, or to the Sherman anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, because this particular kind of asphalt is a product of a foreign country and there are deposits in several of the United States from which suitable asphalt can be had. Fied v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 194 U. S. 618, 48 L. ed. 1142, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784.

b. What is interstate commerce under this statute?

The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another state does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the state and belongs to commerce. United States v. E. C. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. ed. 325, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, Affirming 24 L. R. A. 428, 9 C. C. A. 297, 17 U. S. App. 466, 60 Fed. 934.

In the above case it appeared that the American Sugar Refining Company, by the purchase of the stock of four other refineries with shares of its own stock, acquired nearly complete control of the manufacture of refined sugar within the United States; that the contracts under which this purchase of stock was made constituted combinations in restraint of trade; and that, in entering into them, the defendants combined and conspired to restrain the trade and commerce in refined sugar among the several states and with foreign nations, contrary to the act. (177 N. Y. 473.)

An agreement between publishers of and dealers in books, whereby they agree not to sell books of any kind to dealers who shall be suspected of selling copyrighted books at less than the net price fixed by the publishers, or who shall supply books to dealers who are suspected of making such sales, violates a statutory provision that every contract whereby a monopoly in the sale of any commodity of common use is or may be created, or whereby competition in the supply or price of any such article is restrained or prevented, or whereby, for the purpose of establishing or maintaining a monopoly, the free prosecution of any lawful business is or may be restricted,—is against public policy and void.

(Gray and Bartlett, JJ., dissent.)

(February 23, 1904.)

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an order of a Special Term for New York County which sustained a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to enjoin the enforcement of an agreement alleged to be void as against the rights of complainant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Stephen H. Olin, for appellants:

The demurrer should have been sustained under the authority of John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 68 N. E. 136, 54 App. Div. 223, 66 N. Y. Supp. 615.

Even if the defendants should refuse to deal in any way whatever with the plaintiffs as long as they persist in cutting rates, the defendants' conduct would not be wrongful since they would be acting with the lawful object of protecting their trade.

Mogul S. S. Co. v. McGregor [1892] A. C. 25, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 295, 66 L. T. N. S. 1, 40 Week. Rep. 337, 7 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 120, 56 J. P. 101; Heaton-Peninsular Button-Fastener Co. v. Eureka Specialty Co. 35 L. R. A. 728, 25 C. C. A. 267, 47 U. S. App. 146, 77 Fed. 288.

If the combination at bar is valid by the common law, as it existed prior to the statute against monopolies, it is also valid under that statute, which is declaratory of the common law.

was tried, showed that only 10 per cent of the sugar refined and sold in the United States was refined in other refineries than those controlled, after such purchase, by the American Sugar Refining Company.

The act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, does not authorize the restraint or prevention of contracts which relate exclusively to the acquisition of sugar refineries and the business of sugar refining in a state, the object of which is private gain in the manufacture, which bear no direct relation to commerce between the states, or with foreign nations; and the fact that trade or commerce might be indirectly affected by such contracts does not bring them within the purview of that statute. Ibid.

The business of buying and selling live stock at stock yards in a city, by members of a stock exchange as commission merchants, is not interstate commerce, although most of the purchases and sales are of live stock sent from other states, and the members of the stock exchange are employed to sell by letter from the owners of the stock in other states, and send agents to other states to solicit business, and advance money to the cattle owners, and pay their drafts, and aid them in making the cattle fit for the market. Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 43 L. ed. 290, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40.

And so a combination of commission merchants at stock yards, by which they refuse to do business with those who are not members 64 L. R. A.

of their association, even if it is illegal, is not subject to the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, since their business is not interstate commerce. Ibid.

A rule of a live-stock exchange, that its members shall not recognize any yard trader who is not also a member of the exchange, is not in restraint of, or an attempt to monopolize, trade, where the exchange does not itself do any business, and there is nothing to prevent all yard traders from being members of the exchange, and no one is hindered from having access to the yards or having all their facilities, except that of selling to members of the exchange. Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 604, 43 L. ed. 300, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50.

And so an agreement among persons engaged in the common business, as yard traders, of buying at a city stock yard cattle which come from different states, that they will form an association for the better conduct of their business, and that they will not transact business with other yard traders who are not members, or buy cattle from those who also sell to yard traders who are not members of the association, is not a violation of the act of July 2, 1890. Ibid.

In Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 604, 43 L. ed. 300, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, and Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 43 L. ed. 290, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40, the defendants were members of the same live-stock exchange, but

The agreement between each of the publishers and each of the jobbers that copy-right books should be sold at retail only at such prices as the owner of the copyright saw fit to fix was lawful.

The several agreements between the publishers and the jobbers in the case at bar are lawful, even without taking into account the monopoly given by the copyright law.

Messrs. Kenmeson, Crain, Emley, & Rubino, also for appellants:

Nothing in the statute makes such acts civil torts, much less civil torts against the state; and, in conferring jurisdiction upon courts of equity, the act furnishes an instance of a statute which confers upon them jurisdiction to restrain and prevent the commission of crimes merely as crimes, and not because they also violate the civil rights of persons, either natural or artificial.

The monopoly aimed at in the statute is a monopoly created, established, or maintained by means of a contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination.

The essence of a monopoly is to be found in the right which someone has to exclude other persons from some branch of trade or industry that he carries on.

The contracts, agreements, arrangements, or combinations in restraint of trade, which are declared by § 1, chap. 690, Laws 1899, to be against public policy, illegal, and void, are the contracts, agreements, arrangements, in the Hopkins Case the defendants were commission merchants who sold the cattle upon a commission as a compensation for their services, while in the Anderson Case the defendants were themselves the purchasers of cattle on the market; but all were members of the same live-stock exchange.

A complaint which alleges that the defendants, who are firms and corporations, had mutually agreed together, each for himself with all the others, that they would not thereafter sell any goods manufactured by them to any person, firm, association, or corporation whatsoever who thereafter should buy or sell any goods manufactured by the plaintiff, and that, in pursuance thereof, the defendants refused to sell their goods to purchasers of and dealers in plaintiff's goods who had offered to buy defendants' goods, stating as the reason for their refusal that said dealers also bought, sold, and dealt in plaintiff's goods; notifying such purchasers and dealers that, if they would promise not to deal in plaintiff's goods, then, and so long as they kept such promise they might purchase the goods of the defendants, or either of them, otherwise not; and that the defendants had fixed upon and maintained an arbitrary price for all the goods manufactured by them,—is demurrable, as the facts alleged are not objectionable to the provisions of the Federal statute known as the anti-trust act. Dueber Watch-Case Mfg. Co. v. E. Howard Watch & Clock Co. 14 C. C. A. 14, 35 U. S. App. 64 L. R. A.

16, 66 Fed. 637. In this case the demurrer had been sustained in the circuit court, and, on the appeal here, two judges were in favor of affirming the judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer,—one for the reason that the agreement and conduct of the combined defendants set forth in the complaint did not constitute a violation of the 1st or 2d section of the act of July 2, 1890; the other judge in favor of affirmance stated that he was not prepared to adopt this reason for his conclusion, but that his reason for regarding the complaint as demurrable was the more technical one, and that the allegations in regard to the facts which are charged to have existed did not show that the defendants restrained any interstate commerce, or monopolized any part of such contract or commerce. The third judge dissented, and was in favor of reversal.

The reason for sustaining the demurrer in the circuit court was that the complaint failed to show that the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce, the allegation of the complaint that the plaintiff was engaged in manufacturing watch cases throughout all the states of the United States and in foreign countries being insufficient for the purpose; and there being no allegation that the defendants were engaged in interstate trade, or that the articles made by them were used in such trade, or that the rights of the general public had been invaded, or interstate commerce injuriously affected by any of the acts of the defendants as or combinations with which the common law had to deal. They are all contracts, agreements, arrangements, or combinations by which some person, a party thereto, has, by means of the contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination, imposed upon himself a voluntary restraint.

Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181.

The rule in the class of cases in restraint of trade typified in Mitchel v. Reynolds has since been modified. The test to-day of the validity of such a contract is not whether the restraint thereby imposed be general or partial, but whether it be reasonable or unreasonable.

The restriction or prevention of the free pursuit of business contemplated by the statute is one brought about by means of a contract, agreement, arrangement, or combination, and, therefore, voluntary in its nature; and it is for the purpose of creating a monopoly.

In Phillips v. Iola Portland Cement Co. 125 Fed. 593, the defendant was a member of a copartnership consisting of merchants engaged in business in Galveston, in the state of Texas. The firm of which defendant was a member made a contract with the cement company whereby it agreed to purchase of the cement company during the year 50,000 barrels of cement to be delivered free on board the cars at Iola, in the state of Kansas, and to pay therefor $1.20 per barrel. It further agreed not to sell said cement, ship same, or allow same to be shipped, outside of the state of Texas. Under the contract it accepted and paid for nearly one half of the amount sold, and refused to accept or pay for the remainder. In an action for the balance due on the contract for the remainder of the cement it was held that the contract was not in violation of the Sherman anti-trust act, as the cement company had no monopoly of the manufacture or sale of cement in the United States. It was surrounded by competing manufacturers, and the contract which it made with the defendant's firm had no direct or substantial effect upon competition in trade among the states.

A combination to restrain competition in proposals for contracts for the sale of certain articles which are to be delivered in the state in which some of the parties to the combination reside and carry on business is not, so far as those members are concerned, in violation of the anti-trust act of Congress, although the 64 L. R. A.

contract may be awarded to some party outside the state as the lowest bidder. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96.

On the trial of an indictment for conspiracy, among other things charging the combining and conspiring to restrain trade and commerce between the states of the Union and with foreign countries; which indictment and trial grew out of the great railway strike which occurred in June and July, 1894,—the court, in charging the jury, stated that commerce among the states consisted of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and included the transportation of persons and property, and the navigation of public waters for that purpose, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities; and that the primary object of the statute of July 2, 1890, was, undoubtedly, to prevent the destruction of legitimate and healthy competition in interstate commerce by individuals, corporations, and trusts, grasping, engrossing, and monopolizing the markets for commodities; but that these provisions are broad enough to reach a combination or conspiracy that would interrupt the transportation of such commodities and persons from one state to another. United States v. Cassidy, 67 Fed. 698.

c. What are unlawful restraints and monopolies under this statute?

The right of a railroad company to charge reasonable rates does not include the right to enter into a combination with competing roads to maintain reasonable rates. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, Reversing 24 L. R. A. 73, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 443, 7 C. C. A. 15, 19 U. S. App. 36, 58 Fed. 58.

The words "unlawful restraints and monopolies," in the title of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, do not show that the purpose of the act was to include only contracts which were unlawful at the common law, but refer to and include those restraints and monopolies which are made unlawful in the body of the act. Ibid.

An action by the United States for the dissolution of an unlawful combination of carriers under an agreement between them for the purpose of mutual protection, by establishing and maintaining reasonable rates, rules, and regulations on all freight traffic, both through and local, and for an injunction for continuing such a combination, can be maintained without proof of the allegations that the agreement was entered into for the purpose of restraining trade or commerce, or for maintaining rates above what was reasonable; as the necessary effect of the agreement is to restrain trade or commerce, no matter what the intent was on the part of those who signed it. Ibid. In the opinion in this case the court said: "Assuming that agreements of this nature are not void at common law, and that the various cases cited by the learned courts below show it, the answer to the statement of their validity now is to be found in the terms of the statute under consideration. The provisions of the interstate commerce act relating to reasonable rates, discriminations, etc., do not authorize such an agreement as this, nor do they authorize any other agreements which would be inconsistent with the provisions of this act."

In United States v. Coal Dealers' Assn. 85 Fed. 252, the court, in approving and following the principle laid down in United States v. 45

Phonograph Co. v. Schlegel, 117 Fed. 624; Denamore v. Scofield, 102 U. S. 375, 376, 26 L. ed. 214, 215; Scribner v. Straus, U. S. C. C. Dec. 14, 1903.

Parker, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Chief Justice Marshall said long ago, in Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. 218, 241, 8 L. ed. 376, 384: "To promote the progress of useful arts is the interest and policy of every enlightened government. It entered into the views of the framers of our Constitution, and the power 'to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries,' is among those expressly given to Congress. . . . It is the reward stipulated for the advantages derived by the public for the exertions of the individual, and is intended as a stimulus to those exertions. The laws which are passed to give effect to this purpose ought, we think, to be construed in the spirit in which they have been made, and to execute the contract fairly on the part of the United States, where the full benefit has been actually received, if this can be done without transcending the intention of the statute, or countenancing acts which are fraudulent or may prove mischievous. The public yields nothing which it has not agreed to yield; it receives all which it has contracted to receive. The full benefit of the discovery after its enjoyment by the discoverer for fourteen years is preserved, and for his exclusive enjoyment of it during that time the public faith is pledged."

That case and many others were considered recently by the United States Supreme Court in E. Bement & Sons v. National Harrow Co. 186 U. S. 70, 46 L. ed. 1058, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747, Mr. Justice Peckham writing. After an examination of the cases which may be said to restrict the exceptions which grow out of a proper exercise of the police power of the state,—of which Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115, is an illustration,—he says (186 U. S. 91, 46 L. ed. 1068, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755): "Notwithstanding these exceptions, the general rule is absolute freedom in the use or sale of rights under the patent laws of the United States. The very object of these laws is monopoly, and the rule is, with few exceptions, that any conditions which are not in their very nature illegal with regard to this kind of property, imposed by the patentee and agreed to by the licensee for the right to manufacture or use or sell the article, will be upheld by the courts. The fact that the conditions in the contracts keep up the monopoly or fix prices does not render them illegal."

That reasoning is employed as to patent rights. It is equally applicable to copyrights, the protection of which was, perhaps, the leading object of the association and agreement attacked in this action. And it points to the principle underlying the decision in the John D. Park & Sons Co. Case,

Trans-Missouri Freight Asso. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, Reversing 24 L. R. A. 73, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 443, 7 C. C. A. 15, 19 U. S. App. 36, 58 Fed. 58, said: "It is, therefore, no defense of a contract or combination, alleged to be in violation of the act, to say that, in view of all the circumstances and conditions, the contract or combination imposes only a fair and reasonable restraint upon trade and commerce. The question is, Does it impose any restraint whatever? If it does, no matter how little or reasonable it may be, it is within the prohibition. This interpretation is in harmony with the other provisions of the statute, which make it unlawful to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations. The contract under consideration in the Freight Asso. Case related to traffic rates for the transportation of persons and property by competing common carriers by railroad; but the doctrine of the case applies as well to articles of commerce—the subject of transportation—as it does to the business of transportation itself; and the clear and positive purpose of the statute must be understood to be that trade and commerce within the jurisdiction of the Federal government shall be absolutely free and no contract or combination will be tolerated that impedes or restricts their natural flow and volume."

Congress has power to forbid any agreement or combination among or between competing railroad companies for interstate commerce, by means of which competition is prevented. United States v. Joint Traffic Asso. 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25, Reversing 78 Fed. 895.

And so Congress has power to prohibit, as in restraint of interstate commerce, a contract or combination between competing railroad companies to establish and maintain interstate rates and fares for the transportation of freight and passengers on any of the railroads, parties to the contract or combination, even though the rates and fares thus established are reasonable. Ibid.

The constitutional freedom of contract in the use and management of property does not include the right of railroad companies to combine as one consolidated and powerful association for the purpose of stifling competition among themselves, and of thus keeping their rates and charges higher than they might otherwise be under the laws of competition, even if their rates and charges are reasonable. Ibid.

And an agreement of railroad companies which directly and effectually prevents competition is, under the statute, in restraint of trade, notwithstanding the possibility that a restraint of trade might also follow unrestricted competition, which might destroy weaker roads, and give the survivor power to raise rates. Ibid.

Restraint of trade within the meaning and intent of the Sherman anti-trust act is not dependent upon any consideration of reasonable-175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136, upon which defendants apparently rest their claim that the judgment of the appellate division should be reversed. But there is a feature in this case not to be found in that one, and which requires a different judgment than the one rendered therein, which will now be pointed out.

While the leading object of this association and agreement purports to be to secure to the owner and publisher of copyrighted books that protection which the Federal government permits them to enjoy for the reasons stated by Chief Justice Marshall, supra, it does not stop there. It also affects the right of a dealer to sell books not copyrighted at the price he chooses, or to sell at all, if he fails to comply with the rules of the association. A combination creating a monopoly of the sale of books not protected by copyright offends against the law of this state as much as if it related to bluestone (Cummings v. Union Blue Stone Co. 164 N. Y. 401, 52 L. R. A. 262, 79 Am. St. Rep. 655, 58 N. E. 525), or to envelopes (Cohen v. Berlin & J. Envelope Co. 166 N. Y. 292, 59 N. E. 906); and according to this complaint, which must be accepted as true on this review, such an outcome is not only possible, but probable. But it is not of moment whether such a result is probable or not, for the test to be applied is, What may be done under the agreement?

Reference to the complaint makes it clear that the association has undertaken to provide for the practical exclusion from the business of selling books not protected by copyright all who refuse to be bound by the rules of the association. And it appears from the complaint that the practical construction given to this agreement by those operating together under it is that if a dealer is suspected of selling copyrighted books at less than the arbitrary net price it is quite sufficient to exclude him from selling books altogether. The agreement nowhere suggests that it is the object of the association to control the sale of books not protected by copyright. Indeed, the object of the association seems to be merely to protect the copyrighted books. But while the other part of the scheme is apparently sought to be hidden, it is after all uncovered by the clauses authorizing the exclusion of any members of the association, or those who refuse to be bound by its rules, from selling books of any description.

The fifteenth paragraph of the complaint alleges "that during the year 1900 a number of prominent publishers, including defendants, hereinbefore described as publishers, for the purpose of securing to themselves an unreasonable and extortionate profit and at the same time with intent to prevent competition in the sale of books, and for the purpose of establishing and maintaining the prices of all books published by them, or any of them, and all books dealt in by them, or any of them, and preventing competition in the sale thereof, unlawfully, illegally, and contrary to the public policy and the ness or unreasonableness in the combination averred; nor is it to be tested by the prices which result from the combination. Combination that leads directly to lower prices to the consumer may, even as against the consumer, be restraint of trade; and combination that leads directly to higher prices may, as against the producer, be restraint of trade. The statute, thus interpreted, has no concern with prices, but looks solely to competition, and to the giving of competition full play, by making illegal any effort at restriction upon competition. Whatever combination has the direct and necessary effect of restricting competition is, within the meaning of the act as now interpreted, restraint of trade. United States v. Swift & Co. 122 Fed. 520.

A combination may illegally restrain trade by preventing competition for contracts and enhancing prices, although it does not prevent the letting of any particular contract. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96.

And so an agreement or combination between corporations engaged in the manufacture, sale, and transportation of iron pipe, under which they enter into public bidding for contracts, not in truth as competitors, but under an arrangement which eliminates all competition between them for the contract, and permits one of their number to make his own bid, while the others are required to bid over him, is in violation of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, 64 L. R. A.

known as the anti-trust act, so far as it applies to sales for delivery beyond the state in which the sale was made. Ibid.

Where manufacturers and wholesale dealers of red-cedar shingles, who reside and carry on their business within the state of Washington, and sell and deliver goods to residents of other states, who have not entered into any combination or contract with residents of other states, have combined and conspired together to fix an arbitrary price to wholesale and retail dealers for an article of merchandise manufactured by them and used in interstate commerce, below which no one is permitted to buy or to sell; and the price so fixed marks a distinct increase of the market price as it had stood theretofore; and the association assumed and exercised, and it is conceded that it will continue to exercise, the power to shut down all mills within the state at will, and for so long a time as it may deem necessary,—such a combination is in restraint of interstate commerce, such as is denounced by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, known as the anti-trust act. Gibbs v. McNeeley, 60 L. R. A. 152, 55 C. C. A. 70, 118 Fed. 120.

The court said that the act contemplated that the combination therein made unlawful need not be one which should, by its terms, refer to interstate commerce; but that it was enough if its purpose and effect were necessarily to restrain interstate trade. That what was said in United States v. E. C. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, establishing, or maintaining a monopoly within this state of the manufacture, production, or sale of any such article or commodity, the free pursuit in this state of any lawful business, trade, or occupation is or may be restricted or prevented, is hereby declared to be against public policy, illegal, and void."

The order should be affirmed, with costs.

Haight, Martin, Vann, and Werner, J.J., concur.

Gray, J., dissenting:

This case, as it comes before us, presents a complaint alleging that the plaintiffs have suffered injury and damage as the result of unlawful combinations and associations entered into by the defendants, either in the form of the American Publishers' Association, or in the form of the American Booksellers' Association, which were intended to establish and to maintain the retail net prices fixed on copyrighted books by their publishers. A demurrer interposed by the defendants to the complaint was sustained by the court at special term; but it has been overruled by the appellate division, and that court has certified to us this question: "Are the facts stated in the complaint in this action sufficient to constitute a cause of action?" In determining this question we must regard as admitted all the material facts alleged by the plaintiffs. Though their complaint is stated at considerable length, much of it is matter of description or the statement of legal conclusions. The plaintiffs conduct a department store in the city of New York, under the name of R. H. Macy & Co., and among the departments is one for the sale of books and publications in general. They have a large capital invested in their general business, and their book department is one of the largest in the country, which latter fact is alleged to be due to the cheaper price placed upon the books and publications under a system of sales for cash only. It appears that publishers who sold at retail, and other booksellers, had not adhered to the "list prices" at which books were advertised or offered for sale at retail, but were accustomed to give large and liberal discounts to those familiar with trade customs, and the purchasing public, discovering that fact, was giving its custom to such dealers as the plaintiffs, who had placed fixed prices upon their books. In 1900, to meet a condition from which the publishing business was suffering, about 95 per cent, in number and in extent of business, of the publishers of all kinds of books and magazines, formed the American Publishers' Association, which upon its organization, and in order "to prevent the cutting or reducing of prices on copyright books published by the members of the said association," adopted a resolution, and, with its members, entered into an agreement "by which each of the members of the association agreed that all copyrighted books published by any of them after May 1, 1901, should be published and sold at retail at net prices,—that is, the pub-conspiracy to accomplish such object, if the railroad is engaged in interstate commerce it will be a violation of the law of Congress commonly known as the anti-trust act. United States v. Debs, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 163, 64 Fed. 724.

A contract between railroad companies which contemplates the institution of a system of interchange of freight and passengers by a railroad corporation to and with four other corporations, and to cease, from and after the execution of that contract or a subsequent date, the further interchange of freight and passengers on through bills, and by through tickets, with another corporation, is not a violation of the Federal anti-trust act. The court said there was no principle of common law which forbids an individual railroad corporation, or two, or three, or more corporations, from selecting which one of two or more corporations they will employ, as auxiliary to their own lines, as the agency by which they will send freight beyond their own lines, or as their agent to receive freight on the auxiliary line to be transmitted to their own line upon through bills, and without breaking bulk; and that there was nothing in the interstate commerce act to warrant the conclusion that the law had been changed in that particular. The court said, further, that it had reached the conclusion that it was not a contract in unlawful restraint of trade within the meaning of the act of July 2, 64 L. R. A.

1890, for the reason that it was not so at common law, was not made so by the interstate commerce statute, and that the act of 1890, as indicated in the Deuber Watch-Case Mfg. Co. v. E. Howard Watch & Clock Co. 14 C. C. A. 14, 35 U. S. App. 16, 66 Fed. 637, and in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 24 L. R. A. 73, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 443, 7 C. C. A. 15, 19 U. S. App. 36, 58 Fed. 58, citing that case in the circuit court of appeals, is directed solely against contracts which would have been unlawful before the passage of the act. Prescott & A. C. B. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 73 Fed. 438.

As has been seen, the Trans-Missouri Case was appealed and reversed, the opposite view being given as one of the reasons for such reversal. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, supra.

An agreement between fourteen distinct coal producers of a district, whose aggregate production is 5,000 tons of coal a day, which, without making a partnership, undertakes to control the entire output of the several mines for shipment into different states by a leading route, the said fourteen producers having before the making of said agreement been independent operators competing in the open market for the trade which was the subject of the contract, and which were, after the making thereof, prevented from any independent action in fixing prices, fished price thereof,—and not be subject to any discounts.” They further agreed, as the complaint states it, “that such net copyrighted books, and all other books, whether copyrighted or not, or whether published by them or not, should be sold by them to those booksellers only who would maintain the retail net price of such net copyrighted books for one year, and to those booksellers and jobbers only who would furthermore sell books at wholesale to no one known to them to cut or sell at a lower figure than such net retail price, or whose name would be given to them by the association as one who cut such net prices.” Thereafter the Publishers’ Association caused to be organized the American Booksellers’ Association, to co-operate, as it is alleged, in the “unlawful purpose of maintaining the price of copyright books and preventing competition in the sale thereof, and in the supply of all books, whether copyrighted or not.” In the effectuation of this purpose the two associations have co-operated, and, because of their agreement, neither of them, nor any of their members, it is alleged, “will sell or supply books at any price to any dealer, whether a member of said association or not, and whether such books are copyrighted or not, or are not published by said American Book Publishers’ Association or its members, who resells, or is suspected of reselling, such copyrighted books at less than the arbitrary net price fixed by said unlawful combination; nor will the said associations nor any of their members sell or supply any books whatever to anyone who resells, or is suspected of reselling, such copyrighted books to any dealer who thereafter sells the same at less than such arbitrary net price.”

In these statements, taken from the complaint, may be found the gist of this suit, and all that is necessary to be considered, in my opinion, in the determination of the question whether, by such combinations and agreements, the defendants have violated the law. Other allegations relate to the refusal of the plaintiffs to join in such combinations; to the methods adopted by the defendants to prevent others from selling books to the plaintiffs, by “blacklisting” them in the book business, and by the use of coercive and intimidating measures; to the establishment by the defendants of a system of espionage, in order to secure information as to the sources of plaintiffs’ supplies of books; and that, as the result of these agreements and of the methods adopted to make them effectual, publishers of books and book dealers have refused to sell books at any price to the plaintiffs, to their damage. The relief asked is, in substance, the adjudication of the unlawfulness of the combination and of the nullity of the agreement alleged, and that an injunction issue restraining action by the defendants under their agreement, of any nature which may make it effectual against the plaintiffs; and, as incidental to such equitable relief, an award of damages is asked.

Gray, J., dissenting:

This case, as it comes before us, presents a complaint alleging that the plaintiffs have suffered injury and damage as the result of unlawful combinations and associations entered into by the defendants, either in the form of the American Publishers' Association, or in the form of the American Booksellers' Association, which were intended to establish and to maintain the retail net prices fixed on copyrighted books by their publishers. A demurrer interposed by the defendants to the complaint was sustained by the court at special term; but it has been overruled by the appellate division, and that court has certified to us this question: "Are the facts stated in the complaint in this action sufficient to constitute a cause of action?" In determining this question we must regard as admitted all the material facts alleged by the plaintiffs. Though their complaint is stated at considerable length, much of it is matter of description or the statement of legal conclusions. The plaintiffs conduct a department store in the city of New York, under the name of R. H. Macy & Co., and among the departments is one for the sale of books and publications in general. They have a large capital invested in their general business, and their book department is one of the largest in the country, which latter fact is alleged to be due to the cheaper price placed upon the books and publications under a system of sales for cash only. It appears that publishers who sold at retail, and other booksellers, had not adhered to the "list prices" at which books were advertised or offered for sale at retail, but were accustomed to give large and liberal discounts to those familiar with trade customs, and the purchasing public, discovering that fact, was giving its custom to such dealers as the plaintiffs, who had placed fixed prices upon their books. In 1900, to meet a condition from which the publishing business was suffering, about 95 per cent, in number and in extent of business, of the publishers of all kinds of books and magazines, formed the American Publishers' Association, which upon its organization, and in order "to prevent the cutting or reducing of prices on copyright books published by the members of the said association," adopted a resolution, and, with its members, entered into an agreement "by which each of the members of the association agreed that all copyrighted books published by any of them after May 1, 1901, should be published and sold at retail at net prices,—that is, the pub-conspiracy to accomplish such object, if the railroad is engaged in interstate commerce it will be a violation of the law of Congress commonly known as the anti-trust act. United States v. Debs, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 163, 64 Fed. 724.

A contract between railroad companies which contemplates the institution of a system of interchange of freight and passengers by a railroad corporation to and with four other corporations, and to cease, from and after the execution of that contract or a subsequent date, the further interchange of freight and passengers on through bills, and by through tickets, with another corporation, is not a violation of the Federal anti-trust act. The court said there was no principle of common law which forbids an individual railroad corporation, or two, or three, or more corporations, from selecting which one of two or more corporations they will employ, as auxiliary to their own lines, as the agency by which they will send freight beyond their own lines, or as their agent to receive freight on the auxiliary line to be transmitted to their own line upon through bills, and without breaking bulk; and that there was nothing in the interstate commerce act to warrant the conclusion that the law had been changed in that particular. The court said, further, that it had reached the conclusion that it was not a contract in unlawful restraint of trade within the meaning of the act of July 2, 64 L. R. A.

1890, for the reason that it was not so at common law, was not made so by the interstate commerce statute, and that the act of 1890, as indicated in the Deuber Watch-Case Mfg. Co. v. E. Howard Watch & Clock Co. 14 C. C. A. 14, 35 U. S. App. 16, 66 Fed. 637, and in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 24 L. R. A. 73, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 443, 7 C. C. A. 15, 19 U. S. App. 36, 58 Fed. 58, citing that case in the circuit court of appeals, is directed solely against contracts which would have been unlawful before the passage of the act. Prescott & A. C. B. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 73 Fed. 438.

As has been seen, the Trans-Missouri Case was appealed and reversed, the opposite view being given as one of the reasons for such reversal. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, supra.

An agreement between fourteen distinct coal producers of a district, whose aggregate production is 5,000 tons of coal a day, which, without making a partnership, undertakes to control the entire output of the several mines for shipment into different states by a leading route, the said fourteen producers having before the making of said agreement been independent operators competing in the open market for the trade which was the subject of the contract, and which were, after the making thereof, prevented from any independent action in fixing prices, fished price thereof,—and not be subject to any discounts." They further agreed, as the complaint states it, "that such net copyrighted books, and all other books, whether copyrighted or not, or whether published by them or not, should be sold by them to those booksellers only who would maintain the retail net price of such net copyrighted books for one year, and to those booksellers and jobbers only who would furthermore sell books at wholesale to no one known to them to cut or sell at a lower figure than such net retail price, or whose name would be given to them by the association as one who cut such net prices." Thereafter the Publishers' Association caused to be organized the American Booksellers' Association, to co-operate, as it is alleged, in the "unlawful purpose of maintaining the price of copyrighted books and preventing competition in the sale thereof, and in the supply of all books, whether copyrighted or not." In the effectuation of this purpose the two associations have co-operated, and, because of their agreement, neither of them, nor any of their members, it is alleged, "will sell or supply books at any price to any dealer, whether a member of said association or not, and whether such books are copyrighted or not, or are not published by said American Book Publishers' Association or its members, who resells, or is suspected of reselling, such copyrighted books at less than the arbitrary net price fixed by said unlawful combination; nor will the said associations nor any of their members sell or supply any books whatever to anyone who resells, or is suspected of reselling, such copyrighted books to any dealer who thereafter sells the same at less than such arbitrary net price."

In these statements, taken from the complaint, may be found the gist of this suit, and all that is necessary to be considered, in my opinion, in the determination of the question whether, by such combinations and agreements, the defendants have violated the law. Other allegations relate to the refusal of the plaintiffs to join in such combinations; to the methods adopted by the defendants to prevent others from selling books to the plaintiffs, by "blacklisting" them in the book business, and by the use of coercive and intimidating measures; to the establishment by the defendants of a system of espionage, in order to secure information as to the sources of plaintiffs' supplies of books; and that, as the result of these agreements and of the methods adopted to make them effectual, publishers of books and book dealers have refused to sell books at any price to the plaintiffs, to their damage. The relief asked is, in substance, the adjudication of the unlawfulness of the combination and of the nullity of the agreement alleged, and that an injunction issue restraining action by the defendants under their agreement, of any nature which may make it effectual against the plaintiffs; and, as incidental to such equitable relief, an award of damages is asked.

Munson S. S. Line*, 87 N. Y. Supp. 811.

d. Agreement not to engage in business.

Where a corporation sold and transferred its property, business, and good will, a covenant on the part of the stockholders to the effect that they would not, during the next ten years, in the territory, or the immediate vicinity of the territory, dealt in by their company, or operated in by themselves or the agents or employees of the company, engage or in any manner be in-real cause of grievance, which is that, in order to maintain the retail net price of a copyrighted book as fixed by its publisher, the defendants had entered into a combination, and had agreed with each other that they would only sell to those in the trade who would agree to maintain, and to assist in maintaining, the net retail price, and that they would not deal at all with those who refused strict co-operation in such respect, whether that was shown in the conduct of their own sales, or in the selling to others known by them to be "cutting" the net price. That I regard as the gravamen of this suit.

At the time of the doing of the things alleged in the complaint to have been unlawful, there was upon the statute books of this state an act which had for its object the prevention of monopolies and the prohibition of restraints upon trade and commerce. Chapter 690, p. 1514, Laws 1899. This statute, commonly called the "anti-trust law," contains three sections. The 1st section has a threefold purpose,—in declaring to be against public policy, illegal, and void every contract or combination whereby a monopoly in the manufacture, production, or sale in this state of "any article or commodity of common use" may be created or "whereby competition in this state in the supply or price of any such article or commodity is or may be restrained or prevented," or whereby the free pursuit of any lawful business may be restricted or prevented. I am unable to see how that any but the second provision of this section can bear upon the present controversy, because the owner of the copyright has a monopoly under Federal laws, and because the agreement complained of does not restrict the pursuit of the book business to localities or to persons, or otherwise than for the purpose of preventing the cutting by anyone of the price of a copyrighted book, through the threatened withdrawal of all business relations with such person. Section 2 of the act makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any person or corporation to enter into any such contract or combination. The 3d section provides that the attorney general may bring an action, in behalf of the people, against any person or corporate agency, to restrain the doing in this state of any act in consummation of any contract or combination therein prohibited.

The argument in behalf of the plaintiffs is largely, if not wholly, based upon this statute. I regard its prohibitory provisions, however, as but the declaration of a state policy, which is, to use the language of the opinion in Re Davies, 168 N. Y. 89, 101, 56 L. R. A. 855, 61 N. E. 118, 120, "little more than a codification of the common law upon the subject." The contracts, agreements, arrangements, and combinations prohibited by this statute were condemned at common law; but they did not, as this statute does, subject those who entered into them to criminal punishment, or make them amenable to restraint at the suit of the people. It interested in, either directly or indirectly, for themselves or for others, the same or like kind or character of business as that theretofore conducted, etc.; stating that the meaning of the agreement was that the purchaser was buying and paying for the good will of the business in the largest and fullest scope of the term, and that they would not do anything to interfere with or injure the said business,—an injunction will be granted against one who violates his said agreement by entering into the employ of a rival concern, as such agreement violates neither the Sherman anti-trust act, so called, nor the statute of Michigan of 1899. Such an injunction will also be issued to restrain another company dealing in the same product from aiding such stockholder to violate his contract with the purchaser by employing him in its business. A. Booth & Co. v. Davis, 127 Fed. 875.

And so where a number of persons, stockholders of a corporation engaged in the business of catching, salting, and selling fish, agreed, in consideration of the purchase of their business by another, not to enter into competition with him in the fish business for a certain period of time, such contract is not within the condemnation of the Sherman anti-trust act. Ibid.

A contract whereby a party sold all his interest and good will in the business of freighting vessels for a certain port, and, for a certain term therein mentioned, agreed not to solicit freights, nor do any business with that port in 64 L. R. A.

or from any place or places in the United States east of the Mississippi river, with certain exceptions, is not invalid under the Federal anti-trust act. Brett v. Ebel, 29 App. Div. 256, 51 N. Y. Supp. 573.

As to effect of state anti-trust statutes on contract not to engage in business, see Hitchcock v. Anthony, 28 C. C. A. 80, 54 U. S. App. 439, 83 Fed. 779, infra, IV. 1; Downing v. Lewis, 56 Neb. 388, 76 N. W. 900, infra, IV. n; and cases in infra, IV. v, 3.

e. Effect on collateral contracts.

The violation of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, by the formation of a combination in restraint of trade, by which a penalty is incurred under the statute, does not preclude the company thus illegally formed from recovering on collateral contracts for the purchase price of goods. Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 540, 46 L. ed. 679, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 431.

And so a recovery of the treble damages authorized by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, in case of injury sustained by violation of the act, can be had only by the direct action, and not by way of set-off, in an action brought for the price of goods, by a company illegally formed in violation of the act,—especially when the state practice does not permit the set-off of unliquidated damages. Ibid.

The owner and claimant of a vessel which has might possibly be well said of this statute that, introducing no new rule of law, it now makes the contracts or combinations mentioned, which before were unenforceable, unlawful and criminal offenses, and the subject of preventive judgments, at the instance of the law officer of the state.

If, then, the statute makes the position of the complainants no stronger at law than it was before its passage, it seems to me that the decision of this case should be controlled by our decision in John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136. Indeed, the decision of that case was made after the passage of chapter 383, p. 310, of the Laws of 1897, of which the act in question is but the continuation and re-enactment, and the existence of the law upon the statute books was not ignored; for it was expressly referred to by Judge Martin, in his dissenting opinion, as a declaration of the policy of the state with reference to combinations of the nature of those described. It was, in my opinion, quite as authoritative upon the question of the lawfulness of the existing combination aimed at in the Park Case; for, being a continuing arrangement, it could not be exempt from the operation of the act. The action of the plaintiffs in the Park Case was to have declared illegal the course adopted for conducting the business of the sale of proprietary medicines, as devised and carried on by the defendants through their association, under the title of the National

Druggists' Association. The plaintiff was a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing proprietary or patent medicines and of dealing in the sale of such goods. The association was composed of wholesale and jobbing druggists, and of proprietors and manufacturers, who manufactured and sold their own proprietary articles, or chemical preparations. Its active membership controlled more than 90 per cent of the wholesale and jobbing trade. The plan which the association had adopted and was acting under was to require the manufacturers to compel the purchasers of their goods to contract, as selling agents, to maintain fixed selling prices, in consideration of receiving a certain fixed discount or rebate. In order to maintain a uniform jobbing price for fixed quantities, and also a retail selling price by the druggists, which they were to agree to maintain, it was agreed on the part of the manufacturers, at the instance of the wholesale and jobbing druggists, that they would confine their sales to persons named on a list furnished, as being those who would faithfully observe the prices and conditions named by the manufacturers. The plaintiff in that case refused to unite with the defendants, insisted upon its right to sell proprietary goods at such prices as it saw fit, and sought, by its action, to restrain the defendants from continuing their efforts to prevent it from purchasing, and the manufacturers from selling to it, their goods, by way of threats and by methods of intimidation not materially un-been libeled in the United States district court, by the owner of a tug, for moneys earned by the tug in towing such vessel, cannot be permitted to repudiate his just debts to the owner of the tug upon an allegation and proof that such owner was, with the owners of other tugs, a member and party to a contract, combination, or association which was illegal under the Federal anti-trust act. The Charles E. Wise-wall, 74 Fed. 802, Affirmed in 42 L. R. A. 85, 30 C. C. A. 339, 57 U. S. App. 179, 86 Fed. 671.

The defense that a contract is in violation of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, may be set up by a private individual when sued thereon, and, if proved, constitutes a good defense to the action, as the act makes illegal every contract violative of its provisions. E. Bement & Sons v. National Harrow Co. 186 U. S. 70, 46 L. ed. 1058, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747.

One of several railroad companies, which was a member of a combination known as the Trunk Line Association, composed of the men of the railroads which operated in different states with a view to avoid and stifle competition upon an agreed division of receipts, is precluded from bringing an action in equity to restrain ticket brokers or scalpers from selling the return tickets of such railroad by a fraudulent connivance with the persons of whom they bought them and those to whom they sell them; which action it could have maintained but for the fact that the combination mentioned is 64 L. R. A.

in violation of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the Federal anti-trust act. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Frank, 110 Fed. 689.

1. Effect on pre-existing contracts.

Retroactive effect is not given to a statute making combinations in restraint of trade illegal, by applying the statute to a continuation, after its passage, of a pre-existing contract. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed. 1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, Reversing 24 L. R. A. 73, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 443, 7 C. C. A. 15, 19 U. S. App. 36, 58 Fed. 58.

g. Effect in regard to patents.

An agreement by the licensor of a patent for improvements relating to harrows not to license like those complained of in the present case. In that case the object of the combination was to establish uniform jobbing prices and retail selling prices for proprietary goods, and the plan was to enforce compliance through the threatened refusal of the proprietors and manufacturers to sell to dealers who would not maintain the retail price. Between the two cases there are differences in details of the methods availed of; but, while the self-defensive or preventive arrangements may have been more stringent and radical in the one than in the other case, the legal principle is not affected. The effort in each case was to make effective an agreement with respect to the fixing and maintenance of the retail price of an article as much proprietary in the one as in the other case, and the differences in the plan adopted, in sum, are rather of degree; that is, in the present case the defendants have agreed to refuse to have any business dealings with those booksellers who would not co-operate to the fullest extent in maintaining sales of copyrighted books at the retail price fixed by their publishers. It was held in the Park Case that the proprietors of the goods therein in question had the right to adopt such a plan with respect to the disposal thereof as they saw fit, and that no one could complain. The plan was not in restraint of trade; for while, as it was said by Judge Haight, "it is true that it does away with the competition among dealers as to prices, but it creates no restriction upon them as to the quantities that they may be able to sell, or the territory within which they may confine their transactions; and upon the question of prices we must bear in mind that the goods are covered by patent rights and trademarks, which give the proprietors the exclusive right of specifying prices at which the articles shall be sold, and, following this, the right also to require dealers to maintain the prices specified." This plan was not against public policy, it was held, because public policy "commends the conduct of business in such a way as to serve all consumers alike," and "one of the cardinal and chief principles of the plan adopted is the establishing of a uniform price by proprietors, which necessitates the service of all persons alike throughout the United States." Chief Judge Parker also, any other persons than the licensee to manufacture or sell any harrows of the peculiar style and construction then used, or sold, by such licensee, does not violate the act of Congress of July 2, 1890. E. Bement & Sons v. National Harrow Co. 186 U. S. 70, 46 L. ed. 1058, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747.

The agreement of the licensee of a patent for improvements relating to float spring-tooth harrows, not to manufacture or sell any other such harrows than those which it had made under its patent before assigning them to the licensor, or which it was licensed to manufacture and sell under the terms of the license, except such other style and construction as it may be licensed to manufacture and sell by such licensor, is not void as an unlawful restraint on trade or commerce, forbidden by the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, since the plain purpose of this provision is to prevent the licensee from infringing on the rights of others under other patents, and not to stifle competition or prevent the licensee from attempting to make any improvement in harrows. Ibid.

In an action in equity to enjoin the defendant from infringing a patent the fact that the complainant was one of a combination which violated the Sherman anti-trust act is no defense to the action. General Electric Co. v. Wise, 119 Fed. 922.

Where the owners of different patents engaged in the raisin-seeding business, after litigation among themselves, entered into a combination by which all of the patents were assigned to one under an agreement that such assignee should become the licensor of the patents, that the others of the combination should take licenses from such licensor to use the patents, that the licensor should prosecute all infringements, and that the licenses should be limited to such licensees as should be agreed on, and that each license should contain a covenant on the part of the licensee as to the use and ownership of the patented machines and an agreement not to use any other,—such combination and agreement are not a violation of the Sherman anti-trust act; and, in an action by the licensor against one of the licensees for a balance of license fees, a defense, under which it was claimed that it was such a violation, was held insufficient, the court holding that the contract in question was not obnoxious to the performance of the Sherman anti-trust act. United States Consol. Seeded Raisin Co. v. Griffin & S. Co. 126 Fed. 364.

b. Remedies

1. Criminal prosecution.

An indictment under § 2 of the anti-trust act, which charges that the defendants had done certain things with intent to monopolize the traffic in distilled spirits among the several states, but which does not contain a distinct averment in the words of the statute, or in unequivocal language, that, by means of the acts charged, the defendants had monopolized, or had combined or conspired to monopolize, trade and commerce among the several states or with foreign nations; and which does not charge that the defendants entered into any unlawful combination or conspiracy, nor contain any averment that they had monopolized trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations; but which merely avers that, by means of the acts alleged, they had monopolized the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits, without stating that in so doing they had monopolized trade and commerce in distilled spirits among the several states or with foreign nations,—is insufficient, and will be quashed on motion therefor. United States v. Greenhut, 50 speaking for the majority of the court in the Park Case, was of the opinion, with reference to the charge in the complaint that the wholesale dealers could be proceeded against because they compelled some or all of the manufacturers, against their will and inclination, to refuse to sell their goods to plaintiff, by threats, intimidation, and black-listing, as evidenced by the agreements and written plans of the association and the declared purpose of the members to carry them out to the letter, that the defendants were not doing anything except what they had a right to do. In that case the court divided in opinion upon the sole question whether the agreement alleged was vicious, as operating in restraint of trade and in prevention of competition. It is difficult for me to see wherein the decision in the Park Case is not controlling. The logical and consistent application of its doctrine must result in sustaining the demurrer here.

I can discover nothing in the purpose of these defendants which is morally wrong, or which would deserve condemnation at common law. There is no combination to restrain competition among themselves, but simply an agreement among themselves to bring about more healthful conditions in a certain branch of the general bookselling trade by the maintenance of a uniform fixed retail price on a copyrighted book; that is to say, they agree that publishers of copyrighted books shall fix the net price at which such books shall be sold at retail, and that those prices must be observed by all dealers, at the peril to them, if they undersell, of having business relations wholly severed. That the publisher of a copyrighted book may fix its price cannot very well be denied; and if, by reason of a large number of publishers combining in a plan to compel the net retail price to be universally adhered to in sales, competition may be restrained, that is but an incident of the execution of a lawful plan. How can it be said that the statute in question is operative in such a case, where the copyright constitutes a monopoly which the Federal government has granted to the publisher? The subject of these protective agreements—the very kernel, as we may say, of the combination—was the resolve of publishers to maintain throughout the trade, and everywhere,

Fed. 469; Re Corning, 51 Fed. 205; Re Greene, 52 Fed. 104.

In the last case the court said: "It is very certain that Congress could not, and did not, by this enactment attempt to prescribe limits to the acquisition, either by the private citizen or state corporation, of property which might become the subject of interstate commerce, or declare that, when the accumulation or control of property by legitimate means and lawful methods reached such magnitude or proportions as to enable the owner or owners to control the traffic therein, or any part thereof, among the states, a criminal offense was committed by such owner or owners."

An indictment under the 2d section of the anti-trust act should state all the facts and circumstances which go to make up the offense charged with sufficient particularity to bring it within the meaning of the statute, and an indictment which simply follows the language of the statute is insufficient. United States v. Nelson, 52 Fed. 646.

In order to support an indictment under the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the anti-trust act, it is not sufficient to declare in the words of the enactment, as such an indictment does not set out all the elements of a crime. A contract or combination in restraint of trade may be, not only not illegal, but praiseworthy; as, where parties attempt to engross the market by furnishing the best goods, or the cheapest. Ordinarily a case cannot be made under the statute unless the means are shown to be illegal,—and so it is necessary to declare the means by which it is intended to engross or monopolize the market. And it is not sufficient to allege the means in general language; but, if it is claimed that the means used are illegal, enough must be set out to enable the court to see that they are so, and to enable the defense properly to prepare to meet the charge made against it. United States v. Patterson, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 775, 55 Fed. 605.

See Com. v. Grinstead, 108 Ky. 59, 55 S. W. 720, 57 S. W. 471, infra, IV. h.

And so, in order to render an indictment for making a contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations under the Federal anti-trust act, there must be alleged in the indictment that there was a purpose to restrain trade as implied in the common-law expression, "contract in restraint of trade," analogous to the word "monopolies" in the 2d section. Ibid.

And it must also appear somewhere in the indictment that there was a conspiracy in restraint of trade by engrossing or monopolizing or grasping the market; and it is not sufficient simply to allege a purpose to drive certain competitors out of the field by violence, annoyance, intimidation, or otherwise. Ibid.

Where counts in an indictment for making a contract to restrain trade or commerce among the states or with foreign countries under the Federal anti-trust act allege a purpose of engrossing, monopolizing, or grasping the trade in question, acts of violence and intimidation may be alleged as a means to accomplish the general purpose, as such acts, instead of lying outside of the statute, may aggravate the offense, as they are within the logic and spirit of the statute, which are not to be defeated by distinctions which its letter does not suggest to the ordinary mind. Violence and intimidation are as much within the mischief intended to be cured by the statute as negotiations, contracts, or purchases, the former being often used to compel the latter. United States v. Patterson, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 775, 55 Fed. 605.

2. Injunction.

A remedy by injunction for the protection of interstate commerce may be provided by Congress as more efficient than any other civil rema net retail price for copyrighted books, and that was to be enforced to the extent of refusing to have any business dealings with those sellers of books—whether in treaty with the defendants or not—who refused, or connived at the refusal of others, to sell at the price fixed. How was this unlawful? Doubtless, this resolution was of a stringent and wholesale nature; but is it inharmonious with the exclusive or monopolistic nature of the Federal grant of letters of copyright? I do not think so. When, in innovation of the common law, the Congress of the United States exercised its constitutional power to enact copyright and patent laws, it was the purpose that authors and inventors should have monopolies in the ownership and disposition of the subject of the patent or copyright. It does not seem to me, therefore, that any plan, however radical, which is adopted for the protection of the enjoyment of the monopoly, and especially one which simply results in producing absolute uniformity of price rates, can be said to be within the operation of the state law against combinations and agreements for the creation of monopolies or for the prevention of competition.

The United States Supreme Court, in its consideration of the act of Congress known, commonly, as the "Sherman anti-trust act" (passed July 2, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200]), which declared that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, or commerce, among the states," etc., was illegal, has interpreted it as aiming only at a contract or combination which has for its direct purpose the restraint of interstate trade or commerce, and as not comprehending a case where the restraint was an incidental result. Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 604, 43 L. ed. 300, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50. In that case, by the by-laws of an association its members were forbidden to buy or sell cattle from or to traders not members of the exchange, or to buy from commission men who bought from, or sold to, nonmembers. The United States sought to dissolve the association, and to enjoin the members from carrying out their exclusive rules, upon the theory that they

Congress had full power to authorize such civil proceeding in equity to suppress and restrain combinations and conspiracies to accomplish the obstruction and destruction of interstate commerce and trade before it is accomplished. It was just as competent for Congress to provide this civil remedy of prevention as it was to provide for punishment in a criminal proceeding for the unlawful conspiracy entered upon or consummated. United States v. Elliott, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 148, 64 Fed. 27.

The only remedy which a private individual or corporation has for injury by reason of a violation of the Federal anti-trust act is an action at law for the triple damages therein provided, and such private party cannot maintain an action in equity. Southern Indiana Exp. Co. v. United States Exp. Co. 88 Fed. 659, Affirmed in 35 C. C. A. 172, 92 Fed. 1022.

The act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the anti-trust act, makes all combinations in restraint of trade or commerce unlawful, and punishes them by fine or imprisonment, and authorizes suits at law for triple damages for its violation; but it gives no new right to bring a suit in equity; and a careful study of the act shows that suits in equity, or injunction suits, by any other than the government of the United States, are not authorized by it. Blindell v. Hagan, 54 Fed. 40; Pidcock v. Harrington, 64 Fed. 821; Greer, M. & Co. v. Stoller, 77 Fed. 1; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Miami S. S. Co. 30 C. C. A. 142, 52 U. S. 3. Action for triple damages.

An association of wholesale dealers in tiles, mantles, and grates in San Francisco and vicinity, and nonresident manufacturers of tiles and fire-place fixtures, in which the dealers agree not to purchase from manufacturers not members of the association, and not to sell unset tiles to nonmembers for less than list prices, which are more than 50 per cent higher than prices to members; while the manufacturers agree not to sell their products or wares to nonmembers at any price, under penalty of forfeiture of membership,—is an agreement or combination in restraint of trade within the meaning of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890. W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307, Affirming 63 L. R. A. 58, 52 C. C. A. 621, 115 Fed. 27.

Lowry v. Tile, Mantel, & Grate Asso. 98 Fed. 817, 106 Fed. 38, was an action to recover triple damages of the defendants for a violation of the Federal anti-trust act under the provisions of § 7 of the act, and the contract or agreement which was complained of as being in violation of the act was the same contract as the one mentioned in W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307, Affirming 63 L. R. A. 58, 52 C. C. A. 621, 115 Fed. 27.

The case in 98 Fed. 817, was the overruling of the demurrer to the complaint, and, in making its decision, the court said that the doctrine of Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96, was applicable here; that the allegations charging conspiracy and combination to raise the price of the commodities in question, and an agreement by the members of the combination to sell these commodities at such prices as should be arbitrarily fixed by the combination, together with the further allegation that the combination had been made with intent to mo-were engaged in interstate commerce. But the Federal Supreme Court held, if that were so, that, nevertheless, the combination was not within the purview of the statute, and that the agreement did "not restrict competition among the defendants for the class of cattle dealt in by them."

At common law those combinations were condemned, wherein the persons in combination had agreed between themselves to restrict the production and the supply of some article of prime necessity, for the reason that, as constituting an immediate restraint upon trade and upon competition, it was a detriment to the public, and hence contrary to public policy. They were not condemned by legislation as illegal and criminal, but the courts refused to enforce the agreement. What the law of this state aims at, in undertaking to stamp any of the described combinations and contracts as an unlawful and criminal act, is to prevent an agreement being carried out between persons which looks to the restraint of competition between themselves in, and to the controlling of the production and price of, articles of common use. It was, upon a reasonable reading, intended to operate upon contracts whose direct effect was to restrain trade, or to prevent competition between its parties, within this state; and its operation should not be extended to cases where the effect was an incident of some plan not itself unlawful. And, as I have before suggested, the monopolies aimed at were those which the contract of the combination might create, and clearly not those which were created by the law of the land.

But this contract of the combination, analyze it how you may, had no other reason or purpose than to protect, in as drastic ways as the parties could devise, the trading business of publishers of copyrighted books. There was no "pooling" in the arrangement; nor was there any restraint imposed upon the parties to it as to competition in the production and sale of some article, which all were engaged in producing and which all were free to supply. The contract did not extend to uncopyrighted books, other than by way of penalty, as the refusal to deal in them might be incidental to the refusal to deal with booksellers who would not live up to, or who would not monopolize the trade and commerce between the state where it existed and other states, were sufficient, under the authorities, to bring the case within the operation of the provisions of the Sherman act.

The report in 106 Fed. 38, is of the trial of the case, in which the same judge who overruled the demurrer charged the jury that the agreement was a combination in restraint of trade and commerce among the states, because it imposed a tax on a person, or firm, or corporation, desiring to become a member of the association, and also because the members of the association had, in violation of law, entered into a contract and combination by which they attempted to monopolize, and had monopolized, a part of the trade and commerce between the manufacturers in the east and the dealers in San Francisco in the articles of tiles.

There were several defendants in the case, and, from the judgment of $500 in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants W. W. Montague & Co. appealed, and under that name the judgment was affirmed in 63 L. R. A. 58, 52 C. C. A. 621, 115 Fed. 27, and thereafter, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of the United States as stated.

A declaration which alleges that the plaintiff was engaged in the manufacture of fruit butter, jellies, preserves, etc., and, at the instance of others engaged in the same business, entered into an agreement with them for the formation of a trust or combination for the purpose of advancing and maintaining the prices of such goods; and that he had transferred his property to the trust or combination, after which differences arose between himself and the managers of said trust, and the said trust brought a suit in replevin and took possession of the property, plant, books, etc., which plaintiff had used in the management of his business in connection with said trust, and also brought a suit at law against plaintiff for damages, both of which were yet undecided, it being clear from the allegations in the declaration that the plaintiff had attempted to bring the suit under the provisions of the anti-trust act,—is insufficient, as the injuries complained of are not such as give a right of action under that statute. Bishop v. American Preservers' Co. 51 Fed. 272.

1. Case of the Northern Securities Company.

A recent case arising under the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, is that of Northern Securities Co. v. United States, 193 U. S. 197, 48 L. ed. 679, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436, Affirming 120 Fed. 721, and it is one of the greatest importance, not only to those interested in railroad matters, but also to shippers by railroad, and indirectly to all the people generally. Two railroads were in a measure trans-continental, their lines running parallel and not measured by their proximity to other trans-continentals, not far distant from each other, the one chartered by the state of Wisconsin and the other by the state of Minnesota, one almost entirely under the control of one well-known railroad financier, and the other under the control of another equally well known. The stockholders of either road, evidently for the purpose of placing the two roads substantially under one control, permitted and procured the organization of a third corporation known as the Northern Securities Company under the laws of the state of New Jersey. The Northern Securities association was organized with a capital stock of $400,000,000, which happened to be just the sum required to purchase the stock of the two railroad companies under an arrangement hereinafter mentioned. The actual cash invested in the incorporation of the Northern Securities Company was $30,000, expended in effecting that organico-operate in, an agreement to maintain the net retail price of a copyrighted book. It is not unlawful for a person to refuse to deal with others, as his judgment or fancy may impel him. His business is his own, and the only limitation upon his pursuit of it is that he shall not interfere with the legal rights of others. It seems to me that what he may lawfully do himself he may unite with others in doing, if of some common advantage. See John D. Park & Sons Co. v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136; Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S. 604, 43 L. ed. 300, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50; Macaulay v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770, 33 Atl. 1; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319, 55 N. W. 1119. Combinations for the prevention of competition have been commonly understood to be made between those who themselves have been competitors in the particular business, and who enter into an agreement with each other to regulate the price of the particular article of necessity traded in. The agreement alleged here is not of that nature. If the law is violated by this agreement, it is not because competition between the parties is to be suppressed, for their object is solely to maintain the net retail prices which they, as publishers, have rightfully fixed on the copyrighted books they are selling. What competition is prevented must be, plainly, that incidentally occurring between booksellers who, for some advantage to be gained in their business, would sell such books under the retail price fixed by their publisher. But if that is the test to be applied to the legality of the combination or of the agreement attacked, it appears to me to be an extraordinarily inaccurate one, and quite beyond the intent of the statute supposed to incorporate the common-law rule.

To summarize, as it has been well done in the argument of the appellant's counsel: The purpose of the parties to this contract, to maintain one price for the same book to all retail buyers, was limited to copyrighted books published by members of the American Publishers' Association, and did not extend to uncopyrighted books, whether published by such members or by others. Nor zation. Thereafter the Northern Securities Company, as it might legally do under its New Jersey charter and the laws of that state, purchased the shares of the stockholders of the two railroad companies to an amount more than sufficient to give it a controlling interest in both of them, paying to such stockholders the market value of their shares in its own certificates of stock at their par value. The action was brought in the United States circuit court to enjoin the Northern Securities Company from exercising any control over the operations of the railroad companies, and the latter from submission to any such control, and a decree substantially to that effect was made in the circuit court. On appeal to the supreme court it was held that the combination by the stockholders to form the stockholding corporation which acquired, in exchange for its own capital stock, a controlling interest in the capital stock of both railway companies, violated the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, which declares illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce, and forbids attempts to monopolize such commerce, or any part of it. That Congress did not exceed its powers under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution in enacting the anti-trust act declaring illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce, and forbidding attempts to monopolize such commerce or any part of it, although such statute is construed to embrace a combination of stockholders of two competing interstate railway companies to form a stockholding corporation which shall acquire, in exchange for its own capital stock, a controlling interest in the capital stock of each of such railway companies. That enforcement of the provisions of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, by a Federal-court decree enjoining a corporation organized in pursuance of a combination of stockholders in two competing interstate railway companies for the purpose of acquiring a controlling interest in the capital stock of such companies from exercising the power acquired by such corporation by virtue of its acquisition of such stock does not amount to an invasion by the Federal government of the reserved rights of the states creating the several corporations. That the constitutional guaranty of liberty of contract is not infringed by the enforcement of the provisions of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890, by a Federal-court decree enjoining a corporation formed in pursuance of a combination of stockholders in two competing interstate railway companies for the purpose of acquiring a controlling interest in the capital stock of such companies, from acquiring any further stock therein, from voting such stock as it then holds or may subsequently acquire, and from exercising any control over the railway companies by virtue of its holdings; and may restrain the railway companies from permitting or suffering any such action on the part of a stockholding corporation, and from paying any dividends on account of the stock held by it.

In the above case Mr. Justice Brewer concurred in the result only because the facts in the case showed that there was an unreasonable combination in restraint of interstate commerce, and within the letter and spirit of the statute and the power of Congress, and, in doing so, said that, while he was with the majority of the court in the decision in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 41 L. ed.

was any party restrained from selling uncopyrighted books, and uncopyrighted books only, to any person, provided such person does not buy or sell copyrighted books published by the members of that association. It is only to dealers who themselves insist upon selling at retail the copyrighted books of the members of the association at prices less than the net prices fixed by the publishers, or who insist upon reselling at wholesale such copyrighted books to such dealers, that the parties to the combination are restrained from selling.

I am led to the conclusion, after a careful consideration of the question presented, upon principle as upon the authority of the Park Case, that the question certified should be answered in the negative, and therefore I think that the order of the appellate division should be reversed, and that the order of the special term should be affirmed.

Bartlett, J., dissenting:

I agree with the opinion of Judge Gray. The agreement attacked has for its sole object the protection of copyrighted books.

1007, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 540, followed by the cases of United States v. Joint Traffic Assn. 171 U. S. 505, 43 L. ed. 259, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25, Reversing 76 Fed. 895; Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 138, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96; and W. W. Montague & Co. v. Lowry, 193 U. S. 38, 48 L. ed. 608, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 307, Affirming 63 L. R. A. 58, 52 C. C. A. 621, 115 Fed. 27, he thought that in some respects the reasons given for the judgments could not be sustained, and that, instead of holding that the anti-trust act included all contracts, reasonable or unreasonable, in restraint of interstate trade, the ruling should have been that the contracts there presented were unreasonable restraints of interstate trade, and as such within the scope of the statute; that the act, as appears from its title, was leveled at only "unlawful restraints and monopolies;" that Congress did not intend to reach and destroy those minor contracts in partial restraint of trade which the long course of decisions at common law had affirmed were reasonable and ought to be upheld; and that the purpose, rather, was to place a statutory prohibition, with prescribed penalties and remedies, upon those contracts which were in direct restraint of trade, unreasonable, and against public policy. The Chief Justice and Justices White, Peckham, and Holmes dissented for two reasons, and all concurred in the dissent for both reasons, Mr. Justice Holmes writing an opinion in which he claimed to show that there was a distinction between restraint of trade and competition. He assumed that the only purpose of the purchase of the stock was to suppress competition between the two roads, and that the union of two interests, corporation or otherwise, whereby competition between them alone might be ended, was not a combination in restraint of trade under the statute, although, if they singly or together united in contract with a stranger by which their several or joint

I consider the construction given to it by Judge Gray is logical, conducive to the best interests of trade, and consistent with the latest utterance of this court on the subject,—John D. Park & Sons v. National Wholesale Druggists' Assn. 175 N. Y. 1, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578, 67 N. E. 136. It cannot be reasonably said that a publisher of books protected by copyright, and a dealer in books generally, may not say to his customers in the trade that if they cut the prices of his copyrighted books he will sever business relations absolutely. If this be so,—and I do not understand it can be successfully questioned,—why may not any number of men similarly situated agree to adopt that policy?

There is a phase of this case that has not been specially discussed, but which may be considered by way of argument. The refusal to maintain trade relations with a given individual is an inherent right which every person in business may exercise, for reasons he deems sufficient, or for no reason whatever. It is a part of that liberty of action which the Constitutions, state and Federal, guarantee to the citizen. This case freedom in trade between the states should be cut down, it might be. Mr. Justice White, in his dissenting opinion, claimed that, if Congress had attempted to render penal and provide for the restraint of such contracts as the one under consideration, it would have exceeded its powers under the Constitution, but agreed with Mr. Justice Holmes that it had not done so, and that the act did not apply to contracts or transactions of this character. As said before, all four justices who dissented agreed to both of the propositions considered respectively by Justices Holmes and White.

IV. Effect and construction of state anti-trust laws.

a. Arkansas.

In an action against an insurance company to recover a penalty for violation of the anti-trust law of Arkansas (Act 1899, p. 50), where the complaint alleges that the defendant, while engaged in business in this state, became and was "a member of a pool, trust, agreement, combination, confederation, or understanding with the corporations engaged in similar business to regulate or fix the price or terms for insuring property" (the language quoted being the language of the act),—a demurrer on the ground that the complaint is insufficient in failing to aver that the pool, trust, agreement, etc., was formed for the purpose, or had the effect, of fixing the company's business in the state will not be sustained. State v. Etta F. Ins. Co. 66 Ark. 480, 51 S. W. 638.

A foreign insurance company doing business in Arkansas, which enters into an agreement with other insurance companies formed outside the statute for the purpose of fixing the rates of insurance in foreign countries, not intended to affect, and which does not affect, persons, prop-discloses one of the saddest phases of our modern business life. It is a well-known fact that the great department stores of the country have encroached upon many lines of trade entirely distinct from the main and legitimate business in which they are engaged. As an illustration, a dry goods establishment, engaged in selling a vast number of articles legitimately related to its business, concludes, in order to promote its principal trade, to offer for sale books, furniture, druggists' sundries, and numerous other articles that need not be mentioned, at cut prices, representing only the cost of production, and oftentimes far below it. The inevitable effect of this policy is to draw a large number of people to these establishments, and in the final result the dealer makes good his losses in the outside trade by the prices he obtains in his legitimate business. It may be fairly assumed that the general business is conducted at a profit. The result is that a large number of the retail dealers in the various kinds of articles thus undersold are driven out of business, many of them at a time of life when they are unable to reinstate themselves in some other calling. It also results in great damage to manufacturers, producers, and wholesale dealers in loss of customers who have been driven into insolvency. It is, of course, true that the proprietors of department stores have the legal right to offer to the public goods of any kind at prices below production, or, indeed, may donate them to their customers. It is, however equally true that the manufacturers, producers, and wholesale dealers may say to the men whose policy is thus carrying ruin and destruction to their business and that of their customers that, "if you persist in this disastrous cutting of rates we will sever all business relations absolutely." These are mutual and inherent rights, in the nature of things, so long as self-defense and the privilege to exist survive among men.

erty, or prices of insurance in the state, does not thereby subject itself to the penalty imposed by the act of March 6, 1899, upon any corporation transacting any kind of business in the state which becomes a party to any pool or combination to fix or limit rates of insurance. State v. Lancashire F. Ins. Co. 66 Ark. 466, 45 L. R. A. 348, 51 S. W. 633.
